The memorial of the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives was read, stating that, from the enhanced prices of all the necessaries of life, their respective stipends are become inadequate, and praying further compensation.

Ordered, That this memorial lie on the table.

Ordered, That the petition of the French settlers at Gallipolis be referred to the Attorney General, to examine and report to the Senate, at the next session of Congress, upon the validity of their claims to lands under purchases of the Ohio or Sciota Companies, or other persons; together with his opinion of the means proper to be pursued by them for the obtainment of justice.

Ordered, That the Secretary return all original papers not addressed to the Senate, which have been laid before them during the present session by the PRESIDENT or by any of the Heads of Departments.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives that the Senate, having finished the Legislative business before them, are ready to adjourn.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House of Representatives have appointed a committee, jointly with a committee on the part of the Senate, to wait on the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, and inform him that Congress is ready to adjourn without day, unless he may have any further communications to make; in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate, and the appointment of a committee on their part.

Resolved, That the Senate concur in the foregoing resolution, and that Messrs. JOHNSTON and RUTHERFURD be the joint committee on their part.

Ordered, That the Secretary acquaint the House of Representatives therewith.

Mr. JOHNSTON reported, from the joint committee last mentioned, that they had waited on the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, who informed the committee that he had no further communications to make to Congress at this time.

Whereupon, the Senate then adjourned without day.

SPECIAL SESSION.

MONDAY, March 4.

In conformity to the summons from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, the Senate assembled in the Senate Chamber.

The HON. JOHN LANGDON, President pro tempore, read the summons of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, as follows:

The President of the United States to the President of the Senate:

Certain matters, touching the public good, requiring that the Senate shall be convened on Monday, the 4th instant, I have desired their attendance, as I do yours, by these presents, at the Senate Chamber, in Philadelphia, on that day; then and there to receive and deliberate on such communications as shall be made to you on my part.

G. WASHINGTON.

MARCH 1, 1793.

The following Senators were present:

JOHN LANGDON, from New Hampshire;
GEORGE CABOT, from Massachusetts;
THEODORE FOSTER, from Rhode Island;
OLIVER ELLSWORTH and ROGER SHERMAN, from Connecticut;
RUFUS KING, from New York;
JOHN RUTHERFURD, from New Jersey;
ROBERT MORRIS, from Pennsylvania;
GEORGE READ, from Delaware;
JOHN HENRY and RICHARD POTTS, from Maryland;
JAMES MONROE, from Virginia;
JOHN BROWN and JOHN EDWARDS, from Kentucky;
BENJAMIN HAWKINS, from North Carolina;
RALPH IZARD, from South Carolina;
JAMES GUNN, from Georgia.
SAMUEL LIVERMORE, from the State of New Hampshire, produced his credentials, and took his seat in the Senate; and the oath was administered to him by the PRESIDENT of the Senate, as the law provides.

Agreeably to notice given by the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, on the 2d instant, he came to the Senate Chamber, and took his seat in the Chair usually assigned the PRESIDENT of the Senate, who, on this occasion, was seated at the right and in advance of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES; a seat on the left; and also in advance, being provided for Judge CUSHING, appointed to administer the Oath; the doors of the Senate Chamber being open, the Heads of the Departments, Foreign Ministers, the late Speaker, and such Members of the late House of Representatives as were in town, together with as many other spectators as could be accommodated, were present.

After a short pause, the PRESIDENT of the Senate arose, and addressed the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, as follows:

"SIR: One of the Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States is now present, and ready to administer to you the oath required by the Constitution to be taken by the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES."

SENATE.]

Inauguration.

[MARCH, 1793.

On which the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, rising from his seat, was pleased to address the audience as follows:

“FELLOW-CITIZENS: I am again called upon, by the voice of my country, to execute the functions of its Chief Magistrate. When the occasion proper for it shall arrive, I shall endeavor to express the high sense I entertain of this distinguished honor, and of the confidence which has been reposed in me by the people of United America.

“Previous to the execution of any official act of the PRESIDENT, the Constitution requires an oath of office. This oath I am now about to take, and in your presence; that, if it shall be found, during my administration of the Government, I have, in any instance, violated, willingly or knowingly, the injunction thereof, I may (besides incurring Constitutional punishment) be subject to the upbraidings of all who are now witnesses of the present solemn ceremony.”

Judge CUSHING then administered the oath of office required by the Constitution; after which, the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES retired, and the spectators dispersed.

After acting upon several nominations received from the PRESIDENT, the Senate adjourned, sine die.

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES

OF THE

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES,

AT THE SECOND SESSION OF THE SECOND CONGRESS, BEGUN AT THE CITY OF PHILADELPHIA, NOVEMBER 5, 1792.

MONDAY, November 5, 1792.

This being the day appointed by law for the meeting of the present Congress, the following members appeared, produced their credentials, and took their seats:

From New Hampshire, NICHOLAS GILMAN, SAMUEL LIVERMORE, and JEREMIAH SMITH.

From Massachusetts, FISHER AMES, SHEAR-JASHUB BOURNE, ELBRIDGE GERRY, BENJAMIN GOODHUE, GEORGE THATCHER, and ARTEMAS WARD.

From Rhode Island, GEORGE LEONARD, BENJAMIN BOURNE.

From Connecticut, AMASA LEARNED, JONATHAN STURGES, and JONATHAN TRUMBULL, (Speaker.)

From Vermont, NATHANIEL NILES and ISRAEL SMITH.

From New York, EGBERT BENSON, JOHN LAURANCE, and THOMAS TREDWELL.

From New Jersey, ELIAS BOUDINOT, ABRAHAM CLARK, and JONATHAN DAYTON.

From Pennsylvania, THOMAS FITZSIMONS and FREDERICK AUGUSTUS MUHLENBERG.

From Maryland, PHILIP KEY and WILLIAM VANS MURRAY.

From Virginia, WILLIAM B. GILES, JAMES MADISON, ANDREW MOORE, JOSIAH PARKER, ABRAHAM VENABLE, and ALEXANDER WHITE.

From North Carolina, NATHANIEL MAOON, JOHN STEBLE, and HUGH WILLIAMSON.

From South Carolina, WILLIAM SMITH, THOMAS SUMPTER, and THOMAS TUDOR TUCKER.

From Georgia, ABRAHAM BALDWIN and FRANCIS WILLIS.

A quorum of members being present, a message was sent to the Senate to inform that body thereof. And a similar message was received by the House, from the Senate; and that JOHN LANGDON had been chosen their President pro tempore.

A joint committee were then appointed to wait on the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, to inform him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled, and ready to receive any communications he may think proper to make them.

Resolved, That two Chaplains, of different denominations, be appointed to Congress, one by each House, to interchange weekly.

The House then proceeded to appoint a Chaplain on their part, when a majority of votes appeared in favor of the Reverend ASHBEL GREEN.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Governor of Georgia, enclosing a proclamation and return of the election of JOHN MILLEDGE, to serve as one of the members of this House for the said State, in the room of ANTHONY WAYNE, whose seat was declared vacant; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A petition of sundry merchants of the city of Charleston, in the State of South Carolina, was presented to the House and read, praying that Congress will pass a law to restrain the proceedings, and reduce the fees in the Court of Admiralty of the United States in the said State; as, also, to admit of other security being taken, to the satisfaction of the Judge of the Court, in small and trivial causes brought by seamen or others against vessels in the merchants' service.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, Mr. LAURANCE, and Mr. WHITE, with instruction to examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Mr. BOUDINOT, from the joint committee appointed to wait on the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, and notify him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled and ready to receive any communications he may be pleased to make to them, reported that the committee had performed that service, and that the PRESIDENT was pleased to say, that he would make a communication to both Houses of Congress to-morrow, at twelve o'clock, in the Senate Chamber.

TUESDAY, November 6.

Several other members, viz: from New York, JAMES GORDON; from Pennsylvania, JOHN WILKES KITTERA; and from Virginia, SAMUEL GRIFFIN and JOHN PAGE, appeared and took their seats in the House.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate are now ready, in the Senate Chamber, to attend this House in receiving the communication from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, agreeably to his notification to both Houses yesterday.

The SPEAKER, attended by the members of this House, then withdrew to the Senate Chamber for the purpose expressed in the message from the Senate; and, being returned, the SPEAKER laid before the House a copy of the Speech delivered Defeat of General St. Clair—Answer to the President.

by the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES to both Houses of Congress, in the Senate Chamber. [A copy of the Speech appears in the proceedings of the Senate.]

Ordered, That the said Speech be committed to the consideration of a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY November 7.

Several members, to wit: from New York, CORNELIUS C. SCHOONMAKER; from New Jersey, AARON KITCHELL; from Pennsylvania, DANIEL HEISTER; and from Virginia, RICHARD BLAND LEE, appeared, and took their seats in the House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Treasurer of the United States, accompanying his accounts of the receipts and expenditures of the public moneys, from the 1st of January, 1792, to the 30th of September following, inclusive; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from Mr. Meredith, Treasurer of the United States, enclosing several accounts of the receipts and expenditure of the public money. Ordered to be printed (100 copies) for the use of the members.

Mr. GOODHUE moved for a committee, to bring in a bill for registering ships and vessels, and regulating those employed in the coasting trade.

Ordered, That Messrs. GOODHUE, FITZSIMONS, and PARKER, be the committee.

Mr. WHITE presented a memorial from Joseph Barnes, attorney for James Rumsey, praying the House to take up his former petition, respecting the enacting another law for the encouragement of Useful Arts, and complaining that the law now in force is altogether insufficient for the purpose of securing authors and inventors of machinery, &c., from the piracy and frauds of pretending impostors. Read and ordered to lie on the table.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, communicating to the House sundry documents referred to by him in his Address to both Houses yesterday, viz: a statement of the appropriation of the funds, certified by the proper officers. A representation from the Chief Justice and associate Justices of the Courts of the United States, complaining of the great severity of the duties imposed on them in being obliged to attend the Circuit Courts, which occasioned them to spend a large portion of their lives in the act of traveling, which ought not to be expected from men far advanced in years, unless in cases of great necessity. That they were almost constantly forced to be absent from their families, and their health daily impaired by the fatigue and burden of their office. And praying that a modification may speedily take place in the Judiciary system.

Another memorial was also amongst the papers sent with the PRESIDENT'S Message, from the Judges of the North Carolina district, containing a detail of the inconveniences to which they were subjected by the law respecting the claims of widows, orphans, and invalid pensioners. Both of those communications request that Congress may hasten a modification of the Judiciary system of the United States, which, in some instances, they affirm, to be not only burdensome and unnecessarily severe, but absolutely impossible in the execution.

The next document was the Constitution of the State of Kentucky.

The Clerk of the House proceeded to read some of the above-mentioned papers; and finished that respecting the appropriation of the funds, as ordered by law, in the Department of State. These were what had been communicated to the PRESIDENT by Mr. JEFFERSON, and contained details of moneys paid to the persons employed at Foreign Courts, &c., up to the 3d of November, 1792, amounting, in the whole to $143,500. These sums have been paid principally to Colonel Humphreys, at Portugal; Mr. Gouverneur Morris, at Paris; Mr. Short, at the Hague; Mr. Carmichael, at Madrid; &c. Mr. Secretary JEFFERSON'S communication further contains an analysis of the expenses of the Department of State, from the 1st of July, 1790, to the 1st of July, 1791, and from thence to the 1st July, 1792. During the former period the amount was $21,054 61. The latter is about 23,000. These papers were referred to a committee, and then the House proceeded to the other parts of the PRESIDENT'S Message, some of which being of a confidential nature, the galleries were ordered to be cleared.

DEFEAT OF GENERAL ST. CLAIR.

Ordered, That the report of the committee appointed to inquire into the causes of the failure of the late expedition under Major General St. Clair, which was made on the 8th day of May last, be referred to the consideration of a Committee of the Whole House on Wednesday next.

Mr. STUBBS, at this early hour of the present session, called the attention of the House to the report which had been brought in at the close of the last session, by the committee then appointed to inquire into and report on the causes of the defeat of the troops under the command of Major General St. Clair, on the 4th of November, 1791. Several reports having been circulated, reflecting dishonorably upon the conduct of that committee, of which Mr. S. was a member, rendered it necessary for him to require a speedy consideration of the whole subject, in order to do away the prejudices which had probably taken place in the minds of many of the citizens of the United States. For these reasons, he moved that the said report should be referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Ordered, That it be taken up on this day week.

ANSWER TO THE PRESIDENT.

The order of the day being called for, Mr. LAURANCE in the Chair, the Speech of the PRESIDENT, delivered yesterday to Congress, was taken up; and, on motion of Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, the following resolve was agreed to: "That a committee be appointed to prepare and report a respectful Address to the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, in answer to his Speech delivered to both Houses of Congress at the opening of the present session; with assurances, that they would take into consideration the important matters therein contained." An amendment was now moved, to strike out the word "important;" but it was negatived, as being a word of too much importance to be neglected. The resolution was carried, in substance, as above, and the Committee rose and reported it. The House immediately agreed, and a committee of three—Messrs. MADISON, BENSON, and MURRAY—were appointed by the SPEAKER to prepare the answer in conformity with the said resolve.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES:

*Gentlemen of the Senate, and
of the House of Representatives:*

I lay before you copies of certain papers relative to the Spanish interference in the execution of the treaty entered into in the year 1790, between the United States and the Creek nation of Indians, together with a Letter from the Secretary of State to the President of the United States, on the same subject.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, November 7, 1792.

The papers accompanying the said Message were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House two Letters from Thomas Barclay, Consul of the United States at the Court of Morocco, one dated the 28th of May, the other the 17th of July, 1792, enclosing petitions from Richard O'Brien, in behalf of himself and other citizens of the United States, now in captivity at Algiers, stating the peculiar hardships they have undergone during the time they have been kept in slavery, and praying that Congress will consider their distressed situation, and take such measures for their releasement, as to their wisdom shall seem meet.

Ordered, That the said letters and petitions be referred to the Secretary of State, for information.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of War, accompanying the following papers, to wit:

"1st. A statement of the measures taken, and the overtures made, to procure a peace with the Indians Northwest of the Ohio."

"2d. Information received relatively to the pacific overtures and the disposition of the Indians Northwest of the Ohio."

"3d. A statement of the measures which have been taken to conciliate and quiet the Southern Indians."

"4th. Information received relatively to the disposition of the Southern Indians, and the causes of the hostilities of part of the Cherokees and Creeks."

"5th. A statement of the troops in the service of the United States."

The said Letter and statements were partially read.

THURSDAY, November 8.

Several other members, to wit: from Connecticut, JAMES HILLHOUSE; from Pennsylvania, WILLIAM FINDLEY and ISRAEL JACOBS; and from Kentucky, ALEXANDER D. ORR, appeared, and took their seats in the House.

The petition of James Warrington, attorney in fact of Joseph Blachford, surviving partner of Harris & Blachford, late of Charleston, in the State of South Carolina, was presented, praying that the sum of seven thousand and fifty-two dollars and eighty-three-ninetieths of a dollar, with the interest thereon, which is due from the United States to the estate of John Banks, deceased, may be applied to the discharge of a claim of the petitioner's constituents against the estate of the late General Greene, on account of his security to them in behalf of the said Banks, on a contract to supply the late Southern Army with provisions; which was ordered to lie on the table.

A memorial from Messrs. Joseph and Woodrow Sims, merchants in Philadelphia was read, declaring that the ship Two Brothers, with a cargo of salt, wines, &c., bound from Cadiz to Philadelphia, had been, some time ago, driven into New York by stress of weather; that they had directed their agent there (Mr. Seaton) to dispose of the cargo, but, on being afterwards informed that it would not bring prime cost, they countermanded their orders, and the ship was coming round to Philadelphia without having broke bulk, but was wrecked off Egg Harbor; that the duties had been bonded at New York when the ship entered there, and the Collector had informed them he could not relinquish his demand for the whole of said duties; that there was no part of the property saved except five casks and one quarter-cask of wine, and some part of the rigging; that said five and a quarter casks were duly gauged and the duty paid in Philadelphia; and, finally, praying to be relieved from the payment of the duties secured at New York on a cargo which never came into their possession—this either by a general or special law of Congress. Ordered to lie for consideration.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, brought in a report from the committee appointed on the representation of the merchants of Charleston, against the law for regulating the fees in the Court of Admiralty of the United States, &c.; that it was the opinion of the committee that said law should be repealed, and another act passed to regulate said fees and to empower the Judges to take bail in trivial cases brought by seamen in the merchants' service, not exceeding five hundred dollars; which report was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Ordered, That the petition of Joseph Barnes, attorney in fact for James Rumsey, which lay on the table, be referred to Mr. WILLIAMSON, Mr. STURGES, and Mr. LEE; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of War, communicating information that, on the 27th of September last, Brigadier General Putnam concluded a Treaty of Peace, on behalf of the United States, with the Wabash and Illinois Indians, consisting of the several tribes of Eel River, Quittanonons, Pottawatomies of the Illinois river, Musquitons, Kickapoos of the Wabash, Piankeshaws, Kaskaskias, and Peorians.

H. OF R.]

The President's Speech.

The Clerk proceeded to read the Speeches delivered to the Indians by Brigadier General Putnam. That which he spoke to the Miamis, &c., informed them that the Great Chief of the United States had sent a Speech some time ago, as well as one from himself, inviting those tribes to peace, and to recommend it to their neighbors, at the same time observing, that a treaty had been concluded with the Wabash Indians, and the hatchet everlastingly buried. "Brothers," said he, "if you will hear me, and not listen to the singing of the birds, carried to your ears by those who would ruin and destroy you, open your ears to my message. My wish is to see you all happy, and that your women and children may lie down in peace, and your young men and hunters live in harmony with the United States. The United States never intended to wrong you out of any of your lands. Send some of your wise men to meet us, who can see and hear the truth, and who will consider your interest well. The road to happiness and peace is open to you. Arise! come and see me, and let us shake hands with one another."

To the Delawares General Putnam also made a Speech, wherein he expresses sentiments, in substance, as follows: "I have lived with you many years. The Great Chief of the United States is a good man. Listen to his words, which he sends by me to you for your good. Many things have happened which were forced to be left in the dark, but they will all come to light, if you will come to the mouth of the Muskingum and hear what we have to say to your people."

Another Speech of the General's, to a different tribe, offers them peace, and requests them to send a Speech to their brothers, desiring them not to stop their ears, but to take the straight road to happiness, which is now laid open to them. "The Great Spirit," said he, "I hope may succeed in bringing about a lasting peace, if your people are as willing as our Great Chief to brighten the chain of friendship. If you will come to Philadelphia, I will provide for your accommodation on the journey, and I request your answer."

After reading the above-mentioned papers, the House took up a memorial presented by Commodore John Hazlewood, respecting services and losses performed and sustained by him during the war, and requiring relief, &c. Read and laid on the table.

Mr. LEE moved that the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made to the House last session, respecting lost or destroyed certificates, be taken up in Committee of the Whole.

Ordered, That said Report be made the order of the day for next Monday week.

Ordered, That the Letter and representation from the Chief Justice and Associate Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, stating the difficulties and inconveniences which attend the discharge of their duties, according to the present Judiciary system, referred to in the PRESIDENT'S Message of yesterday, be committed to Mr. LIVERMORE, Mr. BENSON, Mr. KITTEKA, Mr. VENABLE, and Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, with instruction to examine the same, and report their opinion thereupon to the House.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill or bills for the regulation of pilots, and the superintendence of light-houses, beacons, buoys, and public piers throughout the United States; and that Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. PARKER, and Mr. WILLIAMSON, be the said committee.

The House resumed the reading of the papers communicated yesterday by the Secretary of War, relative to the Indians Northwest and South of the river Ohio, and to the troops in the service of the United States, and made a farther progress therein.

FRIDAY, November 9.

Another member, to wit: CHRISTOPHER GREENUP, from Kentucky, appeared, produced his credentials, and took his seat in the House.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, transmitting sundry communications from the Governor of Virginia, containing a correspondence between himself and the Governor of North Carolina, respecting the boundary line between the State of Virginia and the territory South of the river Ohio. These papers contain details of the situation of the unsettled boundaries extending toward the State of Kentucky, and a description of the difference between Walker's and Henderson's lines, which are at some places three miles asunder; and in this space there are upwards of a hundred families which may be claimed by either State, or they need acknowledge neither.

This subject was referred to Messrs. BOUDINOT, WILLIAMSON, and PAGE.

Mr. MADISON, from the committee appointed, presented an Address to the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, in answer to his Speech to both Houses of Congress; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

THE PRESIDENT'S SPEECH.

Mr. MURRAY called the attention of the House to that part of the PRESIDENT'S Speech which respects the transmission of newspapers throughout the different parts of the Union. He observed, that it had been in contemplation to qualify the Post Office law by a supplement, at the close of the last session; but, from the multiplicity of business crowding in at that time, the measure was relinquished. The same reasons could not operate in the present session, for the subject was particularly mentioned by the PRESIDENT, and ought to be referred to a committee as well as any other division of his communications. For these reasons, Mr. M. moved for the appointment of a committee; but, before any order could be taken on this motion, a member called for the reading of the confidential papers from the War Department, and the SPEAKER ordered the galleries to be cleared.

SATURDAY, November 10.

Two other members, to wit: PETER SYLVESTER, from New York, and THOMAS HARTLEY, from Pennsylvania, appeared, and took their seats in the House.

ADDRESS TO THE PRESIDENT.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Address to the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, in answer to his Speech to both Houses of Congress; and, after some time spent therein, the SPEAKER resumed the Chair, and Mr. LAURANCE reported that the Committee had had the said Address under consideration, and made several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

And then the said Address, as amended, being again read, was, on the question put thereon, agreed to by the House, as follows:

"SIR: The House of Representatives, who always feel a satisfaction in meeting you, are much concerned that the occasion for mutual felicitation afforded by the circumstances favorable to the national prosperity should be abated by a continuance of the hostile spirit of many of the Indian tribes, and, particularly, that the reiterated efforts for effecting a general pacification with them should have issued in new proofs of their persevering enmity, and the barbarous sacrifice of citizens, who, as the messengers of peace, were distinguishing themselves by their zeal for the public service. In our deliberations on this important department of our affairs, we shall be disposed to pursue every measure that may be dictated by the sincerest desire, on one hand, of cultivating peace, and manifesting, by every practicable regulation, our benevolent regard for the welfare of those misguided people; and by the duty we feel, on the other, to provide effectually for the safety and protection of our fellow-citizens.

"While with regret we learn that symptoms of opposition to the law imposing duties on spirits distilled within the United States, have manifested themselves, we reflect with consolation, that they are confined to a small portion of our fellow-citizens. It is not more essential to the preservation of true liberty, that a Government should be always ready to listen to the representations of its constituents, and to accommodate its measures to the sentiments and wishes of every part of them, as far as will consist with the good of the whole, than it is, that the just authority of the laws should be steadfastly maintained. Under this impression, every Department of the Government, and all good citizens, must approve the measures you have taken, and the purpose you have formed, to execute this part of your trust with firmness and energy; and be assured, sir, of every constitutional aid and co-operation, which may become requisite on our part. And we hope that, while the progress of contentment under the law in question, is as obvious as it is rational, no particular part of the community may be permitted to withdraw from the general burdens of the country, by a conduct as irreconcilable to national justice, as it is inconsistent with public decency.

"The productive state of the Public Revenue, and the confirmation of the credit of the United States abroad, evinced by the loans at Antwerp and Amsterdam, are communications the more gratifying, as they enforce the obligation to enter on systematic and effectual arrangements for discharging the Public Debt, as fast as the conditions of it will permit; and we take pleasure in the opportunity to assure you of our entire concurrence in the opinion, that no measure can be more desirable, whether viewed with an eye to the urgent wish of the community, or the intrinsic importance of promoting so happy a change in our situation.

"The adoption of a Constitution for the State of Kentucky, is an event on which we join in all the satisfaction you have expressed. It may be considered as particularly interesting, since, besides the immediate benefits resulting from it, it is another auspicious demonstration of the facility and success with which an enlightened people is capable of providing, by free and deliberate plans of Government, for their own safety and happiness.

"The operation of the law establishing the Post Office, as it relates to the transmission of newspapers, will merit our particular inquiry and attention, the circulation of political intelligence through these vehicles being justly reckoned among the surest means of preventing the degeneracy of a free Government, as well as of recommending every salutary public measure to the confidence and co-operation of all virtuous citizens.

"The several other matters which you have communicated and recommended, will, in their order, receive the attention due to them, and our discussions will, in all cases, we trust, be guided by a proper respect for harmony and stability in the public Councils, and a desire to conciliate, more and more, the attachment of our constituents to the Constitution, by measures accommodated to the true ends for which it was established."

Resolved, That the SPEAKER, attended by the House, do present the said Address, and that Mr. MADISON, Mr. BENSON, and Mr. MURRAY, be a committee to wait on the PRESIDENT, to know when and where it will be convenient for him to receive the same.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee to whom was referred the petition of the merchants of the city of Charleston, in South Carolina. Whereupon,

Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law, to regulate the fees of the several District Courts of the United States, in all cases of Admiralty proceedings; and that so much of the act for the regulation of seamen in the merchants' service, as makes ships or vessels and their appurtenances liable to seizure and detention, for actions of trivial amount, be repealed; and that, in future, a power be vested in the District Judge, to accept of other sufficient security, in cases where the sum in dispute shall not exceed — dollars.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution, and that Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, Mr. LAURANCE, and Mr. WHITE, do prepare and bring in the same.

Mr. MADISON, from the committee appointed to wait on the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, to know when and where it will be convenient for him to receive the Address of this House, in answer to his Speech to both Houses of Congress, reported that the committee had waited on the PRESIDENT, who signified to them that it would be convenient to him to receive the said Address at 12 o'clock on Monday next, at his own house.

MONDAY, November 12.

Another member, to wit, JOHN BAPTIST ASHE, from North Carolina, appeared, and took his seat in the House.

Address to the President—Defeat of General St. Clair.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, covering a statement of the receipts and expenditures of public moneys, to the end of the year 1791; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

ADDRESS TO THE PRESIDENT.

The SPEAKER, attended by the House, then withdrew to the house of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, and there presented to him the Address of this House, in answer to his Speech to both Houses of Congress; to which the PRESIDENT made the following reply:

"GENTLEMEN: It gives me pleasure to express to you the satisfaction which your Address affords me. I feel, as I ought, the approbation you manifest of the measures I have taken, and the purpose I have formed, to maintain, pursuant to the trust reposed in me by the Constitution, the respect which is due to the laws; and the assurance which you, at the same time, give me, of every constitutional aid and co-operation that may become requisite, on your part.

"This is a new proof of that enlightened solicitude for the establishment and confirmation of public order, which, embracing a zealous regard for the principles of true liberty, has guided the deliberations of the House of Representatives; a perseverance in which can alone secure, under the Divine blessing, the real and permanent felicity of our common country.

"G. WASHINGTON."

The House, having returned to their Chamber, resumed the reading of the papers communicated by the Secretary of War, on Wednesday last, relative to the Indians Northwest and South of the river Ohio, and to the troops in the service of the United States, and made a farther progress therein.

TUESDAY, November 13.

Two other members, to wit: ROBERT BARNWELL and DANIEL HUGER, from South Carolina, appeared, and took their seats in the House.

Mr. BOUDINOT, from the committee to whom was referred the Message from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, of the 9th instant, together with sundry papers on the subject of the boundary line between the State of Virginia and the Territory of the United States South of the Ohio, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

DEFEAT OF GENERAL ST. CLAIR.

On a motion made and seconded, that the House do come to the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of War be notified that this House intend, on Wednesday next, to take into consideration the Report of the Committee appointed to inquire into the causes of the failure of the late expedition under General St. Clair, to the end that they may attend the House, and furnish such information as may be conducive to the due investigation of the matters stated in the said report:"

Mr. WILLIAMSON moved to strike out the latter part of the resolution, which respected the attendance of the Secretaries on the House. This motion, if carried, leaves the resolution a simple proposition to inform those officers that the House were, on Wednesday, to take the Report on the failure of General St. Clair's expedition into consideration.

Mr. VENABLE objected generally to the resolution, as inconsistent with the dignity of the House. He doubted the propriety of the measure altogether. The gentlemen are not impeached, and therefore the House has no right to cite them to make their appearance; and, with respect to information, the House can command such from the Heads of Departments as they may see proper to require. He was at a loss in attempting to investigate the object of the resolution. He could see no purpose that it would answer, which could not as well be obtained without it.

Mr. WHITE offered several objections to the resolution, of a similar import with the above.

Mr. DAYTON supported the motion by a few remarks, stating the importance of that information which those gentlemen alone could give. He adverted to the report of the committee, which he observed had exculpated the commanding General on that expedition, whereas he was of opinion that the failure was owing to the misconduct of that gentleman.

Mr. TUCKER objected to the resolution. He preferred the mode of requiring that information which the House might think necessary, in writing.

Mr. MADISON objected to the motion on constitutional grounds, and as being contrary to the practice of the House. He had not, he said, thoroughly revolved the matter in his own mind, and therefore was not prepared to state fully the effects which would result from the adoption of the resolution; but he would hazard thus much, that it would form an innovation in the mode of conducting the business of this House, and introduce a precedent which would lead to perplexing and embarrassing consequences; as it involved a conclusion, in respect to the principles of the Government, which at an earlier day would have been revolted from. He was decidedly in favor of written information.

Mr. CLARK was opposed to the resolution; as a member of the committee who made the report, he had no apprehension; with respect to information, the report and the vouchers are before the House; and such further inquiry may be made of the proper officers as the House may think necessary.

Mr. AMES supported the resolution. He noticed the impressions which the failure of the late expedition had made on the public mind. Characters had suffered in the general estimation. It was of the utmost importance that a thorough investigation should take place, that if the failure of the expedition was a mere casualty, and the fortune of war, it might be made to appear; or, if it was owing to misconduct, the blame might fall on the proper subjects. The mode suggested to obtain information appeared to him the best that could be adopted—the most adequate to the object. It was due to justice, to truth, and to the national honor, to take effectual measures to in-investigate the business thoroughly. This inquiry appears to be the beginning of an arrangement preparatory to an impeachment; on whom this will fall, he should not presume to say; but still it places the subject in an important point of view, and shows, in the strongest manner, the necessity of adopting the best possible mode of ascertaining the real state of facts. This, he conceived, could not be done so effectually as by the mode proposed in the resolution.

Mr. GILES objected to the resolution. He preferred a thorough discussion of the report, in the first place, and a comparison of the vouchers with the report; and if, in the issue, it should appear necessary to call for information from these officers, it could then be done; but, in the present state of the business, to adopt the resolution would place the committee in a very disagreeable situation.

Mr. LAURANCE observed that the committee, in their report, say that, for want of time, they had not been able to complete it; it is, then, apparent from the report itself that it is immature. He stated several particulars in the report which were incomplete, and from hence inferred that there was material information to be received previous to being able to form a competent judgment on the matter. He observed that, as the information must be had, he saw no necessity of postponing the attendance of those officers in the first instance.

Mr. MADISON, in reply to Mr. AMES's remark, that the best possible mode ought to be adopted, observed, that there seemed to be different ideas entertained by the different advocates of the resolution; one seemed to implicate the officers alluded to as parties concerned; another appeared to consider them merely as witnesses. For his part, he thought there was no other way of proceeding, but that of adopting one or the other of these alternatives: either to take up the report and discuss its merits, or for the House to begin the inquiry themselves, de novo.

Mr. LIVERMORE objected to the resolution. He could not see any advantage which would result from adopting it. He thought the causes of the failure of the expedition were sufficiently obvious, without criminating any body. He adverted to these causes—they were the rawness of the troops, and the superiority of the Indians as marksmen. On these points, he could not see what information could be derived from the Secretary of the Treasury. He thought that the Legislature had gone too far already, and that no satisfaction would result from further proceedings, but that the subject would appear more and more involved.

Mr. BOUNDNOT, after stating sundry particulars relative to the state of the public mind at the time of the report, adverted to several parts of it which appear to criminate particular persons, some of whom were absent at the time of the investigation on which the report is founded. He therefore urged the necessity of receiving from the Heads of the Departments that information which was requisite to throw light on several parts of the report, and that this ought to be done previous to taking the report into consideration.

Mr. FITZSIMONS said he should vote against the resolution. He did not think this the proper time to call for the information alluded to; nor the mode proposed a proper one. Some remarks have been made on the report, though it is not before the House; to these he should not particularly reply, but would only observe, that no person had applied to the House for redress of any supposed injury received by the report. It has been said that the inquiry ought to have been a military one; but it was well known that it was impossible to institute such an inquiry by reason of the want of officers. He then gave a sketch of the mode of proceeding adopted by the committee in conducting the inquiry, to show that they had availed themselves of every means of information within their power.

Mr. WILLIAMSON said he had moved to strike out the latter part of the resolution, but he was equally opposed to the whole of it; and since he had heard the remarks of several gentlemen, on both sides of the House, he was clearly of opinion that the best way was to dispose of it altogether, and to let the subject proceed in the course which it had already taken.

Mr. GILES observed, that he thought there was less delicacy observed on this occasion, in respect to the committee, than was usual in this House. With respect to the report, the vouchers on which every assertion is founded are before the House. As to the incompleteness of the report, it is an immaterial object; the few blanks it contains are occasioned by the want of time to examine the voluminous papers necessary to be examined, in order to ascertain some of the facts—facts not in themselves of the first importance. He observed, that he had not the smallest objection to the fullest investigation of the subject; he was in favor of all the information that could be possibly obtained; he objected not only to the mode now contended for, which he thought not only liable to all the objections which had been made, but to many others which might be offered.

Mr. DAYTON observed, that he was one of those who were not satisfied with the report; he did not think the conclusion which exculpated the commanding officer could be supported by the report itself. He adverted to several facts stated in it, which showed that the commander must have been highly culpable; he instanced the slowness of his movements, the dilatoriness in constructing forts, and his being surprised by the enemy. He thought that the remarks which had fallen from gentlemen, on what he had said, were illiberal, as they had virtually impeached his candor, when he was not conscious of deviating from its dictates. It was not his intention to have touched on the merits of the report, but he had been impelled to do it from the turn the debate had taken.

Mr. GERRY was in favor of the resolution. He enlarged on the magnitude of the object of investigation, and insisted that it was the indispensable duty of the House thoroughly to probe the subject to the bottom, that if any persons have been to blame they may suffer, or if the event which has taken place, by which the national character has suffered, and so severe and unproductive an expense has been incurred, amounting probably to one million dollars, has been owing to circumstances which could not be avoided or controlled, the public may receive satisfaction as to the whole matter.

Mr. PAGE objected to the resolution, particularly to the precedent it would establish; but, at the same time, he was in favor of the fullest inquiry the subject was susceptible of. He said, the mode proposed would operate to clog the freedom of inquiry, and the freedom of debate.

Mr. AMES, adverting to the spirit of the report, pointed out the peculiar situation of the two Secretaries, and that they did not stand on the same ground with other persons who are not so intimately implicated in the matter. He alluded to the various objections which had been urged from precedent, from the fullness of the investigation which the subject had undergone in the hands of the Committee, and from the remark by Mr. LIVERMORE, that sufficient had already been done. To this last objection he particularly replied, by saying that the public wanted further satisfaction, and that the House could not justify themselves to their constituents without a stricter and fuller investigation, that the whole of the facts might be laid before them.

Mr. MADISON said, the mode now proposed involved a dereliction of the only practicable mode of transacting public business; and that, however imperfect that mode might be, still he believed that it was the only one that had received the sanction of experience and utility. He therefore hoped that the resolution would be rejected, and the mode already adopted persevered in, and the necessary information called for in writing, from every person in anywise interested or competent to give it.

Mr. W. SMITH supported the resolution. He showed by the report itself, and from the reasoning used by gentlemen in opposition to the resolution, that the two Secretaries were implicated in the causes of the failure of the expedition; from hence, he inferred the justice and propriety of giving them an opportunity of exculpating themselves.

Mr. GERRY expressed surprise at the apprehension which some gentlemen appear to entertain of the measure of introducing the Heads of Departments into the House; for his part he had no such apprehensions. The Secretary will attend at the orders of the House merely to give such information as may be required, and not as members or ministers, to influence and govern the determinations of the House.

Mr. VENABLE objected further to the resolution; he urged the impropriety of any of the Heads of Departments coming forward, and attempting in any way to influence the deliberations of the Legislature.

Mr. LAURANCE replied to Mr. VENABLE; he observed that the gentleman appeared to mistake the object of the resolution; it was not contemplated that either of the Secretaries should appear on the floor of the House to influence, in any degree, its decisions; they are to be called on merely for information.

Mr. MURRAY objected to the resolution. The report, he observed, is made to the House; if in the course of its discussion any further light or information should be deemed necessary, it may then be called for, and in that mode which shall appear most eligible—at present the question appears to be premature. Mr. MURRAY added several other remarks, and then the question being put, Mr. WILLIAMSON's motion for striking out was carried.

And then the main question being put, that the House do agree to the said resolution as amended, it passed in the negative.

Resolved, That the Committee of the Whole House, to whom is referred the report of the committee appointed to inquire into the causes of the failure of the expedition under Major General St. Clair, be empowered to send for persons, papers, and records, for their information.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to cause to be laid before this House a statement of the several disbursements of money made by the Department of War in the years 1790 and 1791.

The House resumed the reading of the papers communicated by the Secretary of War on Wednesday last, relative to the Indians Northwest and South of the River Ohio, and to the troops in the service of the United States, and made a farther progress therein.

WEDNESDAY, November 14.

Another member, to wit: WILLIAM BARRY GROVE, from North Carolina, appeared and took his seat in the House.

A petition of John Blake, Joseph Bindon, John D. Mercier, and Benjamin Thompson, on behalf of themselves and other Canadian refugees, was presented to the House and read, praying compensation for losses and injuries sustained in their persons and property, by adhering to the American cause, during the late war.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to Mr. DAYTON, Mr. BENJAMIN BOURNE, and Mr. MURRAY; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill or bills to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes; and that Mr. WHITE, Mr. CLARK, and Mr. WILLIAMSON, do prepare and bring in the same.

Ordered, That Mr. FITZSIMONS be added to the committee to whom was referred the petition of James Warrington, attorney in fact for Joseph Blachford, surviving partner of Harris & Blachford, late of Charleston, in the State of South Carolina.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter and Report from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanied with estimates of the sums necessary to be appropriated for the service of the year 1793; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to take into consideration that part of the PRESIDENT'S Speech which relates to the transmission of newspapers, and report whether any, and what, alterations may be necessary in the act passed last session for the regulation of the Post Office; and that Mr. MURRAY, Mr. BALDWIN, Mr. GILMAN, Mr. AMES, and Mr. BARNWELL, be the said committee.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of War, together with a memorial of Samuel Hodgdon, late Quartermaster General to the Army, respectively praying that they may be heard, and permitted to give information and explanations as to the causes of the failure of the expedition under Major General St. Clair; which were read. The Letter of the Secretary of War is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, November 14, 1792.

SIR: After the close of the last session of Congress I saw with much concern the report of the committee appointed to inquire into the causes of the failure of the expedition, under Major General St. Clair, of the 8th of May, 1792; which, having been presented to the House in the last moments of the session, was ordered to be printed, and has since circulated in the public newspapers throughout the United States, containing suggestions, most of them founded upon ex parte investigation, which have been understood in a sense very injurious to my reputation.

Learning that the present day was appointed for taking into consideration the above mentioned report, I have waited with anxious expectation for some act of the House enabling me to attend the progress of the examination upon which they are about to enter, for the purpose of furnishing such information and explanations as might conduce to a right understanding of facts, in which I am so materially implicated. The failure of a proposition, which I am informed was made to the House with that view, has added to my solicitude and regret.

Thus situated, I feel myself called upon to ask of the justice of the House that some mode may be devised, by which it will be put into my power to be present during the course of the intended inquiry, as well to hear the evidence on which the several allegations contained in the report are founded, as to offer the information and explanations to which I have alluded.

To this step I am impelled by a persuasion that an accurate and satisfactory investigation cannot otherwise be had with equal advantage, if at all. And my entire reliance upon the equity and impartiality of the House, will not permit a doubt to exist on my part that such an investigation will be exclusively the object of their desire and pursuit.

I have the honor to be, sir, with the highest respect, your most obedient humble servant,

H. KNOX.

The SPEAKER of the honorable the House of Representatives of the U. S.

DEFEAT OF GENERAL ST. CLAIR.

And then the order of the day, that the House do resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee appointed to inquire into the causes of the failure of the expedition under Major General St. Clair, being taken up—

Mr. MADISON suggested that the most simple, most practicable and consistent plan would be, to recommit the report of the select committee, and refer the present applications* to the committee to whom the report shall be re-committed. He therefore moved that the Committee of the Whole should be discharged from considering the reports on the causes of the failure of the late expedition.

Mr. SMITH (S. C.) observed that several objections struck him in opposition to this motion. The House must at some period, said he, meet this case; if it is recommitted, there will be an impropriety in referring it to the same committee; if a new committee is appointed, they must begin the whole subject de novo; and, if their investigation should take up such a length of time as that of the former committee, the session will be expended, and at the close of it the business will recur on the House, and the same discussion will occur again that is now proposed. He hoped the House would therefore proceed in the consideration of the report, assign two or three days in the week for the purpose, and continue the investigation till the whole is finished.

Mr. GILES replied, that he had no doubt that the vouchers on which the committee had founded the report would appear sufficient to justify the decisions that they had made. He said that he did not suppose that the applicants would adduce any new information; one of them had been called on, he attended the committee, and he supposed that he had furnished all the information he was in possession of. He objected to a recommitment; as one of the committee, he was perfectly satisfied with the report; nor did he conceive there was any additional evidence to be produced, except it was of a recent date.

Mr. AMES said, he perceived such a disinclination to go into the subject as indicated a proper temper of mind in relation to the persons supposed to be any ways interested in the ultimate decision of the House. He was opposed to a recommitment, as it would procrastinate instead of expediting the inquiry. He adverted to the report. Facts are stated; the public have been left to draw the inferences; the committee have not explicitly criminated any body; but they have determined, in several instances, who is not to blame. What is the situation of those who are implicated in the causes of the failure? Every citizen knows that, in consequence of the issue of the expedition, clamors against the War Department, in respect to Indian affairs, have rung through the Continent. Should public officers, who have been placed in situations of such importance be silent, and submit calmly to such imputations, they would be unworthy of public confidence, unworthy to breathe the vital air. They now apply for an opportunity to be heard in their own vindication. Shall they be sent to a Committee-room, and make their defence against the allegations brought forward to their disadvantage, which have been published to the world, in the hearing of perhaps ten or a dozen persons only? He hoped not—thought justice to them and to the public required that they should be allowed to make their defence in the face of the world. Will not precluding them look like a wish to smother all further inquiry into the matter?

Mr. BALDWIN was in favor of recommitting; he said it was the most eligible mode, and was consonant to the practice of the House.

Mr. MADISON remarked, that it had been said a disposition was discovered to smother inquiry. In reply he observed that, if he wished to prevent a thorough investigation, he should be in favor of the whole subject being undertaken by the House; because, he observed, that if a select committee of a few members took seven weeks to form an incomplete report, it must appear evident that so large a body as this House could never get through the matter. He further observed, that the same reason existed for referring the residue of the evidence to a select committee as induced the measure in the first instance.

Mr. FITZSIMONS said he was at first in favor of a recommitment, but on further consideration he was convinced the House would be able to get through the subject in a shorter time than a select committee. He added several other reasons which induced him to be in favor of the House proceeding with the report.

Mr. GERRY said it appeared to him that the only question seemed to be, whether the House or the select committee shall establish the facts. If these facts are established by the committee, would it give equal satisfaction as if they were established by the House? He conceived it would not; but, should the result be a conviction on the part of the House that some of the officers are culpable, will the House rest an impeachment on the report of the committee? He conceived the House ought to found their decisions on facts ascertained by themselves. It has been said there is no difference between the House and the committee. If this is the case, does it not imply a censure by the House on certain characters? He thought it did. It therefore becomes the House to discuss the report, that it may be determined on what footing it stands. If, in the case of a contested election the House revolted from the idea of submitting their judgment to facts substantiated by a committee, the case before us is of unspeakably greater magnitude. For these, and several other reasons, he hoped the report would not be recommitment.

Mr. WILLIAMSON was in favor of the motion for recommitting; he supported his opinion by the uniform practice of the House, which in every case where new evidence was adduced, always provided that the new evidence should be examined by the same committee, who had originally brought in the report. He said if this mode was departed from, we should find no committee would bring forward a state of facts in future. He thought it was not treating the committee with proper candor to decide on their report in its present situation.

Mr. SYLVESTER observed, that the resolution of the House at the close of the last session, that they would take up the subject early in the present session, precluded a recommitment; he was therefore opposed to the motion.

Mr. BODINOT was in favor of a recommitment; he said, if there is new evidence to be brought forward, the House ought to wait till that is received and reported at the Clerk's table; and this he conceived ought to be done in the usual way, by a select committee; till the whole testimony is completed it appeared to him the House was not prepared to take one step in the matter.

Mr. MADISON replied to Mr. GERRY's allusion to the case of the contested election. He inquired of him whether the House itself went into an investigation of facts in the first instance? He believed he would not say they did. With respect to the memorials, he inquired, whether, if they had been presented at the time of the investigation of the subject by the select committee, they would not have been referred to the committee? If they would then have been referred, the same reason exists for referring them to a select committee at the present time.

Mr. LAURANCE was of opinion that a recommitment would tend to a saving of time; the committee will not be obliged to go over the same ground again that has already been explored; all they will be obliged to do is, to investigate the new testimony which will be adduced. He hoped, therefore, that the motion would prevail.

Mr. GILES said, that the proceedings of the committee were public, and that the Secretaries could have attended all the time, had they seen proper. They attended but once, and then appeared extremely anxious to get away to attend to their offices. The committee would have been extremely glad to have had those gentlemen present oftener, and to receive all the information they could give, and supposed they had done it.

Mr. GERRY replied to Mr. MADISON. He said, if gentlemen would recur to the proceedings of the House on the contested election, they will find that the House expressly reserved to itself the right of substantiating the facts, which should appear from an examination of the depositions, taken in conformity to the resolutions of the House; and here he adverted to the mode pointed out by the House in taking those depositions. The adverse party was to be summoned to attend to the taking them; but in this report it appears that ex parte evidence has been admitted as the foundation on which some of the decisions have been made.

Mr. MURRAY supported the motion for a recommitment. He observed that the matter, in its present state, was so incomplete that he could not see how the House could proceed upon it. One part of the evidence only is finished, and the report is made on that evidence. Now, we are told new testimony is offered; let the whole be brought into view at once, and then the House will be in a situation to judge.

Mr. PAGE was in favor of a further commitment of the subject; but whether to the committee who made the report, or to a new committee, he should not take upon him to say. With respect to the admission of any Head of a Department to the bar of this House, except in case of an impeachment, he would never consent to it. It would be a precedent of a most dangerous nature, tending to a destruction of all freedom of inquiry by committees.

Mr. FINDLEY observed, that the committee wished that Mr. Hodgdon should have been present, but he did not make his appearance; the committee therefore proceeded on the testimony they had, and as there is now new evidence brought forward, he thought it was proper that the report should be recommitted. As one of the committee, he should have no objections to such alterations as might appear proper on further and more complete investigation of the matter.

Mr. STEELE called for the reading of a clause in the memorial of the Secretary of War, which states that the committee had drawn conclusions from ex parte evidence. This being read, Mr. STEELE remarked on the want of candor towards the committee, which had been shown by some of the members in the course of their observations. He then adverted to the above clause respecting ex parte evidence, and observed that, with respect to the Secretary of War, it was not true that the committee had proceeded on ex parte evidence; that officer, said he, was notified of the meetings of the committee; he attended those meetings; he furnished the committee with papers and documents, &c.; and further, he was requested to detain officers in town whose testimony was necessary in the matter, and that he complained of some of those officers being detained by the delays of the committee from the recruiting service. With respect to Mr. Hodgdon the same cannot be said, as he was not then in the country.

Mr. STEELE then concluded by some additional remarks on the indelicacy manifested by some gentlemen in their treatment of the committee, and observed that he did not apply it to himself personally, but as it respected the committee at large, he thought proper to express the contempt which he conceived it merited.

Mr. DAYTON replied to Mr. STEELE. He repeated the substance of his original remarks on the report, and added, that in the course of the discussion he should attempt to show that the deductions made in several parts of the report were false. Mr. D. added, that whatever the gentleman last speaking might say, as one of the committee who signed the report, he was certainly implicated in whatever censure it merited.

The question for a recommitment was then agreed to, 30 to 22. And it was accordingly

Resolved, That the Committee of the Whole House, to whom was committed the report of the committee appointed to inquire into the causes of the failure of the expedition under Major General St. Clair, be discharged from the consideration thereof; and that the said report, together with the documents relating thereto, including the Letter of the Secretary of War, and the memorial of Samuel Hodgdon, be recommitted to Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. GILES, Mr. STEELE, Mr. CLARK, and Mr. FINDLEY.

THURSDAY, November 15.

Another member, to wit: THEODORE SEDGWICK, from Massachusetts, appeared, and took his seat in the House.

Mr. GOODHUE, from the committee appointed, presented a bill concerning the registering and recording of ships or vessels: which was received, read twice, and committed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of War, accompanying an extract of a letter to him, from James Seagrove, temporary agent to the Creek Indians, dated the 28th ultimo, containing further information relative to Indian affairs in the Southern department; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

FRIDAY, November 16.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act regulating Foreign Coins, and for other purposes;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House. The message also communicated a Letter from Messrs. Hebert & Co., of the city of Paris, addressed to the Congress of the United States, stating certain propositions for the purchase of a quantity of vacant lands, the property of the United States.

The Letter referred to in the said Message was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act regulating Foreign Coins, and for other purposes," was read the first time.

Ordered, That Mr. VENABLE and Mr. STEELE be added to the committee appointed to take into consideration that part of the PRESIDENT'S Speech which relates to the transmission of newspapers, and report whether any, and what, alterations may be necessary in the act passed last session for the regulation of the Post Office.

The House resumed the reading of the papers communicated by the Secretary of War on the 7th instant, relative to the Indians Northwest and South of the River Ohio, and to the troops in the service of the United States, and made a farther progress therein.

MONDAY, November 19.

Another member, to wit: JOHN FRANCIS MERCER, from Maryland, appeared, and took his seat in the House.

The bill sent from the Senate entitled "An act regulating Foreign Coins, and for other purposes," was read the second time, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter and Report from the Commissioners appointed by the act entitled "An act making provision for the reduction of the Public Debt," stating the amount of the purchases which have been made of the Public Debt, in pursuance of the powers vested in them by the said act;" which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A memorial and address from the people called

H. OF R.]

Protection to American Commerce.

[NOVEMBER, 1792.]

Quakers, from their several religious societies in New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, and Virginia, was presented to the House and read, praying that Congress will adopt such measures as, in their wisdom, may be deemed salutary and effectual for securing peace and friendship with the original holders of this land.

Ordered, That the said memorial and address do lie on the table.

A petition of Thomas Screven, executor of Brigadier General James Screven, deceased, was presented to the House and read, praying the renewal of sundry Continental Loan Office certificates, the property of the said deceased, which were burnt, or otherwise destroyed by the enemy, during the late war.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the consideration of the Committee of the Whole House, to whom is committed the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury respecting lost and destroyed certificates.

Ordered, That the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury concerning marine hospitals, which was made on the 17th of April last, together with the report of a committee thereupon, which was made on the 28th of the same month, be referred to the committee last appointed.

PROTECTION TO AMERICAN COMMERCE.

Mr. WILLIAMSON moved that a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill or bills for promoting commerce, by the increase of American seamen. In moving the above, Mr. W. addressed the House as follows:

Much of your time during the present session, Mr. SPEAKER, will be employed in deliberating upon the several important subjects that have been recommended to us by the PRESIDENT. The numerous and lengthy bills that you inherit from the last session, must also demand a considerable portion of your time. Observing so much interesting and weighty business, from which you cannot turn aside, it is with some reluctance that I bespeak the attention of the House, while I submit to their consideration another subject of some importance: for it is a subject, unless I am mistaken, that interests the merchant and the planter.

Measures have already been taken by Congress, for increasing the number of our shipping; but no effectual and general measure has been adopted for increasing the number of native American seamen. Every gentleman in my hearing knows, that there are always a considerable number of foreigners employed on board American vessels; but none of us could have expected, and some of us may not have heard of the injury and insults to which our commerce has been exposed, from having British seamen on board our ships.

A schooner called the David and George, belonging to Portsmouth, in Virginia, and commanded by Captain Goffigan, lately touched at Sierra Leone, on the coast of Africa; she was navigated by eleven persons. Three of that number who had been on shore, informed Captain Wickham who commanded an armed vessel, that they were British subjects. Captain Wickham went on board the American vessel and claimed the three seamen; he also claimed wages for them. Captain Goffigan refused to deliver the men, and declared with truth that nothing was due them. Captain Wickham took the men by force, and by the same regulation he went into the hold, and took as much of the cargo as he thought fit, under the cover of substitute for wages. Captain Goffigan complained of this violence and robbery to Mr. Clarkson, who is Governor of the Province. The Governor replied, that he should have done the same thing, and that he had orders from his superiors so to act in such cases.

The ship Illustrious President, belonging to Virginia, commanded by Captain Butler, touched some time ago at Maderia, in her passage to the East Indies. The British frigate Hyena, commanded by Captain Hargood, lay at that time in the road. Seven of Captain Butler's sailors being British subjects, Captain Hargood sent to take them by force from on board the American ship, and he would have done so, had not the Governor of the Island, remembering what he owed to the honor of his nation and to every ship under his protection, interrupted his authority.

The ship Fame belonging to Philadelphia, commanded by Walter Sims, on her way to the East Indies, lately touched at Table Bay, at the Cape of Good Hope. Captain Blith, who commanded a ship of twenty guns, then lay in the road. One of Captain Sims's sailors, a native of Scotland, offered his service to Captain Blith, calling himself a British subject. That very man in Philadelphia had taken the oath of allegiance to the United States; but the British claim was best, for Captain Blith's ship was strongest. He took the man, sent an officer on board the American ship, who took the liberty of opening the after hatch, searching the hold and looking out a chest and clothes. Captain Blith justified these acts of violence, by saying, that he had printed instructions to take all who called themselves British subjects.

These are a few out of the numberless cases in which our ships have been robbed of their seamen, and they are samples of the manner in which we shall be constantly treated, while we depend on foreigners to navigate our ships. If these cases had terminated in threats and abusive language, to which our flag is too much accustomed, it might have been questioned, whether the nation of the offending party was to blame. When you are told by one officer and another, that he is instructed to distress our trade, we should, if possible, deprive them of the present excuse. Is it not our business to inquire into the cause of this strange conduct? By a vitiated passion for British goods, we are universally clothed in the manufactures of that nation. Our debts increase every year, and we labor to make her rich, while we are becoming poor. We pour our treasures into her lap more than any other nation under the sun. Observe the rewards! I say nothing about her measures on our Western Frontier; but our trading ships are boarded and plundered at discretion by her ships of war; and yet, Great Britain, whose commerce we cherish, is the only nation that treats us in this manner. Perhaps it is conjectured, that Americans are of that species of animals whose favor is increased by rough treatment. Be this as it may, it is our duty to consider of the safest and surest mode of extending our commerce. After we have been told, that an American vessel having sailors on board, who chance to have been born in the British dominion, is subject to be deprived of her hands, robbed of her property, and turned adrift without help, it can hardly be necessary to adduce other arguments in favor of native American seamen; but other strong and conclusive arguments in favor of the measure present themselves. The merchants' property in critical situations, or in distant and obscure parts of the world, is always most safe when his ship is navigated by men who uniformly strive to return to their native home, and whose hopes and happiness centre in that country to which their ship belongs. The crew of a French brig some weeks ago, murdered their captain and mate on our coast; that misfortune, in all probability, would not have happened, if the seamen had been natives of France. Two of them only were of that Kingdom. Is it necessary to add, that a powerful body of seamen, at some future day, may save us from the vast expense and danger of a standing army? Upon this single argument of native seamen we might rest the question. It needs neither support nor illustration. I shall, therefore, presume, that it is our duty as soon as possible, to provide for the daily operations of pride or injustice, by furnishing the merchant with seamen, of whom he cannot be robbed, except by open declaration of war. With seamen in whom he can trust—with men, who actuated by those passions which are inseparable from the human breast, the pride of nation, and the love of country, may serve him in every part of the world. To furnish the nation with a safe and strong bulwark against foreign tyranny and invasion.

This conclusion, however, is drawn upon the supposition, that foreign commerce should be encouraged; but, I am aware that objections have been made to every measure that has foreign commerce for its object, and similar objections would fall with additional weight against any plan for supporting foreign commerce by native seamen. We are told, that in a country where land is plenty and the inhabitants few; where little progress is made in cultivating the soil, the Legislature should consider agriculture as the primary object of their attention. This is a position that will not be disputed, since we know that the hope of our species must prosper or perish; that our numbers must be many or few, according as the soil is well or ill cultivated; according to the abundance or scarcity of provisions. These facts being granted, we are only to inquire, what are the most certain and effectual means of promoting agriculture? To this I reply, that we can promote agriculture by extending foreign commerce, and by no other direct means whatever. Bounties can never prove effectual; they may serve to introduce a foreign plant, but they cannot produce industry nor plenty. The general demand for any article never fails to increase the manufacture of that article. The great demand for provisions to be exported, will not fail to produce abundance of provisions in the country.

The simple calls of nature, the mere necessity of supporting life, is not a sufficient spring to active industry; it seldom gives birth to persevering diligence. Artificial wants and passions must come to our assistance, before we can shake off the indolence of nature, and apply ourselves steadily to work. Let a man discover that industry will procure him the luxuries as well as the necessaries of life, and he will not fail to work. Let the farmer see a ready market for all the produce that is not consumed by his family, and he will commonly have something to sell; let no such market present itself, and his family will frequently suffer from the want of necessaries. Every man who considers the effects of frequent and long embargoes, must discover that they generally produce a scarcity of provisions. The late war operated in this country as an embargo. What was the effect? The spirit of agriculture became torpid; the plow slept in the furrow. Let us for a moment cast an eye on the history of cities and nations. They have risen into greatness or sunk into obscurity, according to the measure of their commerce. By the creative power of foreign commerce, Palmyra and Alexandria arose out of sandy deserts, and Venice out of the sea. By the same power we have seen nations become wealthy and numerous.

If we agree that industry, population, and wealth, are promoted by foreign commerce, it will certainly be granted that our commerce should be managed by native citizens. In order to secure a sufficient number of seamen, we should make it the interest of every master or owner of a vessel to have one or more apprentices. For this purpose, it may be proper to impose a small additional duty of tonnage on every American bottom, perhaps one cent per ton may be sufficient. A drawback of ninety per cent of this duty may be allowed, to such vessels as are navigated by a certain number of apprentices, native citizens of the United States, according to their several burdens. I have mentioned ninety per cent, because it may be proper that a small portion of this duty should pass to a separate account that shall presently be mentioned. The amount of domestic tonnage for the last year was $504,900, at six cents per ton, this giving $30,294; hence it will follow, that one additional cent per ton would produce $5,049. The amount is small, perhaps it should be doubled.

While I am recommending the increase of American seamen, I should not do justice to my own feelings, if I did not recommend another measure that is equally connected with commerce. I mean a general provision for sick and infirm seamen. I do not contemplate the building of two or three great houses in some of our principal cities; houses that might administer to the vanity of a nation, rather than to the general comfort of sick and infirm sailors. I would consult the cause of humanity, not of pride.

Wherever it is probable that sailors may be sick, there I would make provision for their support and comfort. Hospitals should be erected, or lodgings hired, as the case may be, at every port of entry in the United States for sick and infirm seamen, where they may be properly attended during their several indispositions. The money to be collected at the several ports as hospital money, should be expended at such port, and at no other place, under the care of such persons as may be described for that purpose. Let a small deduction be made from the wages of every seaman, to be paid at the several ports of entry for their use. I have mentioned a deduction from their wages, because this mode of raising hospital money would probably be most acceptable, and because it is certainly the most equitable tax that can be levied.

It will readily be perceived, that the two subjects I have mentioned are nearly allied. While we attempt to increase the number of native seamen for the extension of commerce and general prosperity of agriculture, we should be solicitous to protect and cherish this useful class of our fellow-citizens. The direct tendency of the additional tonnage, is to increase the number of apprentices, and if this measure should have the desired effect, the greater part of that duty will be discharged in drawbacks. A small portion of the duty will be retained according to the plan mentioned, and some owners, less careful, will occasionally pay the whole duty. Perhaps the product of the additional cent may be $1,000 per annum. This balance may very properly be applied towards a fund for sick and infirm seamen. This fund, however, being contingent, and at most very inadequate to the general use of seamen, it may be necessary to make a small stoppage of their wages as a uniform and certain fund for the support of those very persons when they are sick.

Such are the outlines of two bills that I would recommend to the attention of this House. If I have viewed these subjects in a more serious light; if I have been more anxious than other members to bring them before the House, the situation of my constituents, and the laws of our State, will be my excuse. That part of North Carolina in which I live, abounds in navigable waters, many of my fellow-citizens are owners of vessels, and many go to sea.

The Legislature of North Carolina, attentive to the wants and desires of the people, have lately passed a law to raise money by a tax on the wages of seamen, for the support of sick and infirm seamen. This is a sufficient proof of their desire to cherish commerce, and give particular assistance to those useful members of the community.

I shall now take the liberty of moving that committees may be appointed to bring in bills for the purposes mentioned.

Mr. WILLIAMSON, Mr. LAURANCE, Mr. GOODHUE, Mr. BENJAMIN BOURNE, and Mr. BARNWELL, were appointed to prepare and bring in the same.

THE PUBLIC DEBT.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Speech of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES to both Houses of Congress:

On that part which relates to the reduction of the Public Debt, Mr. FITZSIMONS offered a resolution to the following purport:

Resolved, As the opinion of this Committee, that measures for the reduction of so much of the public debt as the United States have a right to redeem, ought to be adopted; and that the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report a plan for the purpose."

Mr. MADISON wished for information before he could agree to the motion just made. The exact state of our finances he conceived necessary to be well known before measures were taken for the reduction of the debt. The House of Representatives had already unequivocally expressed their sentiments on the subject, in their answer to the PRESIDENT'S Speech; but it was not time, he conceived, for the adoption of measures with a view to realize what appeared to be the general wish, until the information on which those measures were to be grounded was received.

Mr. FITZSIMONS argued, that the motion, if adopted, would call forth the information necessary to ground a final measure upon. The recommendation from the PRESIDENT was strong, and the answer of the House as positive; no difference of opinion, he therefore supposed, could exist as to the propriety of reducing the debt. The United States had paid a valuable consideration for the right of reducing it, and the first opportunity of making use of that right, he conceived the best.

Mr. WILLIAMSON was of opinion that information would come in of course. The PRESIDENT, he suggested, no doubt was acquainted with the situation of the revenue, when he recommended the reduction of the debt at the present time. He should be in favor of the motion. He declared it as his opinion, that our public debt was our most dangerous enemy; he wished it could be reduced twice as fast; the irredeemable quality of part of it he much disliked.

Mr. MADISON again expressed it as his opinion that information should form the basis of any provision for the reduction of the debt. If the motion was carried, information no doubt could be obtained before the final adoption of any measure; but he insisted on the necessity of making that information the groundwork of any proceeding on so important a subject.

Mr. MERCER.—No question, he conceived, was of more importance than that involved in the motion before the House. He wished for time to make up his mind on it. It involved one question which had occasioned very warm debate in the House, and which was decided but by a small majority: he alluded to the reference made last session to the Secretary of the Treasury. He conceived it improper to commit to any man what he was bound himself to do. He conceived the power of the House to originate plans of finance, to lay new burdens on the people intrusted to them by their constituents, as incommunicable. As to the main object of the motion, he rather doubted the propriety of adopting, at present, a premature system for the reduction of the public debt. The House, he said, stood in a very delicate situation. A fuller representation will shortly succeed the present. He saw a propriety in making a temporary provision to redeem, in order to secure the right of reducing in future. He hoped the House would consent to a delay of a day or two, when members would be better prepared.

The Public Debt.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, conceived, that as the motion had been made and seconded, some decision must be obtained on it, or that the Committee must rise. He saw no good reason for leaving it to a future House to adopt a permanent plan of reduction. If it was now thought too early a period to accomplish so desirable an object, it would be a good reason for deferring it; but if it was full time, measures for that purpose should be adopted; they should go forward. If the gentleman required further time to make up his mind, the Committee might rise, and sit again in a day or two.

He next made some reply to the objections of the gentleman last up, to that part of the motion which contemplated a reference to the Secretary of the Treasury. The ultimate decision, he remarked, in no one point, was relinquished by such a reference. If such a reference was unconstitutional, he observed, much business had been conducted in the House in an unconstitutional manner, by repeated references to the Heads of Departments. The reference of business to select committees would be unconstitutional, he said, on the same ground.

Turning on the main question—the House, he conceived, were in possession of information already, that would warrant a beginning in the work of reducing the public debt. From the report of the Trustees of the Sinking Fund, read in the morning, it appeared that they had funds remaining in their hands.

The House had pledged themselves, in their answer to the PRESIDENT'S Address, to proceed on the task: now to refer the subject to a future Congress, would appear like great reluctance to go into the measure, and would argue great unsteadiness. The system to be adopted for the purpose contemplated, could not, he conceived, be attempted, in the first instance, in so large a body as a Committee of the Whole House. He hoped the question on the motion would obtain a decision at the present time; but if the gentleman persisted in requesting a delay, he wished the Committee to rise, and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. SEDGWICK conceived, the House did not need any more information than they were in possession of, to see the propriety of adopting immediate measures for the reduction of the debt. The United States, it was evident, he said, are paying more than the market interest upon their debt. It sells above par, and, considering the rate at which loans can be obtained in Europe on the credit of the United States; that mode of reducing the debt was, he said, incontrovertibly eligible. It would be economical for an individual, in similar circumstances, to effect a reduction; and the case was the same, the United States being in the place of that individual. It was agreed to in the House, he said, and re-echoed out of doors, that a public debt was a public evil; it was the duty, therefore, of the Representatives of the people, to use all the means in their power, whenever opportunity offered, to reduce it.

He made some observations on the propriety of referring the subject to the Secretary, for information and his opinion; and concluded by declaring, that, viewing the main question as he first stated, he could not see any necessity in deferring a question on the motion.

Mr. MERCER expressed some surprise at the disinclination some gentlemen appeared to show to a full discussion on so important a subject. He again objected to a reference. That mode of conducting business in the House, he said, had given very general dissatisfaction. The mode was adopted by a small majority. The House had received, since its adoption, an accession of new members; besides, since, every member had mixed with his constituents, and opinions might consequently have varied since that time. For his part, he said, he should pay great and implicit regard to the opinion of his constituents.

He again adverted to the nature of the trust reposed in the House by the Constitution, in originating money bills, &c., and dwelt on the true import of the word originate, which he conceived could not be explained away, so as to warrant a reference. Besides, he argued, is not a body selected from millions of the people more adequate to the task of originating than a single man?

He hoped that respect to the PRESIDENT'S recommendation would never make the House inattentive to the great interests of the people. The PRESIDENT'S Address had not been so long before the House, as that a short delay should argue disrespect. But the PRESIDENT, in his Address, did not, he said, recommend a reference to the Secretary.

He was willing to give a decision on the first part of the motion, though he would prefer a delay of a day or two; if this, however, was not granted, he should call, he said, for a division of the question. He again adverted to the propriety of taking advantage of the redeemable quality of our debt as soon as possible; observing that the next term of payment of interest came round with the new year.

Mr. FITZSIMONS observed, that he was in the minority on the question adverted to by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MERCER;] that he had not since altered his opinion upon that subject, but considered the present reference as very different from the former, and entirely within the letter and spirit of the act for establishing the Treasury Department. He did not believe it would be necessary to impose additional burdens, to effect a reduction of the debt. He believed that the existing finances, assisted by a foreign loan, would enable the United States to accomplish the object. As to the reports from the Treasury or other officers, they will stand on their own merits. If they are bad, they will be rejected.

Mr. MADISON drew a distinction between the deliberative functions of the House and the ministerial functions of the Executive powers. The deliberative functions, he conceived, should be first exercised before the ministerial began to act. It should be decided by the House, in the first instance, he conceived, whether the debt should be reduced by imposing new taxes, or by varying the burdens, or by new loans. The fundamental principles of any measure, he was of opinion, should be decided in the House, perhaps even before a reference to a select committee. He did not pretend to determine whether the motion now before the House might not involve a reference of a ministerial nature merely. But he well knew, he said, that the act establishing the Treasury Department had been so construed as to give it a greater latitude than was contemplated when the law passed, much against the opinion of a great portion of the people. In the infancy of our Government, that latitude perhaps might be necessary; but he saw no necessity for it at present.

H. OF R.]

The Public Debt.

Mr. PAGE opposed a division of the question, as precluding debate. He wished the motion amended, by striking out the last part.

Mr. FINDLEY was against a reference to the Secretary of the Treasury of a matter which, he conceived, was made the exclusive business of the House by the Constitution.

Mr. MERCER expressed himself in favor of striking out the last part of the motion.

Mr. HILLHOUSE was of a different opinion. His constituents, he conceived, expected their business to be done in the best manner possible, and that he should not rely on his own information only, but endeavor to avail himself of the information of others. He said he should consider himself unequal to the task of taking a share in legislating for the Union, if he was to depend on his own information alone. He expected to derive information from every source. It was the intention of meeting in Congress to collect information from every quarter.

He should despise any one, he said, he should despise himself, if he thought his judgment could be improperly influenced by any plan reported by any of the Heads of Departments. If any system originating with the Head of a Department, appeared the best that could be devised, it should meet the approbation of the House; but if any amendment was thought of, it was the duty of the House to adopt or reject it, according to its merits. He considered reports in the light of information, and dwelt on the necessity of receiving information from every quarter. He was against striking out.

Mr. FINDLEY was in favor of striking out. He was a friend to information, he said, but the reports from Heads of Departments he did not consider in the light of information merely. It was information, and plans built on that, and those plans supported by arguments.

Though a law, he said, had made it the province of the Secretary of the Treasury to report those plans, the Constitution had not enjoined the House to refer; and he hoped the House, being the masters of their own proceedings, would originate such measures themselves. The House had a right to, and, he conceived, should call for what information was wanted to enable them to digest their own plans.

Mr. MURRAY observed, that the debate on the propriety of referring to the Secretary of the Treasury the business contemplated in the motion, had produced but few new arguments; it was a repetition of what was said when the subject was before the House at another time. One new idea, however, he observed, had fallen from the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MADISON,] viz: his distinction between deliberative and ministerial functions. This distinction, he conceived, is qualified by the nature of things. It is qualified, in this instance, by the law which establishes the Treasury Department. That law makes it the duty of the Secretary to digest and report plans to ameliorate our finances, without any call from the House. True, the business of the House is to deliberate; but, by references, neither is the power of the House to deliberate infringed, nor does it give the Secretary a right legislatively to deliberate, but to deliberate ministerially; and it was important, he conceived, in a Government framed like ours, that such officers should have the power to deliberate in that manner. The result of their deliberations was not obligatory on the House, no further than it was warranted by wisdom. He was averse to striking out; was willing to allow further time for consideration. He should like to see, for his own part, a statement of the revenue. He again expressed it as his firm opinion that a report from the Head of a Department could no further influence the House than by the weight of the wisdom it contained. Whenever ministerial influence, he observed, was felt in the House, otherwise than by weight of wisdom, it would but little matter, he conceived, whether Secretaries had it in their power to report plans or not. Reports, he conceived, would never have an improper influence, as long as the Legislature preserved their character for wisdom and integrity.

The information derived from the Head of a Department could never, he suggested, be obtained in a more proper manner, than by making it the foundation of deliberation. Supposing the House should undertake to originate without this previous step, and a difficulty should occur for want of information; it would be, he conceived, derogatory to the dignity of the House to apply then to the Secretary for assistance, and more dangerous to proceed in error or ignorance. He rather wished for a short delay; but, if the question was urged, he should certainly vote, he said, against striking out.

Mr. MADISON saw some difficulty in drawing the exact line between subjects of legislative and ministerial deliberations, but still such a line most certainly existed. Gentlemen who argued the propriety of calling on the Secretary for information, plans, and propositions, involved the propriety of permitting that officer, in the shape of a plan or measure, to propose a new tax, and say whether it should be a direct or indirect one. Yet, if it was proposed directly to give this power to the Secretary, few members, he believed, would agree to it. He was in favor of striking out.

Mr. GERRY said, that while the law establishing the Treasury Department was under consideration, he had opposed that part of the bill which gave the Secretary power to propose to the House a tax, and a plan to carry it into execution. He conceived such a power contrary to the principles of the Constitution. This power is, however, involved in that part of the law which authorizes him to propose, without being called on, plans for the support of credit, for the reduction of the public debt, &c. The Secretary, nevertheless, knowing probably that that power, granted him by the law, was looked upon with a jealous eye by many members of the House, has never exercised it.

He, however, was not averse to referring the object of the motion to the Secretary. He saw an impossibility, if taken up in Committee of the Whole, in rendering the intended measure an uniform part of the great financial whole. The clashing of various opinions would prevent it. If the influence of the Secretary was formidable, he conceived it would be much more dangerous if exerted against a select committee, than in the whole House. He hoped the last part of the resolution would not be struck out.

On motion, the Committee rose, reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

TUESDAY, November 20.

On a motion made and seconded that there be allowed to Joseph Henderson — per annum, in compensation for his services as Naval Paymaster to the Navy Board, for the Eastern Department, from the 5th day of August, 1778, to — 1782—

Ordered, That the said motion, together with the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the petition of the said Joseph Henderson, which was made to this House on the 30th of April last, be referred to the consideration of a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

A memorial of William Constable and Company, merchants of the city of New York, was presented to the House and read, praying to be allowed the amount of the drawback on a quantity of teas exported from the port of New York, and duly landed in the port of Dunkirk, in France, in the year 1790, of which they are possessed of sufficient evidence, although not in the form prescribed by law.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, with instruction to examine the same, and report his opinion thereupon to the House.

THE MILITIA LAW.

A motion was made and seconded, that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill to amend the Militia law passed last session.

Mr. LIVERMORE rose to inquire, what particular part of the law was the object of the resolution?

Mr. MURRAY explained. He informed the House that it had special reference to the clause which respects arming the Militia. He said, the injunctions of the law, in this particular, imposed equal burdens, on shoulders infinitely disproportioned as to their capacity to sustain them; it enjoins duties on the major part of the Militia, of such a nature, as renders the law totally impracticable. A man not worth one farthing, is subjected to the same expense with one who may be worth ten thousand pounds a year; the inequality, evident in the operation of such a requisition, is a glaring instance of injustice, and calls loudly for Legislative interposition and relief. He adverted to the particular situation of the State of Maryland, to show the impracticability of carrying the law into execution in that part of the Union.

Mr. WILLIAMSON suggested an alteration in the resolution: It would be better, in his opinion, to have it read, a bill to amend the Militia law. He moved for this alteration. Mr. W. observed, that he thought the law susceptible of several amendments; but with respect to the objection of the gentleman from Maryland, he said it applied with equal force to many other parts of the law, particularly with regard to the general performance of Militia duty.

Mr. LIVERMORE stated some objections to the indefiniteness of the resolution.

Mr. GREENUP observed, that he had seconded the motion of the gentleman from Maryland, because he thought many parts of the law might be amended in such manner, as to make it more applicable to the circumstances of the State of Kentucky; which, from its peculiar situation, could not derive those advantages from the law, which other parts of the Union might; the want of which were sensibly felt. He preferred adopting the words to amend, in lieu of "supplementary."

Mr. HILLHOUSE objected to the motion. He thought that competent relief, in the case complained of, might be obtained from the State Legislature. He added, that the law had scarcely got into operation; some of the States have made provision to carry it into execution; others are about doing the same; and he doubted the policy exceedingly of taking any steps in the matter, before any experience of the law has been had.

Mr. FRIZZIMONS offered some remarks of a similar nature.

Mr. MERCER supported the motion. He urged a variety of reasons to show the importance of taking immediate measures to amend and ameliorate the law; if this is not done, he said, it will sanction the idea, already entertained by many of the respectable citizens of the Union, that there is a disinclination on the part of many members of the Legislature, to provide for an effective Militia—that a necessity may be induced for a standing army. He adverted to the injustice of the requisition, which enjoins, that a man who is not worth twenty shillings should incur an expense of twenty pounds in equipping himself as a Militia man.

Mr. MURRAY's motion, for a committee, was negatived; fourteen members only rising in the affirmative.

THE PRESIDENT'S SPEECH.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Speech of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES to both Houses of Congress.

Mr. BALDWIN expressed reluctance in being obliged to rise on the present occasion, but the striking out the latter part of the proposition became indispensable, in order to defeat the dangerous doctrine of precedents, and prevent a future plea on the ground of construction. He was aware of the consequences, and that the practice, unless it should be relinquished, would lead to no good. It has been too common, when a certain object is to be carried—to avoid the defeat which a direct attack might produce—to wind round, in order to make its attainment the more certain, by gradual approaches. By one motion, made on doubtful ground, supported by arguments applying to its particular nature, keeping the doubtful tendency out of sight, one step, by the success of the first motion, is made over the true line; another motion follows, backed by the first as a precedent, and a further encroachment is effected, till when it becomes evident, by such gradual encroachments, that they are advancing to dangerous ground; but then, to excuse a further trespass, precedents innumerable, the general nature of which (although hitherto kept out of sight) now become a strong argument against receding.

When gentlemen talk of light and information only, he would agree with them, for he wished to obtain it from every proper source. It has been made the duty of the Executive Departments to give information to the Legislature, but this information should relate, merely, in his opinion, to statements of facts and details of business, but the laws should be framed by the Legislature, after they had acquired this information.

He wished that it might be explicitly and finally determined how far the Legislative business should be solely transacted by the Legislature, and how much be referred to Executive Departments. He conceived there was a solid difference of opinion in the House, on this point, as well as out of doors. Some persons conceive that the more of the affairs of society that are thrown into the hands of individuals, there will be the greater security against error. Whilst, on the other hand, there were many who entertained a contrary opinion, that there is less danger of passion influencing large Legislative bodies, and that the clashing of interests amongst them is a security against partial and improper bias, at the same time that it keeps them more free.

He did not mean to criminate the Treasury Department, but certainly the law which establishes it, is couched in such general language as to afford a latitude for the introduction of new systems, such as were never expected by the Legislature.

He had frequently, on former occasions, remarked, and now repeated it, that the whole of this mode was introduced under cover of referring the petition of the Pennsylvania public creditors (whilst Congress sat at New York) to the Secretary of the Treasury, with directions to report a plan respecting the public credit. But few of the members then suspected, or indeed entertained an idea, that that reference should have produced the plan of the Funding System, or that the Excise would be the consequence.

The impost system which the House originated previous to those plans, was framed upon very different grounds: first principles were adverted to; information was collected from all parts, with great labor. Had the Treasury Department been established then, this information might have been procured with less trouble; but this once collected, the Legislature made use of it, and framed a law, the formation of which has not been unfavorably considered. There is a material distinction between receiving information on which to ground a law, and a plan of the law ready formed. The latter mode he was opposed to. Gentlemen have said that we may reject what is proposed; but in this case we will only be exercising a sort of revisionary power, very different from a Legislative one; a very material difference from what is contemplated in the Constitution—the difference between originating and possessing only the right of a negative.

The House have as much power over the proceedings of the Senate, as over the plan of a law reported by the Secretary. There is but this difference between the cases, that the plans of the Secretary are well supported by argument. And it is to be presumed that he must have been strongly attached to these forms; they had become children of his mind; and it would be found hard to make him change an opinion of a system which he had spent so much time in maturing, although we should conceive them to be originated against the first principles of Government. Indeed, it is a principle itself, that the Legislative and Executive Departments should be kept as far distant as possible. We, whose privilege it is to originate the laws, should have no remote view of advantage. Although it is difficult to amend the defective parts in a complicated system without endangering the uniformity of the whole, yet it is less difficult to put together the parts from collected materials, and to amend a plan before it has been matured.

The objections which he at first entertained to this method of calling for matured plans from the Heads of Departments, were growing every day stronger in his mind. The propriety of keeping the Legislative, Judicial, and Executive powers distinct from each other, is founded in good sense. It is dangerous to intrust those who have a prospect of deriving some advantage in the execution of a law, to have any hand in framing it. And it is as improper for the Legislative to attend to the execution of a law, as it is for the Executive to meddle in the business of legislation. The principle, if once admitted, may be carried to such lengths as to admit the Judiciary to sit in the House of Representatives; and we shall have them here, in their long robes, introducing plans of laws, with the Secretaries of the Treasury and War Departments. The strong sense he had of the necessity of keeping the Departments distinct, had such force upon his mind as to occasion his opposition even to the introduction of the two Secretaries, the other day, to answer interrogatories in the House. Such a precedent, he feared, might prove a dangerous one, and lean to an interference in more important points. He confessed, however, that in some instances the different Departments of Government must necessarily, in some degree, be blended; but he insisted that they should be kept separate as much as possible.

Some gentlemen have gone so far as to intimate that the barrier between them is chiefly theoretical, that it is only a paper barrier. To be sure, said he, the barrier laid down in the Constitution for the separation of the Departments, is not a fence to keep out wild beasts, nor a ditch against a savage enemy, nor even like the wall of China, to keep out the Tartars; yet it is not so theoretical as not to be explicitly understood, and we ought to make it as strong and impregnable as if it were a mound.

Experience is strongly in favor of this principle. Both modes of originating laws have been tried; but that system which originated in the House, according to his opinion, had sat well on the feelings of the people, whose interests and wishes, joys and sorrows, must be better known to their Representatives than it is possible for any Executive officer to be acquainted with, in so extensive a country. Had the same principle been followed in the originating of the Excise law, as was in the Impost, it would most probably have sat better upon the people. His constituents, he contended, had a right to have their feelings represented; and if he found it impracticable to make their voice heard, and sentiments understood with effect in the House, he should consider it his duty to try another mode of forwarding their interests. He would go to where systems originated, and there he would thrust in what information an acquaintance with his constituents put him in possession of, and demand it as a right that their feelings should be consulted. He knew it would be answered, that information was received at the Treasury by private letters and by private conversations. But this was often deceitful information; he knew it to be so in many instances, and that that persons who gave this information would not have readily owned it amongst their neighbors, who might consider that their legal Representatives were the only true sources from which information, concerning their wants or desires, should be derived. If any other mode shall be pursued, it cannot come to good. Upon the whole, he was against the reference, and wished that part of the motion to be struck out.

Mr. WHITE was of the same opinion with Mr. BALDWIN, and spoke against the unqualified practice of giving such extensive powers to the Secretary of the Treasury. The House which will succeed the present will condemn those measures, and he foresaw all these dangers in the second session of the First Congress; that there would hardly be an object of taxation, but what might be thrown into the hands of the Secretary to manage. Indeed, the power given to that officer exceeds the whole powers possessed by the Senate, for their plans do not come accompanied with the improper influence of lengthy argument. He wished, if it were possible, that the House might be left to exercise their own judgments, and that the Secretary should be restricted to the more Executive part of the business of managing the revenue after, and not before, it has been established by the Legislature.

Mr. GILES was sorry to hear this old contest again agitated. He was also against the reference, and lamented the wrong construction which had been put upon the Constitution. He also declared it to be his opinion, that some of the measures recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury discovered a princely ignorance of the country, for the wants and wishes of one part had been sacrificed to the interest of the other.

Mr. MURRAY was in favor of the reference.

Mr. GERRY also spoke for it. He read the bill for establishing the Treasury Department, from which he argued that the House was bound, that it was their duty, to refer to the Secretary for plans, &c., and he saw no cause for jealousy, or for any faction to be raised against that officer.

Mr. MERCER expressed much astonishment that the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts should suggest an idea that a faction (as he termed it) could exist in that House against the Secretary of the Treasury; his native manliness of character must have fled before he could admit so humiliating a position. That mind must be degraded within, it must have been sensible of a degradation without, before it could so far relinquish the self-love and self-esteem ingrafted in our natures, as to descend into a faction against a Secretary. As a citizen of the United States, he felt and acknowledged inferiority to no created being. As one of their Representatives in the Supreme Legislative Council, he considered himself in a situation more responsible, and invested with an authority more important and dignified than that of any Secretary whatever. And whatever might be the opinions of other gentlemen, these impressions should accompany him through every stage of his political conduct; and they would justify the uniform perseverance with which he had and should continue to preserve the full and entire exercise of the powers vested in him by the Constitution. The honorable gentleman had cited a law to enforce this reference. If this was the case, they had no power to deliberate. This surely must be admitted and be unconstitutional. No former Congress could deprive themselves and their successors of this most important of all their powers, and render themselves the cyphers and instruments of an individual. If it gave the Secretary the exclusive right to originate, it was waste paper, it was nugatory and void; if it did not, he did not see why it should be urged. If it was not wholly exclusive, it ought not to be partially so; for by parting with the power by a reference, it could not be again taken up until a report, which could never make its appearance until accommodated to the wishes of a majority. Those who did not participate in this out-of-doors legislation, were excluded from all the benefits of Government, for a majority once agreed, no representations could break or alter it. He thought himself authorized to say so, from the principles and theory of human nature, and from the practice of the House. But, to lay aside (as he ought to do) cotemporary exposition, and to expound the law by the Constitution, he thought he could reconcile them. The Constitution had divided the delegated powers of the people among the three branches, Legislative, Executive, and Judiciary, neither of which could alter or transfer the powers so vested. The Legislative was the first, and the source which brought into activity the other two. The law must be made by them; it must be expounded and supplied by the Judiciary, and executed by the Executive; the two last, by the nature of things, flow from, and so far are dependent on the first, as the only source. Thus the Constitution speaks of Heads of Departments and inferior tribunals: it does not describe their duties; when the Legislature describes their duties, they must be expounded as Executive or Judiciary duties, accordingly as they may respect or appertain to either branch. The Heads of the Departments are the inferior organs of the Executive power. The Constitution permits the head of that branch to propose plans; it may be proper, then, that the different Secretaries may prepare such plans as are within their respective Departments, which the Chief Magistrate may propose to the Legislature, if he sees fit; and when so done, it is constitutional, and the Legislature may, or may not, at their discretion, take them up. Any other exposition is unconstitutional and idle. They are also the expositions of the documents and information that arise in the administration of Government which this House may require of the Executive Magistrate, and which he will communicate as he sees fit. The House may go too far in asking information. He may constitutionally deny such information of facts there deputed as are fit to be communicated and may assist in legislation I always wish for. But I want no opinions resulting from him. If they are to influence me, they are wrong; if not to influence, they are useless. This mode of procedure, of originating laws with the Secretary, destroys all responsibility; it throws it on a man not elected by the people, and over whom they have no control. Men will go in a crowd, and glide down a current, embarked in a system which no one of them would have dared to propose. That practice has proved the theory, let the Executive law evince. Originating with the Secretary, it met little opposition; and I do not believe that any one member, relying on his individual responsibility to his constituents, would have openly, in this House, originated the design. A cavil, however, is raised on that part of the Constitution which confines the originating money bills to this House exclusively. It is said, by some, a bill is not originated until it has passed the House. Suppose a bill goes through one or two readings here, and is rejected on a third; will any man say, such a bill never originated? Surely the first application of general principles to a particular subject, is the origination, and no subsequent stage can be affixed. Some say the Secretary's Reports are like Smith's Treatise on the Wealth of Nations. We do not come here to go to school, or hear lectures from the Secretaries on finance or any other subject. It would be waste of time to repeat arguments so often and so ably urged. I neither expect nor wish more than temporary expedients from the present representation. I look to the succeeding session, when ultimate and final arrangements, remedying the injustice of the present funding systems and concomitant evils, will take place.

After a few words from Mr. BALDWIN and Mr. PAGE, the question for striking out the latter part of the resolution was called for, and there rose in the affirmative 25, and 31 in the negative.

The Committee then rose, reported the resolution, and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, November 21.

A petition of Thomas Faulkner and Edward Faulkner was presented to the House and read, praying that compensation may be made to them out of the unappropriated lands in the Western country, for the quantity to which they are entitled, as refugees from Nova Scotia, under a resolution of the late Congress, of the 13th of April, 1785.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the Secretary of War, with instruction to examine the same, and report his opinion thereupon to the House.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill or bills to establish a uniform system on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States; and that Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, Mr. BOUDINOT, Mr. LAURANCE, Mr. WHITE, and Mr. GERRY, be the said committee.

THE MILITIA LAW.

Mr. MURRAY called for the resolution which he laid on the table yesterday, "that a committee be appointed to repeal that clause of the Militia law which relates to the arming the Militia:" this being read—

Mr. MURRAY said he still had hopes, though his first motion had failed. The present motion was to repeal the clause which he hoped to prove obnoxious. As it was more limited than the former one, and as he did not mean by this to go into a general revision of the whole law, but confine the repeal and substitute to the arming clause, he imagined many gentlemen would support his intentions, who yesterday were averse to opening the whole law to revision. The clause in question was obnoxious to his constituents; a late and most intimate knowledge of his district had enabled him with great confidence to say so; and he had reason to believe that unless an alteration in the law took place, no act of the Legislature of Maryland would give it the desired operation in that State. The clause was disagreeable to his constituents, because it was oppressive in principle and impracticable in its operation. It was a principle of political justice, which no occasion could dispense with, that protection and taxation should be commensurate. That wherever a tax was levied for the protection of society, its apportionment among individuals should be as exactly as possible correspondent with the property of each individual. There is so much justice in this, that he did not suppose it would be

The Militia Law.

controverted. The oppression that will be felt in the operation of this clause, flows from the violation of that principle. The obligation to arm in a particular manner, as it will produce a uniform expense on men of unequal property, will prove a tax that will act unjustly, because unequally—men will not pay agreeably to their property. To illustrate this is easy, and the plainest mode of showing the truth. By the law, he who has passed his forty-fifth year is exempt from militia duty. It must often happen that men of large fortune will thus contribute nothing towards this species of protection, while the man of very small fortune will be obliged to furnish largely to it, if the father of a family, capable and of age to bear arms. For the sake of harmony and a ready disposition to fall into a patriotic impulse, he much doubted whether his constituents would have murmured much at the violation of the principle; but the impracticability of this clause obliges them to seek relief through their Representatives. The law, in the district he came from, he much feared could not be executed. Each militia-man is to come into the field with a musket or firelock, a bayonet, cartridge-box, and other equipments. These, he verily believed, could not be had. If the citizens—even those who would think lightly of the burden—could not procure these accoutrements, the law must be violated. Congress, he hoped, would not force his well-inclined fellow-citizens to violate the law; but if the law could not possibly be executed, because impracticable, the Legislature would be answerable for the indignities it brought upon itself, by thus prescribing unnecessary hardships. It was, then, to shield Congress, and the dignity of legislation, from the shame of imposing impossible obligations, as well as to redress the citizen, that he wished the clause altered. Several modes presented themselves. The most obvious is, the furnishing of the arms at the public expense; and another is, the furnishing of the arms to such as might, in the opinion of certain officers, be too poor conveniently to find them. Congress might leave it with either the officers of the militia, or with the deputy marshals. The disposition once felt to relieve, would presently designate its mode of accomplishing redress. Fines, too, would prove a perpetually accumulating fund, which could in a few years either be applied to the further purchase of arms, and further exoneration of the poorer class, who might not fall within the idea of the most rigid poverty, or to a reimbursement of the public for the arms first purchased. At all events, it could do no harm to hear what a committee could report on this subject; and when the House reflected that this was the wish of a populous district, and he verily believed of the whole State of Maryland, he did not doubt of at least a sober regard to such claims. A matter of great importance it certainly was, that, as far as is consistent with the good of the whole, the interests and wishes of a part should be attended to. In this case, his constituents argued from no partial views or local motives, but from the fundamental principles of property and taxation, equally applicable to all who thought themselves aggrieved. He was convinced the clause in question was as impracticable as it was oppressive, and he hoped to have a committee appointed. He felt, that whatever might be the event, he had discharged the duty he owed to his fellow-citizens, and obeyed his own opinions.

Mr. WILLIAMSON strongly reprobated the idea of making the arming of the militia a public expense, as involving a most unequal and oppressive species of taxation, especially as it is conceded that more than one half of the militia are already armed.

Mr. KITTERA said he was opposed to the motion. By a calculation which he offered, he said, the expense of arming the militia at the public charge would amount to forty-two millions of dollars, rating the expense at £20 per man, according to the estimate of a gentleman from Maryland. He reprobated the idea of making any alteration in the law, before any experience of its effects had taken place.

Mr. MERCER supported the estimate he had made of the individual expense; and if it amounted, said he, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania has said, to forty-two millions of dollars, was the expense lessened by its being imposed in the most unequal and oppressive manner? He said he never had any idea of the Government's incurring such an expense. He had no conception of the policy of a militia amounting to seven hundred and fifty thousand men; he never wished to see a militia which should exceed thirty thousand. The plan of arming such an immense mass of militia was, in his opinion, the most absurd idea that could be imagined, and amounted to a relinquishment of all hope of an efficient militia.

Mr. PAGE was opposed to the motion. He objected particularly to Mr. MERCER's idea of arming so small a part of the militia, and pointed out the difficulties which would naturally take place in consequence of different principles being adopted in respect to the arming of the militia. He remarked that the difficulties which had presented themselves in the former discussion of this matter now occurred in full force, and would involve the House in all the perplexities which had heretofore attended the subject.

Mr. DAYTON made a few remarks on the motion. He was opposed to it, and reprobated in strong terms any plan of arming the militia which should give either the State or General Government a right to dispossess them of their arms on any occasion.

Mr. MURRAY added some further remarks, and then the question was determined in the negative; yeas 6, nays 50, as follows:

THE PRESIDENT'S SPEECH.

The House proceeded to consider the resolutions reported yesterday by the Committee of the Whole House on the Speech of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES; which were read, as follows:

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this committee that provision be made by law for the widows and orphans of those persons who may have been killed while under the protection of flags of truce to the Indian tribes.

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this committee that provision be made by law for the maintenance of the intercourse with foreign nations.

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this committee that measures ought to be taken for the redemption of so much of the public debt as by the act entitled 'An act making provision for the Debt of the United States' the United States have reserved the right to redeem; and that the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report a plan for that purpose.

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this committee that the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report the plan of a provision for the reimbursement of the loan made of the Bank of the United States, pursuant to the 11th section of the act entitled 'An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States.'

The first and second resolutions were severally again read, and, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

The third resolution being again read, a motion was made, and, the question being put to amend the same, by striking out the words "and that the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report a plan for that purpose"—

Mr. PAGE said a few words on the subject, and denied the charge which had been made by some members against others, when they termed their conduct ministerial opposition.

Mr. LAURANCE spoke for some time in reply to the arguments yesterday adduced by those who had called the mode of referring to the Heads of Departments unconstitutional. He insisted that there was nothing coming from the Secretary of the Treasury which partook of a Legislative quality; and, with regard to the plans heretofore proposed by that officer, he was of opinion that they had met with general approbation, and that they had materially assisted the credit of the United States. Before he sat down he took occasion to inform the House that it was not to be expected that the surplus of the revenue, mentioned by the Secretary in his report made at the opening of the present session, would be sufficient for the demands of Government for the year 1793. Other funds must be looked for. His reason for mentioning this was in order to bring the subject fairly before the House. With respect to the redemption of the public debt, he presumed every member in the House wished it to be accomplished as fast as possible. And the receiving information from the Secretary could not affect their judgments any more than a plan drawn up by the Clerk of the House could; they were always left free to adopt or reject those plans.

Mr. GERRY added a few remarks in favor of the reference.

Mr. FINDLEY was against it. He was one of those to whom the gentleman from New York alluded as wishing to redeem the debt as fast as possible, and also to receive information even from the Secretary of the Treasury; but I distinguish (said Mr. F.) between requiring information and transferring the power of originating revenue systems. Gentlemen say this is not a money bill, as it does not require a new tax. I consider every appropriation of revenue, or every change of appropriations, or uses of all the public money, to be of the same nature of a money bill, and the originating thereof equally the peculiar trust of this House; the Senate cannot originate in the one case more than in the other.

It is the constitutional duty of the President to inform the Legislature respecting the state of the Union, and to recommend such Legislative business as he may think expedient. The institutions of the Heads of the various Executive Departments are authorized in the Constitution, and have been organized by law. They are the proper Executive channels through which information respecting the execution and practical defects in the laws are to be collected, and with whom the necessary vouchers are deposited; and from those we have a right to call for such information as is necessary. This we not only admit, but advocate; yet gentlemen on the other side continually urge the necessity of information, as if we were opposed to the receiving of it. We are willing, nay, we are anxious to receive, every official information that is to be obtained from the Secretary; but we wish to make a more effective use of it—we wish to improve it in giving the first form to our revenue plans, according to the trust reposed in us. But the gentleman from New York and others say that referring to the Secretary for the organization of the revenue plans is not contrary to the Constitution, and calls upon us to prove that it is. I answer, that the right of transferring that power is not expressed in the Constitution; if so, I apprehend the burden of proof lies upon the gentlemen, and not upon us. The Constitution expressly defines the power of the Executive in giving information, recommending to the Legislature, and of exercising a limited negative upon the laws; it is of the nature of Executive power to be transferrable to subordinate officers; but Legislative authority is incommunicable, and cannot be transferred. To give the first form to revenue plans is a peculiar trust reposed in this House that we cannot transfer even to the Senate; and if that body were to propose a plan to us, we could not accept of it. This trust is peculiarly reposed in us, for obvious reasons, which I will not at this time detain the House with explaining. And indeed the constitutional principles involved in this question have been so very ably investigated already by several gentlemen, that more from me on that ground is not necessary; nor could I improve upon what they have expressed. But an argument of another kind has been frequently repeated, and much urged by the gentleman last up, [Mr. GERRY,] viz: that the law which organizes the Treasury Department has made this mode of originating business our duty; that breaking this law would be setting a dangerous example of disobedience to the citizens, &c. The law in question doubtless gives the Secretary a legal capacity of originating money bills, or plans, and makes it his duty when called upon. How far the law is right is another question. But does the law make it our duty to refer this subject to him? I trust not. Had the last House of Representatives a right to originate revenue systems before this transferring law was enacted? Surely not. Had the House of Representatives power to alienate or abridge our rights? This is the strange doctrine that is avowed, but it is equally extravagant and mistaken. This House has equal powers with that which the first House at any time possessed, and the next House will have as much as this. I have as much power as any other member ever had, and the exercise of that power is only subject to the control of the Constitution and the Rules of Order. Will the gentlemen say that I have not a right just now, or at any time, to propose a plan for the very object in question, or for any other revenue purpose? Yes, sir, I have; and if I have, every other member on this floor has; and if the members individually have the right of proposing an original plan, surely the House in its collective capacity has. It is the members of this House who are sworn to the discharge of this duty, and they only are responsible to their constituents. But we are told that referring to the Secretary renders him responsible. Some have said that it even involves the responsibility of the PRESIDENT. I have sometimes thought that the idea of responsibility was the political idol of the times; however, responsibility properly placed is one of the greatest securities in Government. In the Executive Department much of the duty as well as responsibility of office may be transferred or divided; but in the Legislature, where there can be no transfer of duty or trust, there can be no transfer of responsibility. How can a Secretary be responsible for originating either the substance or form of laws? To whom is he accountable for the discharge of this trust? Not to the PRESIDENT, (by whom he is appointed, and on whom only he is dependent for his continuance in office:) no, for this is not an Executive trust. He is not responsible to the people; he is neither intrusted nor chosen by them. He is not responsible to us, for he is not our officer. It is not he, but us, will bear the blame, while we boast of the security arising from responsibility; by improperly dividing Legislative business, we lose the advantages thereof.

The President's Speech.

[H. OF R.]

But, passing many arguments worthy of reply, I shall offer a few observations upon what has been much dwelt upon and so often repeated respecting the advantages and disadvantages of the different modes contended for. We are told that referring to the Secretary for revenue systems will secure public credit, by giving stability and system to our revenue, &c.; and the gentleman from New York has told us, that to this method of originating revenue laws, we are indebted for the advantages of our present situation; that we are indebted thereto for our prosperity and wealth. Certainly, if this is true, it proves too much. It proves that we are not capable of discharging the trust reposed in us; in short, that the Republican form of Government under which we are is not suitable for us; if so, it is better to change openly than in this indirect manner. But, Mr. SPEAKER, I ask, if, with all the increase of power and means possessed by the present Government, it is supposable that Congress would not have exercised the powers, nor applied the revenues to proper purposes? Would they have wholly overlooked the contracts and debts of the United States, if the Secretary had not originated the system? Surely this is not a supposable case. I wish he would give a few instances of what we could do; and if we did wrong, the gentlemen would be furnished with new arguments in favor of their plan.

But the same gentleman has told us that the Secretary, digesting the plan, has no more influence on the subject than our Clerk's inserting a clause in a bill would have; that they are equally under our control. I think this is not very consistent with the eminent advantages he has suggested that we have derived from the Secretary's origination of revenue plans. However, I apprehend the difference is very great. The Clerk is wholly dependent on us; he has no patronage, no means of influence annexed to his office, nor would he be permitted to intrude his arguments in support of his plans. But, sir, if we are not capable of giving the first form to our revenue systems without such aid, the better way would be to apply for such an amendment to the Constitution as would enable the House of Representatives to appoint an officer wholly dependent on themselves for that purpose. Surely this would be more proper than to employ an Executive officer over whom we have no official control.

Much has been said of the security arising from our own virtue and discernment being a security against undue influence. I have no doubt but the most venal public bodies would boast as much as we; but our own self-confidence will never justify us in breaking down the constitutional guards which suppose a possibility of undue influence, and provides against the appearance of it.

But we have been repeatedly charged by the gentleman from Massachusetts with endeavoring to introduce the confusion of the old Government. What confusion does the gentleman mean? Is it a confusion of powers? I grant that, though the old Congress did not possess power enough, yet it possessed, in a degree, every kind of power. This we certainly do not aim at; for it is an unauthorized exercise of this confusion of power which we oppose. However, that Government had no efficient revenue powers; and, by the restricted majority necessary to do business with them, and the bad attendance of members, they were perhaps necessarily induced to refer the originating of much of their business to the Boards who were Heads of Departments; from this source I believe it was that the practice was introduced by the new House of Representatives, though the circumstances and powers of the two bodies were essentially different. This method of referring I consider as a part of the confusion of the old Government, which I hope we will no longer tolerate. Surely this method of transferring so influential a part of our Legislative trust was not contemplated by the Convention which formed the Constitution, nor by the State Conventions which adopted it. It is not agreeable to the practice of the State Legislatures, which were the models of the Constitution of the Union: nor is it agreeable to the obvious design of the Constitution itself, or the impressions of the citizens.

Mr. LIVERMORE made some ingenious remarks upon this subject; amongst which, he said that if it was a violation of the Constitution to permit the Executive officers of Government to propose plans, then the President of the United States had been guilty of this breach. He argued ironically, but was against striking out the latter part of the motion.

Mr. GILES and Mr. LAURANCE each rose to explain certain points wherein they had respectively engaged in this debate.

Mr. AMES rose at a late hour in the debate, but before he would pretend to intrude upon the patience of the House, (a motion for taking the question being then under consideration,) he requested to know whether it was most agreeable to put the question? A general desire to hear his arguments, however, prevailed, and he proceeded nearly in substance as follows:

It is so fashionable to introduce the Funding System upon every occasion, it would perhaps appear strange to say that it is out of order upon any. To my mind, and probably to most gentlemen present, it will be difficult to perceive that the question before us bears any relation to that subject, or to the frontier bill, the excise; the perpetual taxes, the encouragement of manufactures, and many other topics, which, somehow or other, have been interwoven with the debate. At this late hour of the day, and in so wearisome a stage of the question, I may be permitted to decline any further notice of these auxiliary subjects.

The great end we have in view is the paying off the Public Debt. This object, truly important in itself, unites the best sense and strongest wishes of the country. It is our duty to provide means for the accomplishment of this end. All agree that a plan is necessary. It must be framed with wisdom and digested with care, so as to operate with the greatest effect, till the whole debt shall be extinguished. The true question is, Which is the best mode of framing this system? Several modes have been preferred by different persons.

Some advocate the appointment of a select committee of this House; others insist that the House in Committee of the Whole is the only proper mode; while others, who defend the original motion, desire to have a plan prepared and submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury. It may obviate the force of many of the arguments we have heard to remark, that it is not asserted that either of the several modes is intrinsically incapable of effecting the purpose. It would be improper to say that a select committee could not be formed who would be able to collect the materials for an exact knowledge of the subject, and who, after acquiring that knowledge, would be able to form a sound judgment. Neither would it be just nor respectful to deny, in the abstract, the capability of the House in Committee to digest such a plan. But the question still returns, Which of the three methods is the best to begin with? Neither this House nor a select committee are pretended to be already possessed of the knowledge which is requisite to the framing a system for a Sinking Fund. The very materials from which this knowledge is to be gleaned are not in the possession of this House—they are in the Treasury Department. Neither the curiosity nor the Legislative duty of members lead them to resort daily to the Treasury to investigate official details; and even if it were so, the officer at the Head of the Department, having his mind incessantly occupied with his official business, must be admitted to possess a more familiar and ready, if not a more ample, knowledge of the subject. Indeed, the situation of the Secretary of the Treasury is so evidently favorable to his digesting the plan of a Sinking Fund, that it seems unnecessary to urge it even to those who are opposed to the reference. For their objections imply the preference of the mode, in point of expediency, as strongly as those who explicitly recommend it. They say the plan of the Secretary will come forward with too much advantage. Members, say they, not having the aid of these means of information which the Secretary possesses, will not be able to resist the train of reasoning with which he will introduce his plan. It is even expressly admitted that the information of the Treasury Department is necessary, and must be called for; but they would not receive it with the reasoning of the Secretary. Without wasting time to prove this point, common sense will decide instantly that the knowledge of our financial affairs, and of the means of improving them, is to be obtained the most accurately from the officer whose duty it is made, by our own law, to understand them; who is appointed and commissioned for that very purpose; and to whom every day's practice in his office must afford some additional information of official details, as well as of the operation of the laws. The arguments on both sides end in the same point, that the information of the Secretary would be useful. Our object being to prefer that mode of preparing a plan which is adapted to present us the best, the argument might end here, if it were not that the Constitution is alleged to forbid our resorting to the Secretary. I reverence the Constitution, and I readily admit that the frequent appeal to that as a standard proceeds from a respectful attachment to it. So far it is a source of agreeable reflection. But I feel very different emotions when I find it almost daily resorted to on questions of little importance, when, by strained and fanciful constructions, it is made an instrument of casuistry. It is to be feared it may lose something in our minds in point of certainty, and more in point of dignity.

And what is the clause of the Constitution opposed to the receiving a plan of a Sinking Fund from the Secretary? Bills for raising revenue shall originate in this House. I verily believe the members of this House, and the citizens at large, would be very much surprised to hear this clause of the Constitution formally and gravely stated as repugnant to the reference to the Treasury Department for a plan, if they and we had not been long used to hear it.

To determine the force of this amazing constitutional objection, it will be sufficient to define terms. What is a bill? It is a term of technical import, and surely it cannot need a definition; it is an act in an inchoate state, having the form but not the authority of a law. What is originating a bill? Our Rules decide it. Every bill shall be introduced by a motion for leave, or by a committee.

It may be said the plan of a Sinking Fund, reported by the Secretary, is not in technical, or even in popular language, a bill—not by the Rules of the House or those of common sense is this motion the originating a bill. By resorting to the spirit of the Constitution, or by adopting any reasonable construction of the clause, is it possible to make it appear repugnant to the proposition for referring to the Secretary? The opposers of this proposition surely will not adopt a construction of the Constitution. They have often told us we are to be guided by a strict adherence to the letter; that there is no end to the danger of constructions. The letter is not repugnant; and will it be seriously affirmed that, according to the spirit and natural meaning of the Constitution, the Report of the Secretary will be a revenue bill, or any other bill, and that this proposition is originating such a bill? If it be, where shall we stop? If the idea of a measure which first passes through the mind be confounded with the measure subsequent to it, what confusion will ensue! The President, by suggesting the proposition, may as well be pretended to originate a revenue bill; even a newspaper plan would be a breach of the exclusive privilege of this House; and the liberty of the press, so justly dear to us, would be found unconstitutional. Yet, if, without any order of the House, the draft of an act were printed, and a copy laid before every member in his seat, no person will venture to say that it is a bill, that it is originated, or can be brought under the cognizance of the House, unless by a motion in conformity to the Rules and Orders. The Report of the Secretary in regard to manufactures, so often adverted to, has not yet been acted upon; does that appear on our Journals as a bill? Language has not yet been perverted to such a degree as to assert any such thing; and yet the constitutional objection implies opinions no less. I rely upon it, that neither the letter of the Constitution, nor any meaning that it can be tortured into, will support the objection which has been so often urged with solemn emphasis and persevering zeal.

If the Constitution be admitted, therefore, to authorize the reference to the Secretary, why should not the mode which is proved to be the most expedient be immediately adopted? Here we meet another objection. It is said, that the Legislative and Executive branches of Government are to be kept distinct, and this reference will produce an improper blending of them. It is a truth that these Departments are to be kept distinct; but the conclusion drawn from it is altogether vague. The execution of every trust requires some deliberation, and many of them call into action the highest powers of the human mind, and the most intense and persevering application of them; yet these trusts are to be Executively performed, and it by no means follows, that the officer charged with them invades the deliberative functions of Congress. On the other hand, many laws are the result of plain principles or parts of the Constitution, and Congress, by enacting them, only executes the Constitution. Yet, here is no encroachment upon the Executive branch. The truth is, the Constitution has allotted powers to the several branches of the Government, and by that rule we are to judge of their several limits. The President proposes measures to the Legislature, in conformity to the Constitution; yet no one ever supposed that his doing so is a departure from a just theory; nor has it, as far as I know, been ever insinuated till of late, in this or any other country, that the calling for information from officers, any more than the calling for testimony from witnesses, amounts to a transfer of our Legislative duty. It is very easy to conceive how much increased information may aid us in deliberating, but it is hard to discern how we are to profit by the want of it. It is true it is our peculiar province to deliberate, but neither the letter of the Constitution, nor the law establishing the Treasury Department, nor the reason of the case, have restrained us from calling for official information. It is not true in fact, that the deliberative and Executive Departments are blended by referring to the Secretary. Any objections deduced from an over-refining theory, and not warranted by the Constitution, might need an answer if we were now framing a Government, but can have no force in the administration of one. Indeed, it is a very scholastic, and very imposing mistake, to abandon the letter and meaning of the plan of Government we act under, and to undertake to reason independently, as if we were now settling the institutes of a political treatise.

The expediency of this question of referring to the Secretary, which is brought into dispute, involves many others which will admit of none. In framing the plan of a Sinking Fund is the officer at the head of our finances to have any agency? If it be said he is not, then, it may be demanded, why is an idle officer and an useless office kept up? The sense of mankind as well as the practice of nations, seems to show that where there are finances there should be a financier; that he should possess at least common talents, and more than common industry in the application of them to his duty.

The President's Speech.

This is not a point to be proved now for the first time. The law of the old Congress and their practice were conformable to this motion. We hear often of the people being opposed to these references. So far as I have been informed the opposition is a novelty. The law establishing the Treasury Department, passed by a great majority, expressly makes it the duty of the Secretary to prepare and report plans of finance. Scarce a whisper of objection was then heard in the House, and not one, I believe, in the country. Our own practice of referring has passed unresisted till of late. Gentlemen now opposed to this reference, in one instance, if I recollect rightly, referred to the Attorney General to revise a plan of the Judicial Department, and on another to require the Secretary of State to report on the means for improving our trade and navigation. These objects partake as much of legislation, and are as incommunicable as the subject of discussion. The former votes and arguments of gentlemen opposed to the present reference, afford some proof of its fitness as well as constitutionality.

The intrinsic reasonableness of this practice is not less than its authority from law and precedent, and what is more, the precedent of its opposers.

Private affairs prosper by skill, economy, and industry, in the management of them. The finances of a nation, though infinitely more important, require nothing more than economy upon a great scale. Let the moneyed affairs of a country be made everybody's business, and nobody will do it. Would you have them prosper, let them be confided to one man, who, however, shall be under the strict control of the law, and rigidly responsible for his doings. That man, if he loves an honest reputation as much as a man of common sense and feeling may be expected to do, will make the public business his own; he will put his character at risk: his time and all his talents will be devoted to the public. Such will be his dispositions; now what will be his opportunities to render service? He will have, at one view before him, the whole arrangements of finance: the imports and exports, the receipts and expenditures, the operation of the law, the means of improving it; the frauds committed or attempted on the revenue, and the checks to guard it: the well founded objections against the law and the prejudices which time or conciliatory conduct may efface, the appropriations of the revenue—the places where and terms on which loans may be obtained, as well as the state of foreign trade; the regulations of foreign nations, and perhaps it may be added, in subordination to the Chief Magistrate, the state of treaties and negotiations. It will be seen that the ordinary discharge of his duty, as well as that which will oblige him sometimes to conflict against prejudices, and sometimes against fraud, will render the details of finance familiar to him, and will almost force him

Is it to be denied that in consequence he will possess some means of information which this House or a committee must acquire only by slow and laborious investigation? In pursuing it the time might fail, and the materials get confused. Yet, allowing it effected, they have gained no more than it is his duty to furnish on the order of this House, and this is what we are contending for. If we call for it and he is not able to give it, we shall thus expose his incapacity or negligence. The public opinion, thus enlightened, will soon displace the officer, and a fitter man will succeed him. In this way, the people will exercise an effective control over their servants.

Be the information given by the officer what it may, the sources from which his inferences are drawn, his facts and reasonings, are publicly exposed. They are equally in possession of every member, who is thus placed on an equal, and on the best footing to attack or defend the report. As much cannot be said of the report of a select committee or a Committee of the Whole. It has been intimated, that in framing a report, the Secretary would be liable to misinformation, to some local or other attachments. This is possible, for he is a man; but will the Committee be free from it? The Secretary is answerable for his conduct to the nation, and certainly he is not more subject to local partialities than members are to their respective districts. The advantage of impartiality in the first concoction of a report seems to be evidently in favor of a reference.

It has been said, on the other side, information may be wanted, it is true, from the Secretary; but let the House first make progress in the business, and then receive it by a committee advising with the Secretary. If this may be done, what becomes of the constitutional difficulties and all we have heard of the transfer of our deliberative power?

But, if we are to have the official information, why should we set out without it? why should it not be given openly, so as to put all the members on an equality, and before prepossessions are formed with regard to plans, which might make a late report from the Treasury appear to come in aid of one party or another? Would the style of declamation be less vehement against the secret communications of a Secretary with the Committee, than against a report made in the face of day, and subject to the criticism not only of this House, but of an enlightened nation?

It is not my present design to ask for what purpose of argument or of candor it is so often insinuated, that the question really is, whether this House shall legislate, or whether it shall transfer the power of making laws to the Secretary of the Treasury?

With all this official information previously before us, are we less qualified or worse disposed to deliberate? It would be extravagant to affirm that, in proportion as our means of information are made complete, we are worse situated to legislate; and, as to the spirit of inquiry, I do not remember that the reports of the Secretary have blunted it. From the manner in which they have been discussed heretofore, those gentlemen will confide in the assurance I venture to give them, that they will be thoroughly sifted. They have not always passed unaltered, and never without passing through the fire of a debate.

We may repeat it, therefore, what color is there for saying that the Secretary legislates? Neither my memory nor my understanding can discern any. I am well aware that no topic is better calculated to make popular impressions; but I cannot persuade myself that the people will charge us with neglect or violation of duty, for putting ourselves into a situation to discharge it in the best and most circumspect manner.

There is another ground of objection, which is urged against the reference. It is said, it gives undue influence to the Treasury. The reasonings of the Secretary, which accompany his reports, are alleged to excite an influence which cannot be resisted. There are two sorts of influence: one, which arises from weight of reason and the intrinsic merit of a proposition; the other, personal influence. As to the former, it is hard to conceive of the influence of reasoning which cannot be analyzed and made capable of exact estimation by the reasoning faculties of those to whom it is submitted; and that estimation, be it what it may, ought to obtain. No one can wish to see it underrated.

But we are told by the opposers of a reference, that it is incredible that one man, be his official opportunities what they may, should possess more information than the members of this House, collected from every district of the country. Then I answer, with inferior information, it would be impossible his reasoning should overpower and confound the superior information of the House. The members will be in the less danger from this officer, if, as we are told, he is misinformed by correspondents, and has repeatedly discovered on subjects of revenue and finance, a princely ignorance. This, we are told, however, by gentlemen who urge the danger of losing our independence and our faculties of discernment, as soon as we suffer a report, with its reasonings, to be made to the House.

If it be personal influence, independently of reason and evidence, which is apprehended by gentlemen opposed to the reference, for whom do they apprehend it? For themselves, or for us who advocate the motion? Surely, if they do not feel, we do not fear it; we know how to respect their independence of spirit; they would disdain an imputation of the sort; their candor will permit us to say, if it be a neighborly concern they feel for us, there is no occasion for it.

On the whole, if we regard the Constitution, we find not the least color for bringing it into question on this debate. The law and usage of the old Congress corresponded with this motion. Our own Treasury law expressly makes it the duty of the Secretary to prepare and report plans; and shall the practice of one branch run counter to that which is made the course of his duty by the law of the land? It would be an uncommon and very irregular mode of repealing a law. The advantages of this practice of referring, are manifest and great: more information is obtained, and more order, intelligence, and system, are preserved in the administration of the finances. The old Congress and the several States have exhibited expensive and deplorable proofs of the evils incident to want of order, as well as to the number of systems of finance and financiers. With this mass of evidence before our eyes, it cannot be believed that we shall take any step which will tend to introduce disorder and inefficiency into our finances.

Mr. MADISON closed the debate with a few powerful observations. He insisted that a reference to the Secretary of the Treasury on subjects of loans, taxes, and provision for loans, &c., was, in fact, a delegation of the authority of the Legislature, although it would admit of much sophistical argument to the contrary. The arguments which he had heard, he said, were not satisfactory to his mind; and he peremptorily denied that the plans of that officer came into the House in either an equitable or unbiassed manner. A plan from the Senate might fairly be styled a constitutional one, because it came unsupported by any labored train of argument, and left the House at liberty to exercise its judgment pro and con., whilst those of the Secretary of the Treasury were accompanied by a force of reasoning not on both sides, but on one only. This, he insisted, was in opposition to Mr. AMES's doctrine; and, after making a few other remarks, concluded by declaring that it was evident the Secretary's plans were not introduced in such manner as to leave the House the freedom of exercising their own understandings in a proper constitutional manner.

When Mr. MADISON sat down, the question was taken on striking out the latter part of the motion, to wit: for referring to the Secretary of the Treasury to report a plan, &c., and it passed in the negative—yeas 25, nays 32, as follows:

NAYS.—Fisher Ames, Robert Barnwell, Egbert Benson, Elias Boudinot, Shearjashub Bourne, Benjamin Bourne, Jonathan Dayton, Thomas Fitzsimons, Elbridge Gerry, Nicholas Gilman, Benjamin Goodhue, James Gordon, Thomas Hartley, James Hillhouse, Daniel Huger, Israel Jacobs, Aaron Kitchell, John Wilkes Kittera, John Lorraine, Amasa Learned, George Leonard, Samuel Livermore, Frederick Augustus Muhlenberg, William Vans Murray, Theodore Sedgwick, Peter Sylvester, Jeremiah Smith, William Smith, John Steele, Jonathan Sturges, George Thatcher, and Artemas Ward.

And then the main question being put, that the House do agree to the said third resolution, as reported by the Committee of the Whole House, it was resolved in the affirmative.

Registering of Vessels.

THURSDAY, November 22.

Another member, to wit, JOHN MILLEDGE, returned to serve in this House for the State of Georgia in the room of ANTHONY WAYNE, whose seat was declared vacant, appeared, produced his credentials, and took his seat in the House.

The House proceeded to consider the fourth resolution reported on Tuesday last by the Committee of the Whole House on the Speech of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES; and the same being again read, was, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report the plan of a provision for the reimbursement of the loan made of the Bank of the United States, pursuant to the eleventh section of the act, entitled 'An act to incorporate the Subscribers to the Bank of the United States.'

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the first resolution reported by the Committee of the Whole House and agreed to yesterday, and that Mr. PARKER, Mr. MACON, and Mr. HEISTER, do prepare and bring in the same.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the second resolution reported by the Committee of the Whole House and agreed to yesterday, and that Mr. SEDGWICK, Mr. DAYTON, and Mr. LEARNED, do prepare and bring in the same.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, with an abstract of a supplementary arrangement which has been made by him, pursuant to the acts of the 3d day of March, 1791, and the 8th day of May, 1792, for raising a revenue upon foreign and domestic distilled spirits, in respect to the subdivisions and officers which have appeared to him necessary, and to the allowances for their respective services to the Supervisors, Inspectors, and other officers of inspection, together with estimates of the amount of compensations and charges.

The said Message, and papers therein referred to, were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Ordered, That the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury containing estimates of the sums necessary to be appropriated for the service of the year 1793, which lay on the table, be referred to the consideration of a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, on the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the petition of Joseph Henderson; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said Report under consideration, and made some progress therein.

Ordered, That the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further proceeding on the said Report, and that it be committed to Mr. AMES, Mr. BENJAMIN BOURNE, and Mr. CLARK, with instruction to examine the same, and report their opinion thereupon to the House.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill or bills to reimburse certain extra expenses of the late Commissioners for treating of Peace with the Creek Indians, and that Mr. AMES, Mr. TUCKER, and Mr. JEREMIAH SMITH, be the said committee.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying his Reports on sundry petitions; which were severally read, and ordered to lie on the table.

REGISTERING OF VESSELS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, on the bill concerning the registering and recording of ships or vessels:

Mr. PAGE opposed the clause which referred to "ships or vessels captured in war." He moved that it should be struck out, as countenancing a savage practice, now exploded and laid aside by civilized nations; that it would be time enough when the United States shall be so unfortunate as to be involved in a war, to make provision for the case now alluded to; that no inconvenience could arise from adopting the motion; that indeed it highly became the Legislature of the United States to adopt it, as they would thereby show their approbation of the liberal and benevolent sentiments now adopted by the greatest and most enlightened nations of Europe, abolishing the inhuman practice. That he supposed the clause had been inserted in the bill, because it was drawn before this circumstance of the benevolent disposition of the nations of Europe were generally known. He hoped therefore that his motion would be agreed to.

Mr. TUCKER seconded the motion, and supported it by arguments similar to Mr. PAGE's; remarking, that the French nation, though now engaged in an extensive war, did not permit the capture of merchant vessels; prohibiting that practice as inhuman and unbecoming a civilized nation.

Mr. GOODHUE, in reply, said, that the motion seemed to look to a state of perpetual peace, but for his part, as he did not think the millenium was begun, he should vote against the motion.

Mr. PAGE replied, that he did not expect the millenium in his day any more than the gentleman did who had endeavored to ridicule his motion. That he was not a little surprised to find that a motion which had a tendency so benevolent, and was in itself so rational, expressed too with modesty and deference to the framers of the bill, should meet with such a reception. He then repeated the substance of what he had before said, as he supposed he had not been heard, and insisted on it that the clause he moved to be struck out was not not only unnecessary in the bill, but was an improper adoption of a practice now condemned as savage by the enlightened nations of the world.

Mr. SEDGWICK remarked in opposition to the motion, that the clause ought not to be struck out, because it was not confined to merchant vessels which might be captured, but extended to ships of war, which, if taken by the United States in any future war, ought certainly to come within the view and benefit of the act.

The question was then put, and carried in the negative without a division.

NOVEMBER, 1792.]

Foreign Coins.

[H. OF R.]

When the bill was reported, Mr. PAGE renewed his motion for striking out the clause, &c., repeating nearly his former arguments, adding that as to the objection made to his motion on account of its interfering with the case of ships of war which may be captured. He said he felt for the United States when such a case was mentioned; he felt himself depressed and dispirited at the idea of his country being so perplexed by the expenses of a trifling war with the Indians, and yet looking forward to the capture of ships of war. That surely if that be the object of the clause, as it looks to a case which cannot happen till a future distant day, it will be time enough for some future Legislature to consider it; that for his part, he hoped never to see the United States possessed of a navy; at all events, till they had one, it would be unnecessary to make regulations respecting their prizes. He assured the House, he would not have renewed his motion, if he did not think it his duty to persist in his attempt to show the propriety of uniting in sentiments and endeavors with the great enlightened nations of the world, to put a stop to a savage practice which had been too often a great inducement to enter into wars. He wished to take away every possible temptation to enter into a war, and whenever his country should be so unhappy as to be involved in one, he wished, by the amendment proposed, to lessen the number of unavoidable evils attending wars.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time on Monday next.

FRIDAY, November 23.

Mr. AMES, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to reimburse certain extra expenses of the late Commissioners for treating of Peace with the Creek Indians; which was received, and read the first time.

FOREIGN COINS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act regulating Foreign Coins, and for other purposes."

Mr. PAGE said, he wished to be informed whether there really was the difference between the French and British coins stated in the bill; if so, how that difference has been ascertained. That a few years since he had examined hydrostatically the different gold coins named in the bill, and a variety of coins of the German Empire; and that although he readily discovered that the specific gravity of the latter was so little as to justify the low value at which they were generally rated, he remembered well, that there was by no means such difference between the specific gravity of the former as could justify the discrimination made in the bill. He added, that he doubted whether, if there really should appear to be that difference between the coins, it would be proper to introduce the distinction by a law of the General Government, as it might be attended with some inconveniences, and might be construed into a partiality to British commerce. He therefore, to take the sense of the Committee, moved to amend the clause, so as that the gold coins of Great Britain, France, Spain, and Portugal, should be payable at the same rates.

Mr. TUCKER seconded Mr. PAGE, and supported his motion with similar arguments.

Mr. FITZSIMONS said, he should vote against the amendment, because, he believed that the distinction proposed in the bill was really that which did exist in the intrinsic value of the coins alluded to.

Several other members opposed the motion, because, said they, we have no doubt that the Senate, who originated the bill, had considered the subject fully, and had made the proper estimate, on full information, of the real value of the different coins.

Mr. PAGE replied, that since he had only heard the opinions and suppositions of gentlemen opposed to his opinion, and no satisfactory proof offered to support the bill against his amendment, he should persist in his motion; for, said he, although I will not be so dogmatical as to assert that I am right, and the Senate wrong; yet, in a matter of this nature, which admits of positive proof and demonstration, and which, as far as my own actual experiments have gone, establish my opinion, I cannot give it up, till I have been convinced by other arguments than such as I have heard. Had I been told that the different coins alluded to had been examined hydrostatically, or had been assayed by proper persons appointed for that purpose, I should have acquiesced. I might possibly, however, have supposed that they were of a different coinage or emission from those which I had examined. I think the clause under consideration is of such importance as to require full and satisfactory proof to the world, that it has not been adopted without a thorough investigation of the truth and propriety of the discrimination it establishes between the coins of the nations with which we have such a considerable commercial intercourse. With that proof, I should be satisfied, and would defy the invidious suspicion of our being influenced by improper motives; but till such proof be afforded, I must think it would be better to amend the bill as I proposed, which would leave those coins on their present footing during only the short term to which their circulation is limited by the bill.

From what fell from some gentlemen, he said, it appeared that they thought the examination of the relative value of coins could only be ascertained by an assayer. He affirmed that any person acquainted with the use of an hydrostatic balance might easily examine them. That it was with reluctance he said any thing which might look like a scientific parade, but he thought it his duty to bring forward the inquiry he made; and what had fallen from some gentlemen compelled him to explain and support his motion.

To explain what he had said respecting the hydrostatic experiment, he observed, that it had pleased Nature, or rather the Great Author of Nature, to annex to most bodies, and particularly to metal, a different weight. Happily each species of substances have different weights, which, with propriety, are called specific gravities. That, most happily for our purpose, a cubic foot of water weighs 1,000 oz. avoirdupois; and a body when immersed in water, displaces a mass of water equal to the bulk of the immersed body, in displacing which mass of water, the body, if suspended to a pair of scales, is found to lose a weight exactly equal to the weight of the mass of water so displaced; so that, if any piece of money be weighed first in air, and then in water, its loss of weight in water will be exactly the weight of an equal bulk of water, which must at once give the comparative weight of that piece of money and of water. And as by this method pure gold has been found to be about nineteen times heavier than water, and copper nine times, which has been generally the alloy used in gold coins, if copper be mixed in any proportion (or any other metal whose specific gravity is known) the specific gravity of the compound may be found, and the exact proportion of each ingredient ascertained; and here I will remark, that as, in the act establishing a Mint, and regulating the coins of the United States, the proportion of silver and copper, which are declared to be the composition of the alloy for our gold coins, is not exactly fixed; there must be a difficulty of finding the real value of that coin without an actual, and accurate assay, and also room for varying its value. But, as this is happily left to the discretion of the Director of the Mint, whose abilities, accuracy, and integrity, are so remarkable, no inconvenience need be apprehended, as there is no doubt that he will observe the trust reposed in him, and that he will point out, from time to time, the exact proportion of these two ingredients of the alloy, which are left by the bill to his discretion. This I looked upon as a defect in the bill, and mentioned when it was before us the last session, as a reason why I wished to have it recommitted; but to return to the question. As I have found that the specific gravity of the gold coins of England, France, Spain, and Portugal, was, as well as I can now remember, about seventeen and an half, and that of some German coins not fifteen; that is, that the former weighed seventeen and a half times more than an equal mass of water, and the latter not fifteen times as much, or, in other words, that a cubic foot of the former weighed 17,500 oz. whilst a cubic foot of the latter would weigh 15,000—I say, as I have found this to be the case, I wish to know now whether any later experiments on those coins have been made to prove that there is a difference stated in the bill; if there have been such experiments I shall withdraw my motion, if not, I must insist upon it.

Proceedings.

MONDAY, November 26.

JEREMIAH WADSWORTH, from Connecticut, appeared, and took his seat.

A bill to reimburse certain extra expenses of the late Commissioners for treating of Peace with the Creek Indians was read the second time, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

An engrossed bill concerning the registering and recording of ships or vessels was read the third time, and passed.

A petition of sundry masters and owners of coasting vessels, and others, trading between the ports of New London and New York, was presented to the House and read, praying that the tonnage and fees of office imposed on vessels employed in the coasting trade, may be lessened.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the committee appointed to prepare and bring in a bill or bills for regulating ships or vessels employed in the coasting trade and fisheries.

A petition of John Manley was presented to the House and read, praying to be allowed the prize money on certain British ships captured by the petitioner, while a Captain in the Navy of the United States, during the late war.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the Secretary of War, with instructions to examine the same, and report his opinion thereupon to the House.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act regulating Foreign Coins, and for other purposes;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported several amendments thereto; which were severally read twice, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be read the third time to-morrow.

A memorial and representation of Warner Mifflin, one of the people called Quakers, was presented to the House and read, stating certain reflections for the consideration of Congress, in relation to the African slave trade, and to the humane treatment of slaves in the United States.

Ordered, That the said memorial and representation do lie on the table.

Resolved, That the Commissioners for the settlement of the accounts between the individual States and the United States, report to the House the time at which they suppose they will be ready to make their final report; and whether any, and what, obstacles remain, to prevent such final report.

TUESDAY, November 27.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to ascertain the fees demandable on Admiralty proceedings, in the District Courts of the United States, and to amend, in part, the act, entitled "An act for the government and regulation of seamen in the merchants' service;" which was received, and read twice, and committed.

Mr. GOODHUE, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels, to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same; which was received, read twice, and committed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Governor of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, covering a petition of a number of inhabitants of St. Vincennes, on the Wabash, praying that the resurvey of their lands, directed by a late law, may be made at the public expense; which were read, and ordered to be referred to Mr. LIVERMORE, Mr. MULLENBERG, and Mr. LEONARD, with instruction to examine the same, and report their opinion thereupon to the House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, respecting lost and destroyed certificates; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and reported progress.

WEDNESDAY, November 28.

Mr. PARKER, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to make compensation to the widows and orphans of persons who were killed by Indians, under the sanction of flags of truce; which was received, read twice, and committed.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill or bills granting farther compensation to certain Receivers of Continental Taxes; and that Mr. GILES, Mr. SHEARJASHUB BOURNE, and Mr. SYLVESTER, be the said committee.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee to whom was referred the Message from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, of the 9th instant, together with the papers accompanying the same, on the subject of the boundary between the State of Virginia and the Territory of the United States south of the river Ohio: whereupon,

Resolved, That the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES be requested and authorized, with the concurrence of the States of Virginia and Kentucky, to cause the line to be extended from the western termination of the line formerly run by Fry and Jefferson, on the part of Virginia, and by other surveyors on the part of North Carolina, by a surveyor of sufficient abilities, in the proper latitude, whereby the northern boundary of the territory ceded to the United States by the State of North Carolina may be determined; and that Congress will provide for the necessary expense attending the same.

Ordered That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution; and that Mr. BODINOT, Mr. WILLIAMSON, and Mr. PAGE, prepare and bring in the same.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act regulating Foreign Coins, and for other purposes," together with the amendments thereto, was read the third time; and, on a motion made and seconded, Ordered, To be recommitted to a Committee of the Whole House on the first Monday of January next.

Mr. GILES, from the committee appointed, presented a bill granting farther compensation to certain Receivers of Continental Taxes; which was received, read twice, and committed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to reimburse certain extra expenses of the late Commissioners for treating of Peace with the Creek Indians; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made an amendment thereto; which was read.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, do lie on the table.

WARNER MIFFLIN'S PETITION.

Mr. STEELE called the attention of the House to the memorial and representation of Warner Mifflin on the subject of Negro slavery. Mr. S. said, that after what had passed at New York on this subject, he had hoped the House would have heard no more of it; but, to his surprise, he found the subject was started anew, and had been introduced by a fanatic, who, not content with keeping his own conscience, undertook to become the keeper of the consciences of other men, and in a manner which he deemed not very decent, had intrusted his opinions into this House. Had an application been made to him to present such a petition, he thought he should have avoided a compliance with it. Gentlemen in the Northern States do not realize the mischievous consequences which have already resulted from measures of this kind, and if a stop were not put to such proceedings, the Southern States would be compelled to apply to the General Government for their interference. He concluded, by moving "that the paper purporting to be a petition from Warner Mifflin, be returned to him by the Clerk of the House; and that the entry of said petition be expunged from the Journal."

Mr. AMES rose to explain his motives in presenting the petition. He said it was his opinion, which he had expressed to the House long ago, that this Government could not, with propriety, take any steps in the matter referred to in this petition; but, on the general principle, that every citizen has a right to petition the Legislature, and to apply to any member to present his request to the House, he had handed it in. The petitioner is a citizen of Delaware; and had the member from that State been in the House, he should not have thought himself obliged to have introduced it; but that gentleman being absent, the petitioner had a right to apply to a member from any other State. He had no idea of supporting the prayer of the petition, his mind having been long made up on the subject. He considered it as totally inexpedient to interfere with the subject, and had uniformly opposed the applications made at a former session of Congress.

Mr. LIVERMORE did not consider the motion in order, the subject not being properly before the House; nor did he believe there was any disposition to bring it forward.

Mr. W. SMITH said he had seconded the motion, with a view of putting it out of the power of any member to call it up when persons might be absent who would find it their duty to oppose it. Mr. S. said he admitted, in its full extent, the right of every citizen to petition for a redress of grievances, and the duty of the House to consider such petitions; but the paper in question is a mere rant and rhapsody of a meddling fanatic, interlarded with texts of Scripture, and concluded with no specific prayer. He observed it was the general practice of Legislative bodies for members presenting petitions to read them, in order to make known their objects, and to have them entered on the Journal. In this particular instance, the practice might be attended with danger. Citizens of the Southern States learning that papers of this kind meet with countenance here, would be alarmed. The gentleman who presented this paper had not, on this occasion, shown his usual regard to Southern interests. Had he stated its dangerous object, the House would undoubtedly have refused its reception. After the proceedings at New York, when a similar application was made, his constituents had a right to expect that the subject would never be stirred again. He would assure the House, that while he continued a member of it, he should never fail to express his abhorrence against all such applications, as they could have none but a mischievous tendency. So far from being calculated to meliorate the condition of the race who were the object of them, they had a tendency to alienate their affections from their masters, and by exciting in them a spirit of restlessness, to render greater severity towards them necessary. He therefore earnestly called on the House to agree to the motion, and thereby convince this enthusiast, and others, that they can never meet countenance in the Legislature of the Union.

The part of the motion directing the petition to be returned by the Clerk was agreed to. The remainder was withdrawn by Mr. STEELE, the mover.

THURSDAY, November 29.

Mr. WHITE, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes; which was received, read twice, and committed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Treasurer of the United States, accompanying his account of the receipts and expenditures of public moneys, from the first of July to the thirtieth of September, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, inclusive; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the Secretary of the Treasury of the estimates of the sums necessary to be appropriated for the service of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and had leave to sit again.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee to whom was referred the petition of Lewis Garanger, in behalf of himself and his brother, Charles Garanger: whereupon,

Resolved, That the Comptroller of the Treasury be empowered and directed to adjust and settle the accounts of Lewis Garanger, as a Captain of Artillery, from the twenty-ninth of September, one thousand seven hundred and eighty, until the establishment of peace.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution; and that Mr. MADISON, Mr. WILLIAMSON, and Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, do prepare and bring in the same.

On a motion made and seconded,

Resolved, That the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES be requested to cause assays and other proper experiments to be made, at the Mint of the United States, of the gold and silver coins of France, England, Spain, and Portugal; and a report of the quantity of fine metal, and of alloy, in each of the denominations of the coins, to be laid before this House.

Ordered, That the said resolution be transmitted to the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, by the SPEAKER.

FRIDAY, November 30.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the petition of the executors of Edward Carnes, deceased; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said report under consideration, and come to a resolution thereupon; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and what, measures are necessary to facilitate the settlement of claims against the United States, not barred by acts of limitation, founded upon certificates granted, or settlements made, by any officer or officers, heretofore authorized by the United States to issue certificates or make settlements in their behalf, and who have not settled their accounts; and to report the result of their inquiries."

Ordered, That Mr. GOODHUE, Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. DAYTON, Mr. PARKER, and Mr. NILES, be a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and report a bill to amend the act establishing a Mint and regulating the coins of the United States, so far as respects the copper coinage; and that Mr. WILLIAMSON, Mr. PAGE, and Mr. KITTEKA, be the said committee.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the Secretary of the Treasury of the estimates of the sums necessary to be appropriated for the service of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had again had the said report under consideration, and made a farther progress therein.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before the House the accounts of the Commissioners of Loans, for the current year, by which his estimate is formed for appropriating thirty-five thousand and sixty-three dollars and twenty-eight cents, for the salaries of clerks and for stationery, in the Loan Offices of the United States, to the thirty-first of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three.

GROVE, and Mr. TUCKER, with instruction to examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying his report of a plan for the redemption of the Public Debt, and for the reimbursement of a certain loan made of the Bank of the United States, pursuant to the orders of the 21st and 22d ultimo; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A petition of sundry merchants and traders, inhabitants of the State of South Carolina, was presented to the House and read, stating the disadvantages under which they labor, for the want of a bankrupt law, and praying that Congress will take the subject into consideration, and pass an act thereupon.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the committee appointed to prepare and bring in a bill or bills to establish an uniform system on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States.

Mr. BOUDINOT, from the committee appointed, presented, according to order, a bill for determining the Northern boundary of the territory ceded to the United States by the State of North Carolina; which was read the first time.

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to lay before this House a list of the names of the persons returned to his office for pensions, by the Circuit Courts, in pursuance of the act entitled, "An act to provide for the settlement of the claims of widows and orphans, barred by limitations heretofore established, and to regulate the claims to Invalid Pensions," together with the rates of the said pensions, and the causes assigned for disability, accompanied with a statement of such facts and circumstances as may relate thereto.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the Secretary of the Treasury of the estimates of the sums necessary to be appropriated for the service of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman rose and reported progress.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to ascertain the fees demandable on Admiralty proceedings in the District Courts of the United States, and to amend, in part, the act entitled "An act for the government and regulation of seamen in the merchants' service;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and reported progress.

WIDOWS AND ORPHANS.

Mr. DAYTON's motion, laid on the table on Friday last, was called up by that gentleman, viz:

"That the Secretary of War be directed to lay before this House a list of the names of the persons returned to his office for pensions, by the Circuit Courts, in pursuance of the act, entitled 'An act to provide for the settlement of the claims of widows and orphans, barred by the limitations heretofore established, and to regulate the claims to invalid pensions,' together with the rates of said pensions, and the causes assigned for disability, accompanied with a statement of such facts and circumstances as may relate thereto."

Mr. DAYTON observed, that he considered it the indispensable duty of the Legislature to inquire into this subject, in order to avoid imposition. He held a paper in his hand containing an account of a number of persons admitted on the pension list by the Circuit Courts, on account of complaints, which if they were generally admitted, would increase the pension list in such manner, as ten times the present revenue of the United States would not be adequate to supporting.

Mr. B. BOURNE observed, that the Government had vested a discretionary power with the Secretary of War to check the grant of pensions in improper cases; that the Secretary was preparing a report on this subject; and that a full statement of the whole matter would be laid before the House. He therefore saw no necessity for the resolution.

Mr. SEDGEWICK said, he hoped nothing was intended by the motion to counteract the benevolent views of the Legislature, in the only act of Legislative generosity ever exhibited by this Government, the law of the last session making particular provision for invalids. Mr. S. said, he thought the necessary information on the subject would come before the House in course; but he was anxious that no steps should be taken, on account of some improper grants of pensions, to frustrate the designs of Government, or divert the justice and humanity of the country from a class of citizens who have fought the battles of the Union and to whom the United States are so much indebted for their present freedom and happiness.

Mr. CLARK, Mr. W. SMITH, Mr. LAURANCE, and Mr. HILLHOUSE, supported the motion. It was said that the law was found inadequate to the purpose for which it was made; that while in some cases it was not carried into execution, in others very improper grants of pensions had been made. Information was wanted; this information may be obtained; the law is defective, and ought to be revised. Justice, therefore, to real objects, to guard against impositions, and to make that provision which the finances of the country are competent to, impose a necessity that the motion should be adopted. In reply to the objection, that information would come in of course from the War Office, it was said, the motion went to several points, on which it was not the duty of the Secretary to report, unless he was required to do it.

A bill for determining the Northern boundary of the territory ceded to the United States by the State of North Carolina was read the second time, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole on Thursday next.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying the Register's detail of the estimate of thirty-five thousand and sixty-three dollars and twenty-eight cents, for the clerk hire and stationery of the several Loan Offices of the United States, to the thirty-first of March next, made pursuant to the order of Friday last; which was read, and ordered to be referred to the consideration of the

ESTIMATES OF APPROPRIATIONS.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the Secretary of the Treasury of the estimates of the sums necessary to be appropriated for the service of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three. The papers on which the estimate of the expense of the Loan Offices was founded, were read.

The accounts of the Loan Officers of Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia, were particularly called for, and read in detail. The expenses of these offices were very different, owing to the business being much greater, by reason of transfers, in some States than in others. The amount of the expense was generally complained of. It was observed that some other mode of doing the business ought to be adopted, or, that those for whose advantage these numerous transfers are made, should bear a due proportion of the expense occasioned thereby. Several alterations or corrections were made in the estimate respecting this article.

The sum of fifty thousand dollars for the contingencies and incidental expenses of the War Department, having been struck out, Mr. STEELE moved that the blank be filled with five thousand dollars.

This motion was withdrawn, and was succeeded by another, to the following purport: "That the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES be requested to cause to be laid before the House a statement of the items constituting the sum in the estimate proposed to be appropriated for contingent, incidental, and conjectural charges in the War Department." This motion was objected to as informal in itself, and contrary to the practice of the House; it was urged that the proper mode would be to call on the officer at the head of the War Department, to lay before the House the necessary documents. It was accordingly moved that the words "the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES" be struck out of the motion, and that the Secretary of War should be directed to lay before the House, &c. The motion for striking out was lost; and then the question on the motion as originally made, was put and carried.

Mr. FITZSIMONS, from the committee to whom was referred so much of the Message from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES of the 7th ultimo as relates to a statement of the administration of the fund appropriated to certain Foreign purposes, together with the papers accompanying the same, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

EXPENSES OF THE CREEK TREATY.

The House proceeded to consider the amendment reported by the Committee of the Whole House the 28th ultimo, to the bill to reimburse certain extra expenses of the late Commissioners for treating of peace with the Creek Indians: whereupon,

The question being taken, that the House do concur with the Committee in the said amendment for filling up the blank in the said bill with the words "twelve thousand dollars:"—it passed in the negative—yeas 24, nays 25, as follows:

NAYS.—John Baptist Ashe, Benjamin Bourne, Abraham Clarke, Jonathan Dayton, William B. Giles, James Gordon, Christopher Greenup, William Barry Grove, James Hillhouse, Israel Jacobs, Aaron Kitchell, Richard Bland Lee, Samuel Livermore, Andrew Moore, Nathaniel Niles, Alexander D. Orr, Cornelius C. Schoonmaker, Peter Sylvester, Israel Smith, John Steele, Thomas Sumpter, Abraham Venable, Alexander White, Hugh Williamson, and Francis Willis.

And then, a motion being made, and the question put, to fill up the said blank with the words "nine hundred dollars," it was resolved in the affirmative.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, be engrossed, and read the third time tomorrow.

WEDNESDAY, December 5.

An engrossed bill to reimburse certain extra expenses of the late Commissioners for treating of Peace with the Creek Indians was read the third time; and, on the question that the said bill do pass, it passed in the negative—yeas 20, nays 21, as follows:

YEAS.—Fisher Ames, Abraham Baldwin, Robert Barnwell, Egbert Benson, Elias Boudinot, Shearjashub Bourne, Thomas Fitzsimons, John Laurance, Samuel Livermore, John Milledge, Frederick Augustus Muhlenberg, John Page, Theodore Sedgwick, William Smith, Jonathan Sturges, George Thatcher, Thomas Tudor Tucker, Jeremiah Wadsworth, Artemas Ward, and Francis Willis.

NAYS.—John Baptist Ashe, Benjamin Bourne, Abraham Clark, Jonathan Dayton, James Gordon, Israel Jacobs, Philip Key, Aaron Kitchell, George Leonard, John Francis Mercer, Andrew Moore, Nathaniel Niles, Alexander D. Orr, Josiah Parker, Peter Sylvester, Israel Smith, John Steele, Thomas Tredwell, Abraham Venable, Alexander White, and Hugh Williamson.

And so the bill was rejected.

PETITION OF MOSES YOUNG.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee on the memorial of Moses Young. Whereupon,

The resolution reported by the said committee, in the words following, was read, to wit:

"That the said Moses Young hath a just claim on the United States for the full amount of his salary, at the rate of five hundred pounds sterling per annum, from the eighteenth of October, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-nine, to the thirtieth of August,

DECEMBER, 1792.]

Petition of Moses Young.

one thousand seven hundred and eighty-two, including the usual allowance of three months for returning to America; and that, after deducting the sums received from Doctor Franklin, and by his attorney, Joseph Nourse, the balance ought to be paid by the United States."

The facts of the case are these: Mr. Young was appointed Secretary to Mr. Laurens on his embassy to Holland. Mr. Laurens, it appears, had recommended to Mr. Young to take but one half of his salary, in consideration of the embassy's having proved inefficient; and, as an inducement, informed Mr. Young that he (Mr. Laurens) intended to relinquish the whole of his salary. Mr. Young, from patriotic motives, and influenced by the example of Mr. Laurens, accordingly relinquished one half of his salary as Secretary aforesaid; but finding afterwards that Mr. Laurens had, on his return to America, received his full salary and emoluments from the Government, as Ambassador, Mr. Young, in the petition, prays that he may be paid the full amount of the salary he had, on the aforesaid considerations, relinquished. All the vouchers and documents relating to this subject were read: among others, an account settled between the United States and Mr. Young. The question, therefore, according to the opinion given by the gentlemen who supported the petition was, whether the present Government should avail itself of this settlement made under the circumstances already stated, and thereby preclude the petitioner from the full allowance to which he was, by a resolution of the former Congress entitled, especially as by the account settled it appears that Mr. Young made a reservation of a further claim. It was observed that the allegations in the petition were supported by the most explicit declarations on the part of Mr. Laurens; and that the petitioner was clearly and justly entitled to the sum he had relinquished on a contingency which had not taken place, but directly the reverse; it was said that it would be little short of taking a pettifogging advantage of the petitioner.

In opposition to the report in favor of the petitioner, it was said that the settlement made at the public office appears to have been done deliberately, and the allowance of the salary of £250 sterling, was made pursuant to certificates received from Mr. Laurens, as a full salary. It was urged, that if the Legislature should rip up transactions so long settled, and do away accounts finally closed with the proper officers, it would be a most dangerous precedent indeed. It was constantly echoed in the House, that these settlements were not to be disturbed; and the consequence, it was easy to perceive, would be of the most perplexing nature; there would be no end to the applications which would take place; applications, accompanied with circumstances whose pretensions, it was said, were much more weighty and important than that now under consideration. It was further observed, that it does not appear that Mr. Laurens had deviated from his agreement with Mr. Young, in settling his account; for, though he had received his full salary as Ambassador, it plainly appears that he did not receive it merely as a compensation for his services as such, but in part as an indemnification for other services, and for losses he had sustained in consequence of being in public employment; and, therefore, Mr. Young's claim on account of a supposed violation of contract on the part of Mr. Laurens, is not well founded; and, besides, it was remarked, that Mr. Young, in the account he has settled, has no reference in his note of reservation, to any subsequent claim on account of any contract between him and Mr. Laurens. After a long debate, the question on agreeing to the report of the committee in favor of the petitioner, as above stated, was put and negatived, 27 to 25.

Mr. W. SMITH then moved that the petition of Moses Young, with the additional evidence and documents accompanying the same, be recommitted to a select committee. This motion was lost.

THURSDAY, December 6.

Mr. MADISON, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to authorize the settlement of the accounts of Lewis Garanger, for military services during the late war; which was read twice, and committed.

Mr. KEY, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of Woodrop and Joseph Sims, made a report; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter and report from the Commissioners for settling the accounts between the United States and the individual States, pursuant to the order of the 26th ultimo; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same; and, after some time spent therein, Mr. SPEAKER resumed the chair, and Mr. SEDGWICK reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, do lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from JOSHUA SENEY, one of the members for the State of Maryland, stating his acceptance of an appointment in the Judiciary Department of the said State, which disqualifies him from a seat in this House; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

UNITED STATES, December 6, 1792.

The papers accompanying the said Message were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

CASE OF WOODROP SIMS.

Mr. KEY, of the committee on the petition of Woodrop and Joseph Sims, brought in a report, which was, that the relief prayed for ought to be granted.

The reading of the petition was called for, the prayer of which is, that they may be released from the payment of duties on sundry goods lost on a voyage from New York to Philadelphia.

A motion was made to accept the report of the committee.

Mr. GOODHUE observed, that though he was disposed to grant relief in the case, yet he saw no principle on which it could be done; had the owners insured a sum sufficient to have covered the duties, they would have avoided the additional loss occasioned by having given bond for them. He thought that the House ought to proceed with great caution, as granting relief in the present case would be establishing a precedent which might be attended with great inconvenience and eventual loss of revenue.

Mr. W. SMITH said, that relief had been granted in a former case, which perhaps was similar; though he did not perfectly recollect the circumstances: and said he wished the law he alluded to might be read. He suggested the propriety of receiving the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, as it was of the greatest importance that a full investigation of the subject should take place previous to any decision.

Mr. FITZSIMONS observed, that this was an individual case; it stood on its own merits; every member of the House was fully competent to forming an opinion on it; and he hoped the House would determine respecting it for themselves.

Mr. FITZSIMONS then stated the particulars to show that this was a case of peculiar hardship and misfortune; and that the loss of the duties to which the petitioners were exposed, arose in part from an excess of official attention on the part of the Collector of New York. After some further remarks by different gentlemen, the petition and report were referred to a Committee of the Whole, for Monday next.

FRIDAY, December 7.

The Letter from Mr. SENEY, containing his resignation was again read, and a motion made to refer the same to a committee; some debate ensued on this motion, in which the question was started how far it was in the power of a member of the House to vacate his seat; the solution of this, it was said, would involve a lengthy discussion of some constitutional questions; if it was the opinion of the House that the present case naturally included this discussion, the reference ought to be to a Committee of the Whole. Some gentlemen thought that the most simple process was to accept the resignation, and make entry accordingly in the Journal; a notification to be sent to the Executive of the State of Maryland. The motion for commitment of the Letter was negatived; a motion was then made that the SPEAKER of the House notify the Executive of the State of Maryland of a representation of that State, by the resignation of Mr. SENEY. This motion was negatived and the Letter laid on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying certain statements, together with a Letter from the Comptroller of the Treasury, relative to the disbursements made by the Department of War, in the years one thousand seven hundred and ninety, and one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, pursuant to the order of the thirteenth ultimo; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SEDGWICK, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to continue in force for a limited time, and to amend the act, entitled "An act providing the means of intercourse between the United States and foreign nations; which was received, read twice, and committed.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to ascertain the fees demandable on Admiralty proceedings in the District Courts of the United States, and to amend in part the act, entitled "An act for the government and regulation of seamen in the merchants' service;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

UNITED STATES, December 7, 1792.

*Gentlemen of the Senate, and
of the House of Representatives:*

I lay before you two Letters, with their enclosures, from the Governor of the Southwestern Territory, and an extract of a Letter to him from the Department of War.

These, and a Letter of the ninth of October last, which has been already communicated to you, from the same Department to the Governor, will show in what manner the first section of the act of the last session, which provides for calling out the Militia for the repelling of Indian invasions, has been executed. It remains to be considered by Congress whether, in the present situation of the United States, it be advisable or not to pursue any further or other measures than those which have already been adopted. The nature of the subject does, of itself, call for your immediate attention to it; and I must add, that, upon the result of your deliberations, the future conduct of the Executive will on this occasion materially depend.

Ordered, That the said Message, together with the papers herein referred to, be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

MONDAY, December 10.

Mr. WILLIAMSON, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to amend an act, entitled "An act to promote the progress of Useful Arts;" which was received, read twice, and committed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of War, enclosing the copy of a letter from the Governor of Georgia, together with certain communications relative to Indian affairs; which were read, and ordered to be referred to the consideration of a Committee of the Whole House to-day.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States; which was received, read twice, and committed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Message from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, of the 7th instant, together with the papers therein referred to, relative to the execution of the act for calling out the Militia to repel the invasions of the Indians; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said Message and papers under consideration, and made some progress therein.

TUESDAY, December 11.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter and Report from the Secretary of the Treasury, on the petition of Abraham Scribner and Thomas Cable; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Message from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, of the 7th instant, together with the papers therein referred to, relative to the execution of the act for calling out the Militia to repel the invasions of the Indians; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had again had the said Message and papers under consideration, and made a further progress therein.

WEDNESDAY, December 12.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of War, enclosing a statement of certain materials whereon the estimate of contingencies of the War Department, for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, are founded; also, an explanation of certain heads of articles in the general estimate, called "conjectural;" which were read, and ordered to be referred to the consideration of the Committee of the Whole House on the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury of the estimates of the sums necessary to be appropriated for the service of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three.

A memorial of Moses Young was presented to the House and read, praying to be compensated for certain services as Secretary to Mr. LAURENS and to Doctor FRANKLIN, on their embassies to Holland and France, for which he has received no satisfaction.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, with instruction to examine the same, and report his opinion thereupon to the House.

A memorial was presented of John Nicholson, Cornelius Barnes, John Mitchell, junior, and Norton Pryor, creditors of the United States, who loaned money between September, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-seven, and March, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-eight, praying that an appropriation may be made for the payment of the arrears of interest due, and the annual interest accruing on the amount of their respective claims.

Ordered, That the said memorial do lie on the table.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury of the estimates of the sums necessary to be appropriated for the service of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

On a motion made and seconded that the House do come to the following resolutions:

Resolved, That a loan to the amount of the balances which, upon a final settlement of accounts, shall be found due from the United States to the individual States, be opened at the Treasury of the United States, and at the loan offices in the respective States, to commence within — months after the said balances shall be reported at the Treasury, and to continue open for the term of — months, from the time of its commencement.

Resolved, That the sums to be subscribed to such loans be payable in the principal or interest of the certificates or notes issued by any such of the said States, as, upon the final settlement of accounts, shall have a balance due to them from the United States, and which shall have been liquidated to specie value prior to the — day of — last.

Resolved, That every subscriber to the said loan shall be entitled to certificates according to the sum subscribed, of the like tenor and description, in the like proportions, and upon the like terms, as are specified and directed by the fifteenth and sixteenth sections of the act, entitled "An act making provision for the Debt of the United States," except that interest on such of the certificates subscribed to the said loan as bear interest, shall be computed to the last day of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, inclusively, and that interest shall not begin to accrue upon any of the certificates which shall be issued in lieu thereof, till the first day of January, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four.

Resolved, That in all cases where the sum subscribed in the evidences of the debt of any State shall exceed the balance due to such State, the same shall be reduced (in equal proportions) to the sum actually due to such State."

Ordered, That the said motion be referred to the consideration of a Committee of the Whole House on the first Monday of January next.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to ascertain the fees demandable on Admiralty proceedings in the District Courts of the United States, and to amend in part the act, entitled "An act for the government and regulation of seamen in the merchants' service;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

THURSDAY, December 13.

ANDREW GREGG, from Pennsylvania, appeared and took his seat in the House.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act concerning the registering and recording of ships or vessels," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

Ordered, That the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury of a plan for the redemption of the Public Debt, and for the reimbursement of a certain loan made of the Bank of the United States, which lay on the table, be referred to the consideration of a Committee of the Whole House on this day fortnight.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments reported on Thursday last, by the Committee of the Whole House, to the bill for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels, to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same; and the said amendments being severally twice read were, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, do lie on the table.

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to lay before this House a Return of all the commissioned officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates, belonging to the regular establishment of the United States, specifying the regiments or corps to which they belong, and the times of their entering the service.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury of the estimates of the sums necessary to be appropriated for the service of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three; and, after some time spent therein, Mr. SPEAKER resumed the chair, and Mr. SEDGWICK reported that the Committee had again had the said report under consideration, and come to several resolutions thereupon; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That, for defraying the expenditure of the Civil List of the United States for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, together with the incidental and contingent expenses of the several Departments and offices thereof, there be appropriated the several sums of money following, to wit:" [Here follow the several items.]

Resolved, That, for making good deficiencies for the support of the Civil List Establishment, for aiding the fund appropriated for the payment of certain officers of the courts, jurors, and witnesses; for the support of light-houses, and for the establishment of ten cutters, and for other purposes, there be appropriated the several sums of money following, to wit:" [Here again follow the items.]

Resolved, That, for defraying the expenses of the War Department for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, there be appropriated the following sums, to wit:" [The items follow.]

Resolved, That, for making good the several and respective sums of money aforesaid, there be appropriated—

"1st. The sum of six hundred thousand dollars, reserved by the act making provision for the Debt of the United States.

"2d. The surplus which may remain unappropriated for the use of the War Department, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two.

"3d. So much of the existing revenues of the United States as are unappropriated."

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolutions; and that Mr. LAURANCE, Mr. BALDWIN, Mr. JEREMIAH SMITH, Mr. STEELE, and Mr. GILES do prepare and bring in the same.

PUBLIC DEBT.

The report of the Secretary of the Treasury, containing a plan for the reduction of the Public Debt, on motion of Mr. SEDGWICK, was referred to a Committee of the Whole.

A motion for its being made the order of the day, this day week, was opposed. Mr. MURRAY objected to so early a day. The subject, said he, is important; the State of Maryland has a right to six votes in this House; it so happens, that four seats of the representation from that State are vacant. He wished, therefore, that a more distant day may be appointed, as, in that case, it was highly probable that State would be more fully represented. Other reasons for a more distant day were urged by several gentlemen. This day fortnight was finally agreed to.

The House took into consideration the amendments by the Committee of the Whole to the coasting bill. They agreed to some of the amendments reported, with amendments; others were rejected. A clause was proposed to be added, requiring from the owners or masters of vessels a particular enumeration of all the goods, wares, and merchandise transported in the several coasting vessels from time to time. This occasioned some debate; it was objected to as involving a great and unnecessary expense, without affording a corresponding benefit; as tending to obstruct the coasting trade, so as almost to destroy the same. It was said it would be nugatory, being in many cases impracticable. The clause was supported, as conducive to information relative to the products and real consumptions of the several States—points on which very different opinions were entertained; that the expense would not probably be more than the addition of one clerk to the Treasury Department; that the duty would devolve on the collectors, and be a business, of course, &c. The motion was at length withdrawn. Some verbal corrections were made in several sections; and then, by general consent, the bill was laid on the table for further consideration.

ESTIMATES OF APPROPRIATION.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the estimate of appropriations, Mr. SEDGWICK in the Chair. The Chairman observed that the subject was before the Committee without any specific proposition.

Mr. KITCHELL moved that the Committee should rise, and report the resolutions submitted some time since.

It being remarked that these resolutions were yet to be determined on, having never been reported to the House, they were again read; and then a motion for the Committee to rise and report was made and agreed to. The Committee accordingly rose and reported the resolutions, which were taken into consideration by the House. The items of the estimate were again recited. The sum in the estimate for the support and expenses of the Loan Offices occasioned considerable conversation. The accounts of the several Loan Offices were again called for; that from the officer at New York being read, it was remarked that the amount of this account exceeded that of Pennsylvania, and, indeed, of all the other accounts. This disparity, it was said, was very extraordinary, and did not appear to be accompanied with any sufficient reasons for so great a difference; and though the accounts had been settled by the proper officers of the Treasury, yet that they were liable to be revised by the House.

Some remarks in opposition were made.

The question on agreeing to the sum reported in the estimate for the Loan Offices, was carried in the affirmative.

The House having proceeded through the items included in the several resolutions, a motion was made and agreed to, that a committee be appointed to prepare and report a bill in conformity thereto; and Messrs. LAURANCE, BALDWIN, SMITH, N. H., STEBLE, and GILES, were appointed.

A motion that the estimate of contingencies received from the War Department, with the other papers relative to the estimate of appropriations, be referred to the select committee, was, after some debate, superceded by a motion to adjourn.

FRIDAY, December 14.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, from the committee to whom were referred the petitions of sundry persons, praying to be placed on the list of pensioners of the United States; also, a Letter from the Judges of the Circuit Court for the District of North Carolina, relative to the act passed the last session of Congress, regulating the claims to Invalid Pensions, made a report; which was read, and ordered to be referred to the consideration of a Committee of the Whole House on Monday, the 31st instant.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Report from the Secretary of War, accompanying lists of the names of persons returned to his office for pensions, by the Circuit Courts of the United States, together with the rates of the said pensions, and the causes assigned for disability, pursuant to the order of the 3d instant; which was read, and ordered to be referred to the consideration of the Committee of the Whole House last appointed.

Mr. LIVERMORE, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of a number of the inhabitants of St. Vincennes, on the Wabash; together with a Letter from the Governor of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the River Ohio, accompanying the same, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the amendments proposed by the Senate, to the bill, entitled "An act concerning the registering and recording of ships or vessels." Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the amendments to the fifth section.

Resolved, That this House doth disagree to the amendment to the seventeenth section of the said bill.

Ordered, That the Clerk of this House do acquaint the Senate therewith.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act in addition to, and alteration of the act, entitled 'An act for settling the accounts of the United States with the individual States;'" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The said bill was read the first time.

REGISTERING VESSELS.

The amendments of the Senate to the bill providing for the registering and recording of ships or vessels were taken into consideration. The first, second, and third amendments were agreed to. The fourth amendment was to strike out the 17th section of the bill, which was designed to guard effectually against collusion in regard to American vessels—it having been ascertained that impositions in this respect had been practised with success. The amendment of the Senate was objected to; it was said it left the door still open to the owners of foreign vessels to evade payment of foreign tonnage. Mr. GOODHUE, Mr. WILLIAMSON, Mr. SEDGWICK, Mr. PARKER, and Mr. MADISON, opposed the amendment.

Mr. FITZSIMONS appeared to be partially in favor of the amendment; he observed that there was no clause in the British navigation law, equally rigid with that proposed in the bill, and which the Senate have objected to. He observed that the policy of such restrictions as went to discourage the building of vessels in the United States may well be doubted; but though he was not perfectly satisfied with the clause in the bill, yet he should not vote to concur with the Senate.

Mr. W. SMITH said he agreed with the gentleman from Pennsylvania in his remarks, but should draw a very different conclusion, and should therefore be in favor of concurring with the Senate; but if the House should not be disposed to concur, he inquired whether the proposal to strike out the clause could not be adopted without agreeing to the substitute?

Mr. BARNWELL was in favor of concurring with the Senate.

Mr. PARKER opposed the amendment. He said the operation of the proposed clause from the Senate might tend to increase the building of American vessels, but would most certainly tend to the injury of the mercantile interest in general. The collusions alluded to by several gentlemen, he observed, had undoubtedly taken place; and, if there is not some effectual provision, like that in the bill, adopted, the commerce of the United States in a few years would be transferred to foreigners altogether.

Mr. MADISON was opposed to the amendment. He added a few remarks, corroborative of the sentiments delivered by Mr. PARKER; and then the question being put, the amendment of the Senate was disagreed to.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Message from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, of the 7th instant, together with the papers therein referred to, relative to the execution of the act for calling out the Militia to repel the invasions of the Indians; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had again had the said Message and papers under consideration, and made a farther progress therein.

MONDAY, December 17.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act in addition to, and alteration of the act, entitled 'An act for settling the accounts of the United States with the individual States,'" was read the second time, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on the second Monday of January next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, on the Report of the Committee to whom was referred the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the petition of the Executors of Edward Carnes, deceased; and, after some time spent therein, Mr. SPEAKER resumed the Chair, and Mr. SEDGWICK reported that the Committee had had the said Report under consideration, and come to several resolutions thereupon; which were severally read twice, and agreed to by the House, as follow:

Resolved, That all persons having claims upon the United States, not barred by any act of limitation, whether founded upon certificates, or other written documents from public officers or otherwise, (except Loan Office certificates, certificates of final settlement, Register's certificates, and certificates issued pursuant to the act making provision for the Debt of the United States,) shall exhibit the same at the Treasury of the United States within ——— months, or be forever barred from payment or settlement.

Resolved, That the accounting officers of the Treasury be authorized to settle and adjust, after the expiration of the term aforesaid, all such of those claims as shall appear to them proper to be admitted, and to report to Congress upon all such as they may not think proper to admit.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolutions, and that Mr. GOOD-HUE, Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. DAYTON, Mr. PARKER, and Mr. NILES, do prepare and bring in the same.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate recede from their amendment disagreed to by this House, to the seventeenth section of the bill, entitled "An act concerning the registering and recording of ships or vessels.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, on the Message from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, of the 7th instant, together with the papers therein referred to, relative to the execution of the act for calling out the Militia to repel the invasions of the Indians; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had again had the said Message and papers under consideration, and come to no resolution thereupon.

Ordered, That the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that the said Message and papers do lie on the table.

TUESDAY, December 18.

A memorial of the officers, now residing in the State of New York, of the late American Army, in behalf of themselves and their brethren the soldiers of the said Army, was presented to the House and read, praying that the depreciation which accrued on the certificates of Debt granted them in reward for their military services during the late war, may be made good to them, or such other relief afforded them as the present circumstances of the United States will admit. Also, a memorial of the Pennsylvania line of the late Army, to the same effect.

Ordered, That the said memorials do lie on the table.

The House resumed the consideration of the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole House, on the 6th instant, to the bill for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same. Whereupon,

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be recommitted to Mr. GOODRUE, Mr. FITZSIMONS, and Mr. PARKER.

The House proceeded to consider the Message from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, of the 7th instant, together with the papers therein referred to, relative to the execution of the act for calling out the Militia to repel the invasions of the Indians, which lay on the table. Whereupon,

A motion being made and seconded that the House do come to the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be authorized to employ such part of the military force and of the Militia of the United States, as he may judge necessary, for the effectual protection of the frontiers; and (if he shall judge it expedient) to carry on offensive operations against the Indians of the five lower Cherokee towns, called Chickamagas, and such other of the Indian tribes as may hereafter commit acts of depredation against the lives and property of the citizens of the United States."

A division of the said motion was called for. Whereupon, Reduction of the Army—Coasting Bill—Indian Trade.

The question being put, that the House do agree to the first part of the said motion, in the words following, to wit:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be authorized to employ such part of the military force and of the Militia of the United States, as he may judge necessary for the effectual protection of the frontiers; and (if he shall judge it expedient) to carry on offensive operations against the Indians of the five lower Cherokee towns, called Chickamagas."

It passed in the negative—yeas 21, nays 27, as follows:

YEAS.—Abraham Baldwin, Robert Barnwell, Abraham Clark, William Findley, Thomas Fitzsimons, William B. Giles, Christopher Greenup, Samuel Griffin, Thomas Hartley, Daniel Huger, Richard Bland Lee, John Milledge, Andrew Moore, Frederick Augustus Muhlenberg, William Vans Murray, John Page, Josiah Parker, Thomas Tudor Tucker, Abraham Venable, Alexander White, and Francis Willis.

NAYS.—John Baptist Ashe, Elias Boudinot, Shearjashub Bourne, Benjamin Bourne, Elbridge Gerry, Nicholas Gilman, Benjamin Goodhue, Andrew Gregg, Daniel Heister, James Hillhouse, Philip Key, Aaron Kitchell, John Laurance, Amasa Learned, George Leonard, Samuel Livermore, Nathaniel Niles, Theodore Sedgwick, Peter Sylvester, Israel Smith, John Steele, Jonathan Sturges, Thomas Sumpter, Thomas Tredwell, Jeremiah Wadsworth, Artemas Ward, and Hugh Williamson.

And so the said motion was lost.

WEDNESDAY, December 19.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of War, enclosing an extract of a letter from Brigadier General Wilkinson; also, a copy of a letter from James Seagrove, relative to Indian Affairs; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Resolved, That the Committee of the Whole House, to whom is referred so much of the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury made on the 3d instant, as relates to a plan for the reimbursement of a certain loan made of the Bank of the United States, be discharged from the consideration of the same; and that a committee be appointed to report a bill authorizing a loan equal to the sum borrowed of the said Bank, to be applied to the said reimbursement, and providing that so much of the dividend in the stock of Government in the said Bank, as may be necessary, be appropriated for paying the interest of the sum to be borrowed.

Ordered, That Mr. SEDGWICK, Mr. LAURANCE, and Mr. MURRAY, be a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, on the bill to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, do lie on the table.

THURSDAY, December 20.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter and Report from the Secretary of the Treasury, on the petition of Ludwig Kuhn; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A memorial of the officers, now residing in the State of Maryland, of the late American Army, in behalf of themselves and their brethren the soldiers of the said Army, was presented to the House and read, praying that the depreciation which accrued on the certificates of Debt granted them in reward for their military services during the late war, may be made good to them, or such other relief afforded them as the present circumstances of the United States will admit.

Ordered, That the said memorial do lie on the table.

REDUCTION OF THE ARMY.

Mr. STEELE laid a resolution on the table, to the following purport, viz:

"That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill to reduce the military establishment of the United States to ——— regiments or corps, consisting each of ——— non-commissioned officers, privates, and musicians, with such proportion of commissioned officers as the President may think proper to continue in service; and to repeal so much of an act passed the 5th of March, 1792, entitled 'An act for making further and more effectual provision for the protection of the frontiers of the United States,' as may contravene this intention."

This motion, Mr. STEELE said, he was influenced to bring forward, from two motives: the first was, to afford more effectual protection to the frontiers; the other was, that, by this reduction, a sum of money might be drawn from the War Department, to be applied to the reduction of the Public Debt, so that a necessity for new taxes, to effect that object, may be superceded.

COASTING BILL.

The select committee to whom the coasting bill had been recommitted reported sundry amendments; which were taken into consideration by the House, and all of them agreed to.

Mr. CLARK objected to a clause in the 12th section, which enjoins that every change of the master of every packet or ferry-boat shall be reported at the custom-house the first opportunity.

Mr. DAYTON stated the inconveniences to which the masters and owners of the small coasting craft and packet boats belonging to the State of New Jersey would be particularly exposed by this injunction, where the masters are very frequently changed.

To remove this objection, Mr. GOODHUE proposed to insert the words "ferry-boats excepted."

This motion was adopted.

It was then ordered that the bill be engrossed for a third reading.

INDIAN TRADE.

The amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole to the bill to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes were taken into consideration.

Objections were made to the 5th section, which contemplates legislating and punishing crimes committed within the boundaries of the Indian countries. It was contended that the cases mentioned were fully provided for by treaties, or by the laws of the respective States; the whole ground, it was said, is covered by these provisions; and therefore there appears an impropriety, if not an absurdity, in enacting, in a subsequent law, that certain punishments shall be inflicted for certain crimes, which are sufficiently recognised by the several treaties already formed; that the attempt would operate unjustly; the provisions may reach our own citizens, but cannot affect so fully as they ought the savages. It was moved that the whole section should be stricken out.

In opposition to this motion, it was said that the power of the General Government to legislate in all the territory belonging to the Union, not within the limits of any particular State, cannot be doubted; if the Government cannot make laws to restrain persons from going out of the limits of any of the States, and commit murders and depredations, it would be in vain to expect any peace with the Indian tribes. The power of Congress to legislate, independent of treaties, it was also said, must be admitted; for it is impossible that every case should be provided for by those treaties.

The question being called for, Mr. CLARK rose and observed, that he conceived it was of importance that the House should vote with their eyes open; and, to enable them to do this, he said he should read the ordinance of the late Congress, passed in 1787, respecting the settlement of the Western country. He observed that he believed very few of the members had turned their attention to it. He accordingly read such parts of the ordinance as he thought essential to the point, which was to show that the clause of the bill now under consideration would in its operation violate the solemn stipulations with the settlers contained in the ordinance, as full provision is contained in the ordinance to institute all civil and criminal processes. The motion for striking out the section was negatived. The amendments of the Committee of the Whole were agreed to, with some amendments. Various subsequent amendments were moved, with various success, some being agreed to and others rejected. Without finishing the discussion of the bill, the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, December 21.

Mr. SEDGWICK, from the committee appointed, presented a bill providing for the reimbursement of a Loan made of the Bank of the United States; which was read twice and committed.

A petition of Robert Ralston, Assignee of the estate of Thomas Barclay, was presented to the House and read, praying that payment may be made to him as legal representative of the said Thomas Barclay, for the amount of certain claims for services rendered by him to the United States previous to the 16th day of May, 1791.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, with instruction to examine the same, and report his opinion thereupon to the House.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, on the bill to ascertain the fees demandable on Admiralty proceedings, in the District Courts of the United States, and to amend, in part, the act, entitled "An act for the government and regulation of seamen in the merchants' service;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and reported progress.

APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LAURANCE, from the committee appointed, presented a bill making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1793; which was read twice and committed.

Mr. STEELE proposed that the bill should be postponed to the first Monday in January. He observed that he had laid a motion on the table for a committee to report a bill to reduce the military establishment of the United States. This appropriation bill makes provision for the present establishment; and if it is acted upon and passed immediately it will preclude an opportunity for discussing the merits of the proposition contained in the motion which he had made.

The motion for the first Monday in January was negatived.

Mr. STEELE then moved the last Monday in December; which being put, was carried.

INDIAN TRADE.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes. A motion to amend the fifth section by altering the clause which makes it felony for any citizen or citizens of the United States unlawfully to invade any Indian settlement, to fine and imprison for that crime, occasioned considerable debate. This motion was finally superceded by one to recommit the bill; which being carried, it was recommitted to the select committee which reported it. On motion, Mr. BALDWIN and Mr. MURRAY were added to the committee.

MONDAY, December 24.

An engrossed bill for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, was read the third time and passed.

A memorial of the merchants and traders of the borough of Wilmington, in the State of Delaware, was presented to the House and read, praying that so much of the existing revenue laws of the United States as do not allow a drawback upon goods, wares, and merchandise, unless they are exported from the district or port into which they were originally imported, may be revised and amended.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of War, accompanying the copy of a Letter from the Governor of Georgia, together with an enclosure, relative to Indian affairs in the Southern department; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

DECEMBER, 1792.]

Reimbursement of Loan.

[H. OF R.]

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before this House an account of the application of the moneys borrowed in Antwerp and Amsterdam, for the United States, within the present year.

REIMBURSEMENT OF LOAN.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to provide for a reimbursement of a Loan made of the Bank of the United States—Mr. WHITE in the Chair.

The bill was read by the Chairman, and then considered in paragraphs.

The first section being read—

Mr. GILES said he was rather in favor of postponing the subject; but if it is peculiarly advantageous to the interest of the United States to make provision for this object immediately, he suggested whether it would not be better, if possible, to provide for it without having recourse to the expedient of a new loan. He was averse to increasing the Debt of the United States by additional loans. He was rather in favor of applying the property belonging to the United States in the Bank of the United States for the purpose. He therefore moved that the section should be stricken out which provides for a loan, in order to substitute a clause providing for the sale of the shares in the Bank, owned by the United States, that the proceeds may be applied to the reimbursement of the Loan.

Mr. SEDGWICK doubted whether the motion was in order, as it went to a totally different object from any specified in the bill.

The Chairman remarked that a motion to strike out the section was in order.

Mr. FITZSIMONS observed that, if the idea of the gentleman was adopted, he was clearly of opinion that the sale of the shares would not produce a sum adequate to the object, as bringing such a number of shares to market would undoubtedly reduce the price greatly below the present market price.

Mr. GILES said he was rather desirous of a postponement of the subject; he was not prepared to decide upon it; he suspected many gentlemen in the Committee were in the same predicament; he would therefore withdraw his motion for striking out, under a persuasion that no sudden decision would take place.

Mr. FITZSIMONS stated several reasons why the Committee should proceed in the business; particularly as it involves an economical disposal of property now lying useless, and a provision for the support of the public credit; no increase of the public debt is contemplated, said he, but directly the reverse.

Mr. CLARK said he never, while he had a seat in the House, would consent to a foreign loan, unless the exigencies of the country were much greater than at present. He had rather pay seven and a half per cent. to our own citizens than five per cent. to foreigners. He objected to the indefiniteness of the section, and moved to amend it by adding a clause which should confine the Loan within the United States.

Mr. FITZSIMONS suggested to Mr. CLARK a proviso, agreeable to his own idea, that the interest be at six or eight per cent.

Mr. CLARK replied that he had no doubt it might be had at six per cent., or less.

Mr. WILLIAMSON said he wished the gentleman would point out how he would contrive to prevent foreigners from being our creditors, even by confining the Loan to the United States. At an interest of six per cent. you will in fact give a premium of above two hundred thousand dollars per annum, which might be saved by opening a Loan at five per cent. in Europe. Devise what contrivance you please, (said Mr. W.,) it must be a foreign Loan.

Mr. BOUDINOT observed that the motion of his colleague amounted to the same thing in the result as the motion for striking out the section. The Loan is now at six per cent.: to say that a new Loan shall be made at six per cent. to pay it off, is losing all the advantages proposed by the bill. He was therefore against the motion.

Mr. GILES moved that the Committee should rise and report progress. He observed that very material information was wanted, in his opinion, to enable the Committee to proceed understandingly in the matter.

The motion for the Committee's rising was put and negatived.

Mr. CLARK's motion to amend the section, by adding the word "within" before "United States," was also negatived.

The Committee proceeded through the discussion of the remaining sections.

Mr. MADISON offered several observations to show the propriety of postponing the bill for a few days, in order to the members having time to revolve in their minds several propositions which have been suggested in relation to this subject—whether by an appropriation of the sum, which it is said now lies dormant in the Treasury, whether by a sale of the shares in the Bank, or by a Loan, to provide for the object.

Mr. FITZSIMONS stated some objections to what fell from the gentleman last speaking. The gentleman's idea goes to an immediate interference with an appropriation already made, and leaves to a contingency a provision to supply its place.

Mr. MADISON replied to Mr. FITZSIMONS. He thought the gentleman offered as good a reason as he could have suggested in favor of applying the money in the Treasury to the object now in question.

Mr. GILES urged postponement. He remarked that the zeal shown by some gentlemen to precipitate the matter to a decision, amounted to an exercise of deliberation on the subject.

Mr. SEDGWICK stated several reasons which rendered it absolutely necessary that no delay should take place.

A motion being made that the Committee should rise and report the bill, the same being put, was agreed to.

The Committee rose accordingly, and reported the bill, with one amendment; which was, to strike out the word "fifteen," in the first section, referring to the time for which the Loan should be made. This amendment was agreed to by the House, and the bill laid on the table by general consent.

WEDNESDAY, December 26.

Mr. BENSON, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to provide for the allowance of interest on the sum ordered to be paid by the resolve of Congress of the 28th of September, 1785, as an indemnity to the persons therein named; which was read the first time.

REIMBURSEMENT OF LOAN.

The House proceeded to consider the bill providing for the reimbursement of a Loan made of the Bank of the United States, which lay on the table. Whereupon,

A motion was made and seconded to amend the said bill by striking out the first section, in the words following, to wit:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause to be borrowed, on behalf of the United States, a sum not exceeding two millions of dollars, at an interest not exceeding five per centum per annum, to be applied to the reimbursement of a loan made of the Bank of the United States, in pursuance of the eleventh section of the act entitled 'An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States:' Provided, That no engagement or contract shall be entered into which shall preclude the United States from reimbursing any sum or sums borrowed within — years after the same shall be lent or advanced."

Mr. STEELE declared himself in favor of the intention of the bill. He wished the honor of the country to be preserved, and its debts duly discharged, as much as any man; but he could not approve of the repeated practice of making new loans. The facility of borrowing money is mostly attended with dangerous consequences, both to individuals and to States. For his part, notwithstanding the unpopular appearance of direct taxation, he would prefer it to the system of loans. He was anxious to hear the opinions of other gentlemen, and wished the subject might be fairly discussed, in order to afford an opportunity for which, he had moved that the first section of the bill be struck out, so that, if this motion should prevail, some other plan than borrowing might be substituted.

Mr. GILES seconded the motion.

Mr. MADISON was desirous to hear the reasons that could be given by the friends of the bill for requiring so much greater a loan than the sum demandable by the Bank. He observed, that there was a large balance of money lying in the Treasury unappropriated, at least, to his knowledge. If, however, this balance was appropriated by the Executive, he wished to know it. He did not suppose but that if it was, it must have been done with propriety; and he would be one of the last men in the House to injure any existing appropriation.

Mr. SEDGWICK, who was of the committee that reported the bill, rose to reply to Mr. MADISON. He said, that the subject involved a degree of delicacy at present which perhaps it would be better not to express. It is known that money has been borrowed for certain purposes which has not yet been applied; but this money, he thought, ought not to be diverted to other purposes, without providing a substitute to replace the sum which might be diverted, and such provision ought to be made before the time when it would be wanted to answer the original appropriation. In reply to Mr. STEELE, he said, this new loan was not intended to increase the debt of the United States, but to decrease it by paying a debt bearing an interest of six per cent. with a loan at five.

Mr. MADISON said, that either the public money lying dormant in the Treasury is or is not appropriated. If it is appropriated for carrying on the Indian war, he was of opinion it could not be touched by a diversion in favor of the Bank, upon the uncertainty of having it replaced by a fresh loan to answer the original specific appropriation. Perhaps (said Mr. M.) I am ignorant of my situation; if so, I hope gentlemen will relieve me by explaining candidly the real state of the matter.

Mr. BALDWIN had recourse to the two acts for empowering the President to borrow twelve millions of dollars, and afterwards two millions. The former was to answer an existing demand against the United States; the latter was made at the Bank for another purpose, and all that is demandable is the first instalment and interest, which he was willing to have discharged, but he was opposed to replacing it by a new foreign loan. He remarked, that the United States had been regular in paying off their interest and instalments—and of the foreign debt there is only a part demandable—but the disposition of the whole is disliked; and it is in the power of the United States to alter it, by making provision for the whole amount, if they please to do so. The President is authorized to do this, provided he can do it on advantageous terms. The creditors were not consulted when this law was made, and the United States will be guilty of no breach of faith provided they pay their interest and instalments as they fall due.

Mr. GERRY went over the laws respecting the former loans, and the law for redeeming the public debt, also the act for making the loan at the Bank. From all which, he argued that the question was simply reduced to this: Whether the President shall be empowered to take up a loan at five to pay a sum borrowed at six per cent. interest, and provisionally to make use of the money obtained by loan which is at present lying inactive? And if this be not agreed to, the United States must go on paying to the Bank annually, for ten years, two hundred thousand dollars; and, at the end of that time, fifty-five thousand dollars more will have been paid there, if the President was now authorized to borrow at five per cent. The question, therefore, was, is this sum worth saving? For his part, he was against paying a higher interest anywhere than five per cent.; and, with regard to foreigners, if it was alleged that our stocks would be kept from getting out of the hands of our own citizens as much as possible, he thought this a vain expectation, for it is impossible to prevent it, so long as foreigners find it their interest to purchase.

An idea had been started of selling out part of the stock owned by the United States, as this would lower the price by throwing too great a quantity into market. He should prefer keeping it until the present disorders in Europe subsided.

Mr. WILLIAMSON did not approve of the motion, because he was opposed to the idea of selling the Bank stock belonging to the United States. He rather wished that they held twice as much property in that institution. But, if the stock was sold, it would pass into foreign hands, and the country would be drained of the specie. It would, therefore, be better to keep it in circulation in the country. It is the only thing that can be called secure. Indeed, he doubted whether that property could be honestly parted with, considering that the law incorporating the Bank specifically provides for the retaining two millions of dollars stock. The other eight millions has been subscribed for, perhaps the greatest part of it by foreigners or other agents, and now, if the motion under consideration prevails, we shall throw away out of our hands the remaining two millions. It certainly gave a security and solidity to the institution, and was an encouragement to many subscribers, the idea that the United States held a considerable share of the stock; but now, to dispose of that stock would be putting them in a worse situation than they originally were. It would have an effect something like an ex post facto law.

Mr. MADISON expressed some surprise at the arguments of the gentleman last up, because they were absolutely in direct contradiction to the gentleman's opinion, and the opinion of the Legislature, and the Reports of the Secretary of the Treasury on all former occasions; for it has hitherto been held up as a valuable and secure resource in case of emergency to have that stock to dispose of, and why shall it not be of the same quality with the stock of any other subscriber—transferable?

It is the first time (said Mr. M.) I ever heard the thing denied, that the United States should dispose of their stock whenever it became the interest of the country to do it, with equal facility as other stockholders do. I believe, however, the gentleman [Mr. WILLIAMSON] may have been right in his intentions, but he is certainly wrong in the application of his arguments. Mr. M. again expressed a desire that some candid explanation might be given respecting the appropriation of the money lying dormant in the Treasury, whether it was demanded abroad by the country to which it was due, and for which it had been borrowed. There was not any necessity for hurrying a decision on one part of the question—respecting the propriety of borrowing at five per cent. to pay off a debt at six, that could be deliberated upon without precipitation. The other part of the question involved a very different subject, that of diverting a sum already appropriated for a particular purpose, and applying it to another purpose, they paying the Bank instalment, &c., and this on no better foundation than the uncertainty of a new loan to replace the original appropriation. He declared, that he could not see how gentlemen would be able to answer to their constituents for such conduct, especially if it was originally intended to satisfy the debt or instalments due to France—a debt of justice and of gratitude. If it was intended to pay a debt to support a glorious cause, the cause of liberty, he wished it could be sent there, if possible, on the wings of the wind! It may be argued that the whole of this debt is not yet demandable; yet, as an appropriation has been made to pay it, it is presumable that it would be particularly acceptable, from the situation of France at this time. He concluded by declaring his dissent from any diversion of the appropriation, unless further light could be thrown on the subject than had yet appeared.

Mr. WILLIAMSON rose to explain. In regard to the notice which Mr. MADISON had taken of his arguments, he proved that the last-named gentleman had misunderstood him, and that he was equally anxious with him, both as to the honor of the country and the propriety of its measures.

Mr. HILLHOUSE was against the motion, and in favor of making the new loan. He said nothing as to the diversion of the money appropriated to pay a part of our engagements to France, only that it was his opinion there had been no demand made on the part of that country.

Mr. MURRAY expressed opinions very nearly similar to those of Mr. BALDWIN. He particularly noticed that the President was allowed a discretionary power to extend the loans, or not, as he should judge the interests of the country concerned. He took a general view of the arguments advanced by Mr. MADISON and Mr. WILLIAMSON, and noticed the honorable course of France.

Mr. MADISON rose again to explain in regard to the misconception of his arguments by Mr. WILLIAMSON. He was willing to admit of any reason for a diversion of the appropriation of the former loan intended to pay part of our debt to France, except one. He would admit of any reason from the Executive but one, and that was, what he had heard alleged, not in but out of Congress: "That there would ever exist a possibility of paying the debt over again." This reason he could never admit; because, although it might be vainly presumed that the present Government of France had not yet arrived at a proper stage of maturity, yet it must be evident to all the rational part of mankind that it was sufficiently established to insure it against all possibility of a retrograde motion.

Mr. GILES had seconded the motion of Mr. STEELE on this ground, that, although a sum of two hundred thousand dollars was wanted on the first of January, to pay to the Bank of the United States, yet, it did not follow from thence that two millions must be borrowed. He remarked, that no member had yet offered any explanation, on behalf of the Executive, how the money lying dormant was disposed of, or intended to be. He could not see any great advantage in borrowing a new loan, although at five per cent., when it must be considered that an agency or douceur has always been paid of from four to five per cent., over and above the interest. This premium entirely destroys the arguments of gain to the United States; for we shall lose sixty thousand dollars by it, and, until the term of fifteen years shall have arrived, we will not make a beginning of savings, according to the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury on this very subject. After some further remarks, Mr. GILES moved that the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before the House a statement of the loans and the applications thereof.

Mr. FINDLEY expressed himself in favor of the motion.

Mr. STEELE particularly observed, that, in the course of the debate, a glimmering of light had been opened on the subject of loans, which he hoped might lead to a complete investigation. Loans had originated in an intention of saving money to the public; but it was now become the duty of Congress to see how much new debt had been created, and what proportion it bore to the amount extinguished. For his part, he would rather a paltry sum of sixteen thousand dollars were lost to the United States than that the House should go on voting in the dark.

Mr. VENABLE said, that, considering the douceurs and premiums which had been paid for foreign loans at a low interest, we were now in a worse situation than before those loans had been contracted for, because they had increased the capital of our public debt eighty thousand dollars, and it will require a term of four years to bring about an equality in the interest, and to reduce it to an average of five per cent.

In reply to this, Mr. FITZSIMONS took occasion to correct a mistake which the last mentioned member had committed. The premiums and douceurs paid on different loans, he said, had not averaged more than from four to four and a half and five per cent. on the whole capital; and he called upon the House to witness whether there was not a very material difference between the capital at five per cent. and one at six per cent. It must be evident there is so great a difference in the capital that the five per cent. reduces every £100 at six per cent. to £83 6s. 8d., besides the continual and multiplied decrease produced on the reduced interest itself.

Mr. VENABLE said, the gentleman's arguments would only hold good upon a supposition that the capital was never to be paid; but it must be granted that the United States have retained the power of paying it off at any time, and in this case the arguments in favor of new loans accompanied with premium falls to the ground.

Mr. GERRY and Mr. BOUDINOT insisted that the loan contemplated would produce the great saving to the United States of $160,000 in fifteen years.

Mr. TUCKER was against striking out the whole of the first section, unless a substitute was adopted to pay off the instalment to the Bank of $200,000, but he observed, that, as there was a dividend due from the Bank upon the stock owned by the United States of $60,000, it would therefore be necessary to provide for no more than the sum of $140,000.

The question being called for, was put, upon striking out the whole of the first section, and passed in the negative—yeas 18, nays 35, as follows:

NAYS.—Fisher Ames, Robert Barnwell, Egbert Benson, Elias Boudinot, Shearjashub Bourne, Benjamin Bourne, Jonathan Dayton, Thomas Fitzsimons, Elbridge Gerry, Nicholas Gilman, Benjamin Goodhue, James Gordon, Andrew Gregg, Samuel Griffin, Thomas Hartley, James Hillhouse, Daniel Huger, Israel Jacobs, Philip Key, Aaron Kitchell, John Wilkes Kittera, Amasa Learned, George Leonard, Samuel Livermore, John Milledge, William Vans Murray, Nathaniel Niles, Theodore Sedgwick, William Smith, George Thatcher, Thomas Tudor Tucker, Jeremiah Wadsworth, Alexander White, Hugh Williamson, and Francis Willis.

Another motion was then made, and the question put, to amend the said bill by striking out, in the said first section, the words "two millions of dollars," and inserting, in lieu thereof, the words "two hundred thousand dollars."

The yeas and nays being demanded by one-fifth of the members present, there appeared—yeas 27, nays 26.

Whereupon, the SPEAKER declared himself with the nays.

Those who voted in the affirmative are—

John Baptist Ashe, Abraham Baldwin, William Findley, William B. Giles, Christopher Greenup, Andrew Gregg, Samuel Griffin, William Barry Grove, Philip Key, Aaron Kitchell, Richard Bland Lee, James Madison, John Milledge, Andrew Moore, Nathaniel Niles, Josiah Parker, Cornelius C. Schoonmaker, Israel Smith, John Steele, Jonathan Sturges, Thomas Sumpter, Thomas Tredwell, Thomas Tudor Tucker, Abraham Venable, Alexander White, Hugh Williamson, and Francis Willis.

Those who voted in the negative are—

And so the said question was lost.

Another motion was then made and seconded, to amend the said bill by striking out, in the said first section, the words "not exceeding," and inserting, in lieu thereof the words "which, including the expense, shall not exceed;" and the question being put thereupon, it was resolved in the affirmative.

Ordered, That the further consideration of the said bill be postponed until to-morrow.

THURSDAY, December 27.

A bill to provide for the allowance of interest on the sum ordered to be paid by the resolve of Congress of the 28th of September, 1785, as an indemnity to the persons therein named, was read the second time, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause this House to be furnished with a particular account of the several sums borrowed under his authority by the United States; the terms on which each loan has been obtained; the applications to which any of the moneys have been made, agreeably to appropriations; and the balances, if any, which remain unapplied. In this statement it is requested that it may be specified at what times interest commenced on the several sums obtained, and at what times it was stopped by the several payments made.

Ordered, That the said resolution be transmitted to the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES by the SPEAKER.

A petition of William Ellery, Collector of the District of Newport, in the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, was presented to the House and read, praying that the compensation allowed him by law may be increased, and rendered more adequate to his services.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, with instruction to examine the same, and report his opinion thereupon to the House.

On a motion made and seconded that the House do now proceed to the further consideration of the bill providing for the reimbursement of a Loan made of the Bank of the United States, it passed in the negative.

Mr. WHITE, from the committee to whom was committed the bill to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, reported an amendatory bill; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole House.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the said Committee; and after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto; which were read, and partly considered.

Ordered, That the further consideration of the said amendments be put off until to-morrow.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to ascertain the fees demandable on Admiralty proceedings in the District Courts of the United States, and to amend, in part, the act entitled "An act for the government and regulation of seamen in the merchants' service;" and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had again had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, do lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of War, accompanying a statement of the present organization of the troops; also, Returns of the commissioned officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates, in the service of the United States; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

FRIDAY, December 28.

A memorial of the officers and soldiers of the late New Hampshire line of the Continental Army was presented to the House and read, praying that the depreciation which accrued on the certificates of Debt granted them in reward for their military services during the late war may be made good to them, or such other relief afforded them as the present circumstances of the United States will admit; which was laid on the table.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments reported yesterday by the Committee of the Whole House to the bill to ascertain the fees demandable on Admiralty proceedings in the District Courts of the United States, and to amend, in part, the act entitled "An act for the government and regulation of seamen in the merchants' service;" and the said amendments being severally twice read, were, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House. And then, the said bill, being further amended, was, together with the amendments, ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time on Monday next.

REDUCTION OF THE ARMY.

Mr. STEELE called up his resolution laid on the table some days ago, as follows:

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill to reduce the military establishment of the United States to ——— regiments or corps, consisting each of ——— non-commissioned officers, privates and musicians, with such proportion of commissioned officers as the PRESIDENT may think proper to continue in service; and to repeal so much of an act, passed the fifth of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, entitled 'An act for making farther and more effectual provision for the protection of the frontiers of the United States,' as may contravene this intention."

Mr. STEELE, in proposing the above resolution, said, the situation of the frontiers, and the inefficiency of the measures adopted, through the medium of the War Department, to relieve them; the extreme burdens which those measures were heaping on the people, and the probability of their continuance, afforded ample scope for inquiry, and to sit silent on such an occasion, he thought, would be to partake of and support the errors from which those misfortunes may have arisen. The citizens of the United States, he said, were of a peaceable and patient disposition, and they have with cheerfulness acquiesced in the measures of the National Legislature; but they were not become so tame as to submit to immense and fruitless expenses, and the disgrace of their military character to answer any vain projects of folly and ambition, without a prospect of guaranteeing a peace. Is it not evident, said he, that plans have been persevered in without regard to common sense, by an unnecessary increase of our Army, until the indignation of the whole Continent has been roused up against it?

To elucidate this position, Mr. S. recited the expenses, charges, and increase of the War Department from its first establishment under the present Government, to its present enormous demands, which, for the year 1793, are no less, agreeably to the estimate furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury, than $1,171,719. More than double the sum necessary for the support of all the other branches of the National Government. The better to illustrate this subject of the Indian war, he entered into comparative statements of the years 1790, '91, '92, and '93. And, animadverting on the different items of calculation, he asserted, in strong terms, that they exceeded every thing that the history of the Indian wars afforded for twenty years back; he wished any gentleman to enter into an investigation and comparison of the alarming increase of the expenses of the Department, and to take a retrospect of the subject for twenty years back; and he was certain neither the Secretary of War nor any other person could account rationally for the occasion of such an establishment. There was no precedent to be found in any of the States, not one of them have a War Department; neither was it contemplated in the Constitution of the United States. Yet it has, in the short space of three or four years, been imposing on the country burdens which the people have at length expressed their abhorrence of; it has been increased $137,000 in 1789, to the extravagant demand now required, of $1,171,719 and $50,000 contingencies for the support of 1793. This is so alarming an increase, that it calls loudly for reformation, or the entire abolition of the Department, and that another system shall be adopted for the protection of the frontiers. Armies of regulars will never afford protection; they have never answered any good purpose against the Indians from the time of Braddock's defeat down to that of Major General St. Clair, although this last mentioned unfortunate expedition cost the United States an immense sum of money, and the lives of a great number of valuable officers and citizens. History and the experience of ages have proved this fact, that unwieldy armies will never be able to fight the savages in the wilderness; indeed, the Secretary of War confesses the fact in one of his reports, which Mr. S. read, wherein the Secretary accounts for the ill success of the plans, by observing, "that it was owing to the extreme activity of the enemy and our ignorance of the wilderness through which our troops had to march." But the Secretary might have also added, our entire ignorance of the mode of carrying on the war.

Here Mr. S. took occasion to observe, that this alarmingly expensive and useless Department had crept upon the country entirely from our fondness for taking up money on loans; for had it not been that the money was thus obtained with a sort of facility that was not directly felt by the people, they never would have consented to be directly taxed to support the parade of so unnecessary an establishment. This is my reason for being an enemy to loans; they deceive the citizens, and lull them for a time, in order to levy double contributions afterwards.

But it may be demanded, how are the frontiers to be protected, if the Army was disbanded? In reply to this, Mr. S. said he wished that the former two regiments might be retained to garrison the forts, and that a militia near the scene of action should be raised, who would be able to make five expeditions against the savages in a year, if necessary, instead of one solitary fruitless attempt, which, upon an average, is as much as a regular army can do; and sometimes not so much, for it does not appear that any expedition took place during the last twelve months: moreover, it is not so easy for the Indians to discover the plans and approaches of militia, as they do the slow motions of an unwieldy army, dragging their heavy artillery through the woods. The fact is, that the Indians have the best intelligence, and know every motion of the Army, and they can even calculate the time and place to meet them, and the numbers of their tribes that will be necessary to receive such a force; they will always be prepared when a regular army are to march against them. But if the business be left to a militia of the frontier inhabitants, who know the country, and have their property at stake, it would not cost the Government one-fourth part of the expense to give a complete protection, and to repel all the depredations of the savages, if that be our intention. If it be the protection and happiness of our brethren on the frontiers—if we are serious to check the progress of expense, the motion which I have brought forward will be the most effectual means, and to establish a proper Militia System. On this motion, therefore, will depend the question, whether we are to continue a fruitless warfare in the present mode for seven or ten years, or shall we adopt a better system, which will not cost one-fourth of the expense, and which would completely check the Indians; nay, it would entirely exterminate them, if that was thought to be necessary.

In order to bring the matter to a point, Mr. S. suggested, that it would be proper to disband all the troops except the two former regiments of two thousand one hundred and twenty-eight men, which would be more than sufficient to garrison all the fourteen posts on the frontier. These, with a militia, under proper regulations, and the officers appointed by the President, would be found a more certain protection. The garrisons are at Fayette, Hamilton, Steuben, Knox, Tammany, Telfair, Harmar, Franklin, Jefferson, St. Clair, Marietta, Massachusetts, Matthews, and Knoxville. Most of these are commanded by Captains, except two that are commanded by Majors: now, reducing the establishment to two thousand one hundred and eighteen non-commissioned and privates, and average them amongst the garrisons, it will give one hundred and fifty-two men for each; the sum saved by this reduction would be six hundred and twenty-four thousand six hundred and seven dollars—the difference between the appropriations for 1792 and those required for 1793.

With regard to the expense that would be incurred from militia expeditions, none of them would cost above thirty thousand dollars; and four or five of those, if made in a year, would have ten times the success and effect that could be expected from the present system. Had the Militia plan been adopted, we should not at this day hear such murmurs from our constituents, nor would the people be saddled with heavy taxes and imposts; but, on the contrary, the money that has been actually wasted would have sunk a considerable part of our National Debt. But by the system of warfare lately adopted of dragging heavy cannon and camps into a wilderness, of which we have confessed our ignorance, if it be allowed any longer, our Treasury will be exhausted, and the public revenues which the Secretary of the Treasury reported as affording a prospect of income beyond the permanent wants of Government, will not all together, be sufficient for our War Establishment; we must fly to loans, and pursue a system of ruin and distress to the country. Under these impressions, said Mr. S., I have introduced the proposition now before the House; and I entreat gentlemen to think seriously of it, for thereon, in a high degree, will depend the real protection of our frontier, the safety of our garrisons, and the ultimate ease, happiness, and tranquility of the Continent.

Mr. HARTLEY, although he did not wish to advocate the continuance of a Standing Army, yet he was averse to disbanding the troops at present, while it is known that a negotiation for a peace is going forward, and may not perhaps be brought to a decision before the Spring. It is a well known maxim in politics, that a peace can always be easiest obtained by a nation which is prepared for war. He noticed the great prudence and economy of the PRESIDENT in forming the Army into a legion; and he differed in opinion with Mr. STEELE respecting the insufficiency of regular troops. No instance could be quoted where regulars had engaged the Indians without beating them.

Mr. PARKER said he had always abhorred the idea of keeping up Standing Armies in this country; and he believed he could, from experience, demonstrate that it was an unwise measure at the commencement of the present Government; for it answered no better purpose than throwing out a hint to the British and Spanish Governments, on our Northern and Southern frontiers, to increase their forces, and even to administer countenance and support to the Indians, which they never would have thought of doing, but for our vain attempt at military parade. He mentioned a letter which had been written by Lord Dorchester to the Indians, informing them "that Prince Edward had arrived with a number of chosen warriors to protect them," meaning against the United States.

Thus, said Mr. P., we have been warring with our finances for the last three years, by keeping up an Army in imitation of European plans, which are formed in countries altogether unanalogous to America in every possible view. The consequences have been unsuccessful, and produced military disgraces, by sending into the field a collection of beings, collected from stews and brothels and from the most unprincipled of their species, to fight against Indians well supported on both sides, and fighting, as they do, for their property, their hunting ground, their wives, and children, instead of calling forth the militia, the natural strength of the country. But the present plan has involved us in such difficulties that we are not now able to provide for the payment of our debts, without the medium of loans; nay, we are now called on for a small sum of two hundred thousand dollars at the Bank, which would have been easily paid out of the surplus in the Treasury, were it not that our finances have been exhausted by those ill-judged expeditions under General Harmer and General St. Clair. He mentioned the naked, starved appearance of the men who were sent out—with shoes that would not last three days, clothes that did not half cover their miserable bodies from the inclemency of the weather, and food sometimes not fit for dogs. He could mention the particulars, if required, of some other very abominable abuses, but refrained from it at present. He concluded by expressing the same opinion of militia that Mr. S. had done; and, with regard to the starved soldiery who had appeared in the woods, they were despised so much by the Indians, that they called them Coat-men, and shot them down like wild turkeys.

Mr. FITZSIMONS was apprehensive that it would be a dangerous experiment, so suddenly to alter the system of defence already adopted. He remarked, that when Mr. STEELE had stated the War Department to have cost the United States three millions five hundred and forty thousand dollars, he had committed a great mistake, for there was one million one hundred and seventy-one thousand dollars of that sum not yet granted. [Mr. STEELE explained, that he had gone by the estimates for the appropriations proposed, &c.] Mr. FITZSIMONS did not wish to advocate a Standing Army; and if any better mode of defence for the frontiers could be digested, he would be amongst the foremost who would agree to it.

Mr. WHITE could not entirely approve of the motion for striking out, unless a proper substitute for defence was fairly brought forward.

Mr. WILLIAMSON said, it was not disbanding an army of men, but the disbanding an army of paper, that he conceived to be the object of the motion, and it should have his support. He mentioned an affair between ninety militia and two hundred and forty Indians, wherein the militia received them much better than any of the regulars could boast of having done!

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, reverted to a clause in the law which empowers the PRESIDENT either to raise those three additional regiments, or to forbear to raise them, or discharge them, &c., provided he thought it consistent with the safety of the country. From this, Mr. S. said it was evident there was a sort of indelicacy in the motion, as it implies a doubt that the PRESIDENT might fail in this instance, or vary from his usual line of prudence.

Mr. DAYTON said, he would vote for referring the motion to a Committee of the Whole, although he disapproved of it. He should not have risen, had he not heard from the two North Carolina members the strangest perversion of argument and the most extraordinary reasoning. The gentleman who has brought forward the motion, said Mr. D., has decried every idea of energy and efficacy in regular, disciplined troops, considering them not only inefficient, but contemptible, when employed against Indians; and, to confirm this assertion, he has instanced the expedition under General St. Clair, when it is well known that there were not, in fact, two companies of regular disciplined infantry among them. The other gentleman [Mr. WILLIAMSON] has extravagantly commended the back-country militia, and extolled them for their efficiency and success in Indian warfare; and instances the affair of a rencontre between Major Adair, with ninety militia, against two hundred and forty Indians. In reply to this, Mr. D. felt himself compelled to remark, that that affair did not appear so successful in his mind; for those very militia were unquestionably surprised and beaten, inasmuch as they were driven into a corner, until the Indians captured all their horses and other property in their camp; and what is still more disgraceful, one half of the Major's party deserted him at the commencement of the action, and secured themselves within their garrison.

Whilst he was up, Mr. D. would further observe on the extraordinary speech of the mover of the question, that it was such as no person could have ever expected to hear within the walls of that House. It seemed to be calculated to prejudice the minds of the people against the whole Administration; and it appeared still the more extraordinary that such a speech should come from a gentleman who so lately expressed the nicest delicacy in matters of order and decency; for, in this instance, he has committed the greatest breach of decorum and propriety, by a direct censure of the Secretary of War, the PRESIDENT, and both Houses of the Legislature. [Here several members called Mr. DAYTON to order.] He proceeded, however, and appealed to the House, whether he had not drawn a just picture of the expressions of the gentleman from North Carolina. The very calculations which he has so laboriously produced have been questioned by other members. In regard to the surprise expressed by the gentleman at the increase of the War Department from 1791 to '92 and '93, it was not so strange that five thousand men would require greater supplies than two thousand. Yet the gentleman is surprised at the increase of expense, and seems to imply that abuses have been committed; but if an increase of expense for protecting the frontiers has accrued, the censure ought to fall on the Legislature for directing it by their laws, and not upon the Executive, who are merely the instruments for carrying them into effect.

Upon the whole, Mr. D., however he might himself be in favor of a reduction of the Army, if it stood simply on its own merits, yet, as it now struck him, it being connected with some recent circumstances, he would therefore oppose it as tending only to embarrass the Executive in their attempts towards a pacification. Moreover, he said he knew the temper of Indians so well, by having lived amongst them, that there was not a nation on earth more extravagant in their demands, when they saw the force against them was lessening. So that what is intended by the motion for reduction at present, as economical, may turn out to be, in the end, the most expensive of any.

Mr. WADSWORTH was also against the motion; and Mr. AMES closed the debate by a few observations on the necessity of committing to a Committee of the Whole, as there would be no other way of answering the industrious calculations of the mover.

The question on committal was carried, and made the order of the day for next Wednesday.

MONDAY, December 31.

A petition of Isaiah Thomas, of Worcester, in the State of Massachusetts, praying that printing types, of foreign manufacture, imported into the United States, may be exempted from the duty imposed on them by law; and that certain bonds, to a considerable amount, given by him to the Collector of the District of Boston, for the payment of the duties on printing types already imported, may be cancelled.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, with instruction to examine the same, and report his opinion thereupon to the House.

A memorial of the officers of the late Massachusetts line of the Continental Army, in behalf of themselves and the soldiers of the said line, was presented to the House and read, praying that the depreciation which accrued on the certificates of Debt granted them for military services during the late war, may be made good to them, or such other relief afforded them as the present circumstances of the United States will admit.

Ordered, That the said memorial do lie on the table.

Mr. WILLIAMSON, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to amend an act entitled "An act establishing a Mint, and regulating the coins of the United States," so far as respects the coinage of copper; which was received, read twice, and committed.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee to whom was referred the petition of a number of the inhabitants of St. Vincennes, on the Wabash, together with a letter from the Governor of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, accompanying the same. Whereupon,

Resolved, That the survey directed by the resolve of the late Congress of the 29th of August, 1788, of the lands ceded by the State of Virginia to the United States in the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio, and confirmed to the French and Canadian inhabitants and other settlers of the Kaskaskias, St. Vincennes, and the neighboring villages, who, on or before the year 1783 had settled there, and had professed themselves citizens of Virginia, be made at the expense of the United States.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution; and that Mr. LIVERMORE, Mr. MUHLENBERG, and Mr. LEONARD, do prepare and bring in the same.

Mr. GOODHUE, from the committee appointed, presented a bill relative to claims against the United States not barred by any act of limitation, and which have not been already adjusted; which was read twice and committed.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill or bills to explain the act entitled "An act to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States," in respect to the taking bail in criminal cases; and that Mr. WHITE, Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, and Mr. ISRAEL SMITH, be the said committee.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1793; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made some progress therein.

Resolved, That the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of War, be directed to lay before this House lists of the several persons employed in the offices of their respective Departments, with the salaries allowed to each.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee to whom were referred the petitions of a number of persons, praying to be placed on the list of pensioners of the United States; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

FEEs IN ADMIRALTY CASES.

The bill to ascertain the fees demandable in cases of Admiralty proceedings in the Courts of the United States, being read the third time, and the question being on its passage—

Mr. WILLIAMSON said, the bill appeared to him to be essentially defective; one leg was cut away, and it limped badly on the other. He therefore wished it not to pass. The Judiciary System required amendment. His constituents were exposed to innumerable difficulties. Respecting seizures, they had nearly ceased, owing to the perplexities thrown in the way by the regulations of courts.

Mr. W. SMITH acknowledged the bill was not so good a one as he could have wished; but he could not conceive how any thing could limp on one leg. And its mutilated state may be attributable to the gentleman who now opposes its passage. Mr. S. did not think a sufficient reason had been given against its passage. It originated on the petition of upwards of sixty respectable merchants of the city of Charleston, who complain of the enormous fees to which they are subjected; and as the bill will afford them relief, without doing injury to any one, he hoped it would pass.

The bill passed accordingly.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 1, 1793.

Mr. WHITE, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to explain an act entitled "An act to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States," in respect to taking bail in criminal cases; which was read twice and committed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to provide for the allowance of interest on the sum ordered to be paid by the resolve of Congress of the 28th of September, 1785, as an indemnity to the persons therein named; and, after some time spent therein, the SPEAKER resumed the Chair, and Mr. WHITE reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto.

Ordered, That the said bill be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee on the memorial of John Tucker, late Clerk of the Supreme Court of the United States, which was made on the 8th of March last. Whereupon,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill providing for the allowance and payment of _____ dollars to the said John Tucker, to compensate him for his expenses and services, and for money paid by him as Clerk of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Ordered, That Mr. SEDGWICK, Mr. MURRAY, and Mr. BALDWIN, be a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to authorize the settlement of the accounts of Lewis Garanger, for military services during the late war; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made an amendment thereto; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

COINAGE BILL.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the Copper Coinage bill, (Mr. WHITE in the chair.) The object of this bill is to alter the weight of the copper coin as stated in the former act. After some discussion, the blanks specifying the weight of the cent and half cent were filled—the first with 8 pennyweights 16 grains, the other with 4 pennyweights 8 grains.

Mr. BOUNDNOT, after remarking that the artists who had exhibited specimens of the figure of Liberty on the several samples of coin which he had seen all differed in their conceptions on this occasion; for the sake, therefore, of uniformity, he moved to add a clause to the present bill, providing that, in lieu of the figure of Liberty, the head of Columbus should be substituted. Mr. B. supported his motion by some pertinent remarks on the character of Columbus, and the obligations the citizens of the United States were under to honor his memory.

Mr. CLARK was in favor of the alteration.

Mr. WILLIAMSON and Mr. LIVERMORE objected to it.

On the question being put, the motion was negatived.

The Committee then rose and reported the bill; which the House ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

REPORT ON PETITIONS FOR PENSIONS.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee to whom were referred the petitions of a number of persons praying to be placed on the list of pensioners of the United States; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had again had the said report under consideration, and made several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

And then the said report being further amended, to read as follows:

Resolved, That, in order to prevent the admission of improper claims, and to facilitate the allowance of such as are well founded, it is expedient to repeal the second, third, and fourth sections of the act entitled 'An act to provide for the settlement of the claims of widows and orphans barred by the limitations heretofore established, and to regulate the claims to invalid pensions,' and to provide that, in future, the claims for invalid pensions shall be regulated in the manner following, to wit:

"1st. That all evidence relative to invalids shall be taken upon oath before the Judge of the District in which such invalids reside, or before any three persons specially authorized by commission from the said Judge.

"2d. That the evidence relative to any claimant must prove decisive disability to have been the direct effect of known wounds, received while in the actual line of his duty, in the service of the United States, during the late war; that this evidence must be the affidavits of the commanding officer, or surgeon of the ship, regiment, corps, or company, in which such claimant served, or two other credible witnesses, to the same effect, setting forth the time and place of such known wound.

"3d. That every claimant shall be examined by two physicians, upon oath, to be authorized by commission from the said Judge, who shall report in writing their opinion of the nature of the said disability, and in what degree it prevents the claimant from obtaining his livelihood by labor.

"4th. That every claimant shall produce evidence of the time of his leaving the service of the United States, and of his being honorably discharged therefrom. He must also produce evidence of three reputable freeholders of the city, town, or county, in which he resided for the two years immediately after he left the service, as aforesaid, of the existence of his disability during that period, and ascertaining, of their own knowledge, the mode of life, employment, labor, or means of support, of the claimant.

"5th. That the said claimant must produce the evidence of two credible witnesses of the continuance of his disability from the expiration of the said two years to the time of his application.

"6th. That each claimant should show a good and sufficient cause why he did not apply to the State in which he resided, on or before the 11th of December, 1788, the time limited for applications of this nature.

"7th. That the evidence of no claimant should be admitted whose case had been rejected by any State prior to the aforesaid 11th of December, 1788.

"8th. That the reasonable allowance to such commissioners and physicians aforesaid for examining the claims of invalids shall be made by the ———, and paid out of such contingent funds as the President of the United States may direct.

Resolved, That the said Judge of the District shall transmit a list of such claims, accompanied by the evidence herein directed, to the Secretary for the Department of War, who shall examine the muster rolls and other evidences of the late war, in order to prove the services of the said claimants; and the said Secretary shall make a statement of the cases of the said claimants to Congress, with such circumstances and remarks as may be necessary, in order to enable them to take such order thereon as they may judge proper."

It was, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolutions; and that Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, Mr. BENJAMIN BOURNE, and Mr. LEE, do prepare and bring in the same.

WEDNESDAY, January 2.

Ordered, That the memorials of the late officers and soldiers of the lines of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, and Maryland, which lay on the table, be referred to the consideration of a Committee of the Whole House on next Monday week.

An engrossed bill to amend an act entitled "An act establishing a Mint, and regulating the coins of the United States," so far as respects the coinage of copper, was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill to provide for the allowance of interest on the sum ordered to be paid by the resolve of Congress of the 26th of September, 1785, as an indemnity to the persons therein named, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. AMES, from the committee to whom was referred the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the petition of Joseph Henderson, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee to whom was referred the petition of Ebenezer Cowell, which was made on the 3d of February last. Whereupon,

Resolved, That the prayer of the said petition cannot be granted.

Mr. SPENCER, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to compensate John Tucker; which was received, read twice, and committed.

Military Establishment.

[H. OF R.]

MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the motion of the 28th ultimo for reducing the Military Establishment of the United States.

Mr. WADSWORTH rose and observed, that he had pledged himself to the House last Friday to show that the calculations of the gentleman from North Carolina were not true; and, if true, that the inferences drawn from them were not correct. There was a material difference (he said) between the appropriations quoted by the gentleman and those which he would now read to the House. Here he read a statement which he had prepared, from which it would appear that Mr. STEELE had overrated the contingencies, hospitals, quartermasters, forage, cavalry, ordnance, pay, and subsistence, each of them.

The total difference between Mr. STEELE's and Mr. WADSWORTH's calculations, from this representation, was $27,080 dollars in the year 1790.

In like manner, Mr. W. read his calculations for 1791. On comparing which with those of Mr. STEELE, he said there was a difference in the total of $252,312; and in the total of 1792, he showed a difference of $567,530. He also particularly objected to Mr. STEELE's statements of the ordnance expense for 1793, which had been called $23,000; but that sum, although it comes under the head of ordnance in the estimate, is not altogether appropriated for the purchase of cannon; the whole amount of the expense of cannon, he said, had been very trifling—about $700 or $800. Having proceeded thus far in attempting to controvert the calculations of the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. W. said, it would indeed have been an alarming thing to the United States, had they been founded in reality. But the gentleman had not confined himself to misstatements—he had gone further; for he had “lamented the necessity of quoting even truths from that office”—the War Office. Here Mr. W. stated that the quotation which Mr. STEELE had made from a report of the Secretary of War had not been correctly quoted. After Mr. W. had thus represented Mr. STEELE's calculations as erroneous, and his quotations as misstated, he said that the House ought to beware of not being led astray by them. He next observed, that the gentleman had laid a great deal of blame of the present hostilities between the United States and the Indians, and the expense attending them, to the War Department. But Mr. W. conceived that there were other causes to be assigned for the Indian war, There had never been a day, from the first settlement of America to the present moment, without our being at war with the Indians, in one place or another. The history of the country, the resolves of the old Congress, every book published by Congress, show this to have been the case. [Here he read some quotations from the resolves of 1784, to show the appropriations for defraying the expenses of Indian wars.] He wished the House to take a retrospect of the subject, from the beginning of those troubles down to the late application for assistance from the National Government by the Governor of Georgia. Although they have three thousand men on the frontier of that State, yet it is not found sufficient, and the Indians have driven them in. Indeed, there has been a time when the town of Savannah has been obliged to keep a guard.

It was not his intention to introduce commendations of the officer at the head of the War Department, but he thought it proper to observe, that he is not to be blamed on account of the expenses referred to. He is no more than an instrument acting under the Supreme Executive. It is the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES who has found it necessary and proper to recommend the establishment of a military force. It is, therefore, not the Secretary's, it is the PRESIDENT's war; and to assert that the Secretary has had any undue influence with the Legislature, would be altogether false; for, on the contrary, his reports have been treated with disrespect in this House. Was not his report at New York ridiculed, and called “preaching,” &c., because it was in favor of peace, and spoke with great humanity respecting the hardships often inflicted by the whites on the Indians? Indeed, the Secretary of War has been uniform in his endeavors to bring about a durable peace. This, however desirable an object, has been found hitherto impracticable, and the Indians have lately carried their depredations to so great a length that the PRESIDENT has judged it necessary to repel them by force. They have murdered in cold blood our ambassadors of peace, whilst holding a flag of truce in one hand and reaching the other out in friendship to the Indians. Perhaps they may have been excited to this degree of barbarity by many causes. It is hard to determine which are the greatest aggressors—the settlers on the frontiers or the Indians. The murder of the Moravian Indians, the proclamation of Congress against our own people, all show that the Indians have ground for complaint.

Here Mr. W. recapitulated the affairs of the banditti at Fort St. Vincennes; the representations of Judge Innis, of Kentucky, from 1783 to 1790, respecting the people there who could not be restrained from the commission of crimes against the peace of the country. From these causes and the common fatality of the times, our attempts towards peace have proved abortive, and the war has been prolonged, but the Secretary is entirely innocent of promoting it.

In regard to the other arguments of the gentleman [Mr. STEELE] respecting the militia, that they would afford either a cheaper or better defence for the frontiers, he had his doubts.

Mr. W. now went over the whole history of the frontier wars; a line of posts was once established and garrisoned by militia, yet they could not prevent the Indians from coming within sixty miles of Winchester, and murdering, scalping, and plundering the women and children. After the peace of 1762, the Indians drove in the militia, and advanced as far as Cumberland and Carlisle, in the State of Pennsylvania.

But Colonel Boquet, with the remains of two regiments of regular troops, who had just before arrived from the West Indies, marched against the savages, and hired pack-horses to carry some of his sick men. With these regulars, Colonel Boquet fought them and drove them with the bayonet from one end of the country to the other. The battle began at one o'clock the first day and lasted until night, and was renewed the next morning with superior force by the Indians; yet they were entirely discomfited. This news went to Fort Pitt and Virginia, and revived the spirits of the country. Virginia raised more troops—and Colonel Boquet dictated a peace to the savages.

These instances furnished sufficient arguments to show the superiority of regular troops over militia. But he could mention many others, viz: General Hartman, with eight hundred chosen men, giving a total defeat to the Indians; Colonel Willet's attack and defeat of them; and General Sullivan's affair in South Carolina.

As to the defeat of Harmar and St. Clair, their men ought not to be reckoned regular troops. They were raw recruits, undisciplined, &c. But even they stood better than the militia; for the militia ran away, and those who remained to fight the savages fell, to their honor be it spoken, whilst the militia, who were the advanced guard, ran and threw away their guns, nay, their coats.

Upon the whole, the balance of argument, Mr. W. thought, must appear in favor of regular troops.

He further took occasion to animadvert on what Mr. WILLIAMSON had said, when that gentleman expressed himself so strongly in favor of the militia under Major Adair. That officer, Mr. W. observed, had been a Continental officer, and from his own words, it appeared that he had no very great opinion of the militia, for they had fled to the garrison; and the Indians obtained their ends, notwithstanding the reception given by Major Adair. Theirs was the triumph, and when they retired, it seems to have been not so much a matter of necessity, as a thing of choice, on their part. The loss of horses, one hundred, perhaps, and the expense of this affair, amounted to a much greater sum than any regular troops would have cost. The party under Major Adair, supposing it to consist of a hundred men, cost one hundred dollars a day, reckoning the attendant circumstances—and considering it, as Mr. W. did, a complete defeat—for there are no circumstances to prove that it was otherwise—the militia having deserted him and left the few regulars he had exposed to the whole of the danger.

Mr. W. did not stop here in his details of militia disgraces—he recounted many other cases. He mentioned the Grant's expedition against the Cherokees, &c. And still he drew a balance against the successes of the militia; for, he said, they had constantly been defeated, and the country left exposed to the depredations of the enemy.

Much has been said, observed Mr. W., of Clark and Sevier's successes. They, indeed, afford an exception to the cases above mentioned; but how far were they successful? The immense expense of men and money, and the interruption given to the agriculture of the country by calling away from their business so many industrious citizens, is a thing beyond the power of calculation; for my part, said he, I do not know figures enough to count it up. For the truth of this position, and for the enormous waste and expense incurred by militia, he appealed to one of the members [Col. PARKER] on the other side of the House, who had experience in the matter, whether it was not absolutely impossible either to bring militia under proper discipline, or prevent their enormous waste. A whole brigade of regular troops would not cost so much as one regiment of militia, to a country. The militia of Kentucky have cost more blood and wealth than all the American war; when the circumstances are considered of calling out men from the tillage of the field, &c. It is enormous the number of lives, and the aggregate loss is countless. The causes of these things are, want of order and discipline, &c. And those causes have produced an universal reprobation of the war establishment; but all those who condemn, are not well acquainted with those causes; they judge from hearing only one-half of the truth in our newspapers. It is supposed a peace can be easily effected, but I know of no peace that has not been effected by force; for, although promises have been made and peace often treated for with the Indians, yet they have as constantly broken those promises. This is a good reason for keeping up the present force of the United States. We are now able to meet the Indians and demand a safe peace. But the gentleman from North Carolina calls our establishment a mere military parade, which it is said by another gentleman [Mr. PARKER] will only tend to rouse the Spaniards and the British, &c.

He went on quoting the conduct of the Indians and their threatening manner, when they told you, "go to your own side of the Ohio," &c. What language do they now hold out? But I am not at liberty, said Mr. W., to mention it, as it was confidentially communicated to this House, and read with our doors shut. However, it is well known to all the members present, the insolence of that language. For my part, I have little hopes of a peace from any promises of the Indians; and although a negotiation is said to be upon the carpet, I can never depend upon the promises of savages who have so often broken them.

In speaking of the recruits that have been lately raised for the regular army, Mr. W. opposed his opinion to that of Mr. PARKER, who mentioned them in such contemptible terms as having been collected from the stews and brothels of the cities, &c. For his part, Mr. W. had often seen them, and he believed they were equal, if not superior in spirit and appearance, to most of the soldiery during the British war, and better than the soldiery were at the close of the war, with some exceptions, such as respects the men who cost £300 each. Before he could quit the subject, he begged leave to mention another instance of the efficacy of regular troops; it was the affair of General Wayne's surprise, when the light-horse dismounted, and cut the militia to pieces, and the infantry drove them off at the point of the bayonet.

Military Establishment.

[H. OF R.]

He ridiculed the idea of calling out a militia upon every emergency. Where are they to be formed? In Pennsylvania it would be attended with a tenfold loss, if they must quit their daily labor. He would admit that the character of the Kentucky militia had been brave and intrepid; but there was still occasion for a new war, and no ultimate protection afforded to the frontier.

The Governor of North Carolina had complained of a friendly Indian being murdered, &c. On the whole, he thought it improper to take militia to fight Indian warriors. He admitted that some abuses might have been practised in the regular army, but they were as little, if not less, than in any other army he could remember.

He insisted that the scheme of the Department of War was not a scheme of the Secretary, but a scheme of the United States from the PRESIDENT down to the members of the Legislature, and the meanest of their constituents. He took a retrospect of the great skill of the PRESIDENT after Braddock's defeat. The PRESIDENT must be the best judge of the disposition of Indians, and the best way of treating with them; he approves the scheme of the present war, and shall we imprudently attempt to change his plan, by sending out a few men to be knocked on the head by the Indians, as those coat men were? so called by the gentlemen from Virginia, [Mr. PARKER,] but instead of coat-men, he Mr. W. thought they might also have been called petty-coat men, &c. He finished his observations by again remarking, that the calculations of the gentleman [Mr. STEELE] who had introduced the motion for reducing the present war establishments were founded in error, and ought not to have any weight with the House.

Mr. STEELE.—When the House have deliberated upon the merits of the gentleman's arguments and the truth of my statements; and when they have decided the question, I will submit to their decision; but, in the mean time, I insist that my calculations are founded on the reports of the Secretary and the public printed documents on the table, of the appropriations and laws, &c. I wish the gentleman [Mr. WADSWORTH,] had told us where he has found those papers, from which he attempts to controvert such authentic documents as I have quoted. I wish he had made the House understand them; for my part, they appear unintelligible.

Mr. WADSWORTH said it was from the laws.

Mr. STEELE explained some things in his former statements; and in reply to some suggestions that might be thrown out with respect to his indelicate mode of attacking the Secretary of War, or the PRESIDENT, he defied any member to show that he had acted beyond the line of his duty; or that he had ever shown any disrespect toward the PRESIDENT. On the contrary, he was of opinion that that gentleman's character would for ever be secured against all the possible attacks of ingratitude or malice, &c. He also used some other very handsome expressions on this occasion. But whilst he was ready to declare these things, and to prove that he had no personal intentions of injuring the Secretary of War; yet, he would not suffer himself to be deprived of his privilege, whilst he had the honor of a seat in that House; and, in the present instance, he thought it his duty to hold up his opposition against the rapid increase of expenses in all the Departments of Government, which he said were grown to an enormous burden upon the people, and unwarranted by the Constitution; that they, therefore, ought to be immediately checked. He hoped, for the future, gentlemen would confine their arguments to measures, and not apply them to persons. He sat down, for the present, with this proviso: that he would reserve to himself the right of answering to what might be advanced against his proposition, which he could prove to be salutary; and that the present system is fundamentally wrong.

Mr. HARTLEY was against adopting the motion under the present circumstances of the country, and he entered into a particular investigation of the merits of the question. When the last law for the more effectual protection of the frontiers passed, the subject now under consideration was very fully and ably discussed, and the gentlemen who were averse to the augmentation had several alterations made to satisfy them.

Instead of the PRESIDENT's being obliged to raise the whole of the three regiments, he was to exercise his discretion either to make the augmentation complete, or raise a part, and he had authority to disband them after being raised. The 12th section of that law is thus expressed: "It shall be lawful for the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES to forbear to raise, or to disband after they shall be raised, the whole or any part of the said three additional regiments, in case events shall in his judgment render his so doing consistent with the public safety."

We should therefore consider whether circumstances have so materially changed since that time as to render it proper that the Legislature should interfere, repeal the powers given to the PRESIDENT, and discharge the three regiments. This necessarily leads us first to view the situation of our finances, and the state of the frontiers at and immediately before the time of passing the law. The extent of our revenue was not as well known then as at present, and every good man deprecated the misfortune which obliged him to increase the taxes. The war was a disagreeable one, but necessary, if peace could not otherwise be obtained. The Legislature considered the expense, and were of opinion that we had means and abilities to defray the same. Many murders and ravages had been committed by the savages on the frontiers. One army had suffered in the year 1790, and nearly a whole army cut off on the 4th of November, 1791. And we had every reason to suppose that the Indians would act in great force against us. Our finances are still respectable. It is true, I should be happy if we could apply the money toward discharging the national debt already contracted, but the unfortunate situation of our frontiers prevent it. War, though an evil, may (from the present disposition of the world) be sometimes necessary, when nations are unreasonable and justice cannot be otherwise obtained.

Hostilities have lately been committed on our troops commanded by Major Adair, and several of the Southern tribes show themselves inimical, and we have no absolute assurances that we shall have peace in the Spring. The agreement by some tribes to a suspension of hostilities, was only convenient to them as it protected their families for the Winter.

The great object of the additional armament was to obtain peace: this is not yet effected. May we promise ourselves more success in negotiation by laying down our arms, or by retaining them? History is in favor of the latter. Indeed I hold it as a maxim, that the nation which is prepared for war can most easily obtain peace. For my own part, I can discover no existing causes for altering the system established by the act to which I have before referred. The expense has been made a very serious objection. It ought to have weight; but where measures have been proper, America has not regarded it. She has freely expended her treasure to support her rights. We are bound in justice and honor to protect our fellow-citizens on the frontiers; we demand from them an excise. They require from the General Government protection. I am for making peace with all the Indians upon reasonable terms; but any country which has been fairly purchased from the Indians, they should not be permitted to repossess or hold by conquest. If an offensive war be necessary, says the gentleman from North Carolina, regular troops are not the most proper to carry it on. They are more expensive, and unfit to meet the savages of the wilderness. As to the expense, I have partly answered before. But if the gentleman is to have five expeditions in one year, I believe he would find that his calculations are not correct: a misfortune to either detachments or party would bear very hard upon the district they came from; the partial loss of regulars would not be equally felt, very few of them having families.

I have a high opinion of the backwoods riflemen, but I am confident that we cannot certainly rely upon their turning out as often as they might be wanted; we could not rely on such uncertainty; and yet this is offered as a favorite project. If you cannot rely upon them, you may say that the ordinary militia can be drafted. You would find them unfit for such a service; they would in general be composed of substitutes, inexperienced and undisciplined, and it would be unfair to take them all from the frontiers, and some of the States, or at least one, have no militia laws. I am for retaining the regular troops.

The PRESIDENT has practised economy in organizing the troops voted for, and I am told they have made considerable progress in discipline; they are formed into legionary corps, composed of horse, riflemen, light-infantry, and battalion-men. The three former will be fit for active service in the field, the latter for the common duties in the camp or garrison. I will allow volunteers and militia their full credit; but I do not think the regular troops merit the disparagement attempted. Volunteer corps have not been free from misfortunes. Colonel Crawford, at the head of five hundred volunteers from Virginia and Pennsylvania, was defeated in the Western country, and he was burnt at the stake. General Braddock, it is said, was obstinate, and his European troops were undisciplined for such a service. The army under General St. Clair was lost, because the men were undisciplined and unfitted for that service. I can mention several instances where regular troops have successfully penetrated the Indian country, among warlike tribes, with success: Colonel Montgomery, into the Cherokees; Colonel Armstrong, to the Kittanig; Colonel Boquet's campaign of 1763 and 1764. Three detachments of the American army, in the year 1778, (one under the command of General Broadhead, one under Lieutenant Colonel Butler, and the last commanded by your humble servant,) penetrated the country possessed by the Six Nations. Neither of the detachments was large, and the last had to contend against superior numbers. In General Sullivan's campaign, the year following, his van-guard beat an equal, if not a superior number of Indians. I might mention the Roman legions: they almost constantly were successful against those they called Barbarians, until their enemies adopted the Roman discipline. I have a high opinion of the personal bravery and prowess of an Indian, but I do deny that they can act to the best advantage in large bodies. They have not an experience of that kind; disciplined troops would have the advantage. I reprobate the idea of a standing army, which might endanger the liberty of this country; but I consider the troops contemplated in the act of Congress to be absolutely necessary, until peace shall be obtained, and therefore shall vote against a reduction. Every step has been taken, and I dare say will be taken, by the PRESIDENT, to procure a peace without bloodshed. Our messengers of peace have, in some places, been murdered, and yet he has sent messengers to others.

Mr. CLARK.—One would suppose, from the style of the debate, that we were going to abandon the frontiers, the safety of the country, &c., and to disband the whole of the army: for, the arguments of those gentlemen who are opposed to the motion seem to be calculated to mislead the House, in that way, and to prove that the question under consideration is for reducing the whole of the troops now existing. But this is so far from being the true state of the matter, that it is not even contemplated to disband a single man of them; it only goes to the prevention of raising any more troops, which, perhaps, would be the safest policy under the present circumstances and temper of the United States. There are about three thousand three hundred effective men already raised, who are sufficient to garrison the forts on the frontier, agreeably to the gentleman's statement who introduced the motion; and, indeed, it seems as if they were fully competent, if we believe the report that the whole of the Indian force, at the time of meeting General St. Clair, and when they exerted themselves to the utmost, was but one thousand two hundred warriors.

Mr. C. made some further remarks on the sentiments which had been expressed by the gentleman last up; and, in speaking of the discretionary powers vested in the PRESIDENT, he was of opinion that the situation of the Chief Magistrate in this respect was extremely delicate: for, supposing he might be inclined to stop the recruiting service, and reduce the war establishment; and supposing the frontiers to be again harassed, it might be charged to him for not having kept up the legal complement of men. Under this impression, Mr. C. wished that some way could be adopted of conveying to the PRESIDENT the sentiments of the Legislature on this subject, without the tedious form of a law.

MR. PARKER.—The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HARTLEY] has been reading a section of the law, to inform us of the discretionary powers vested in the PRESIDENT, which we have heard from other members before he rose, and which we all knew as well as himself. I am sorry to hear gentlemen, when they have no other resource of argument left, so often resorting to the name of the PRESIDENT, to carry their measures; and yet, in the present instance, I much doubt whether those sentiments are avowed by the PRESIDENT, which have been laid to his charge in the course of this debate: however, if they were really so, this is not a sufficient reason to silence me, or to prevent me from delivering my own sentiments, and those of my constituents who sent me here to do so. He vindicated the character of the militia, in opposition to the disgraceful picture which Mr. WADSWORTH had painted of this respectable class of citizens, whom he (Mr. P.) insisted were always more spirited soldiery, and fitter for fighting the Indians than the regulars, although they did not always move at the sound of a trumpet or beat of a drum, which were necessary to rouse the attention of heart-broken, mercenary troops, who seldom act but from force, or fear of the whipping-post. Militia were not so well acquainted with military show, or the display of columns; neither did the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, when acting Major of a regiment little better than militia, find that the doctrine of tactics were of any great service to him.

Mr. P. further mentioned, that the forerunner's of General Burgoyne's army were taken by General Stark's militia near Bennington; and the capture of the whole of Burgoyne's army was chiefly brought about by militia, as General Lincoln had very few regular troops at the time of his surrender. In short, the militia bore a conspicuous share of almost every engagement during the war. At Trenton, the men who took the Hessians were little other than militia, as they had been raised but a short time before. Mr. P. could vouch for them, as he was a witness of their activity and bravery. Another instance offered of their success at Charleston, after it was taken by the British and the regulars drove off; the militia kept possession of the country and supported themselves. He also remembered having been called away from the regular army in the North to take the command of some militia in Virginia, who supported themselves for twelve months without either pay or provisions from the United States; and yet they were never once defeated or disgraced, neither did they leave the country unprotected and exposed; and all they received for their services was certificates which necessity obliged them to alienate at three shillings in the pound, to persons who are now in possession of them drawing an annual interest of nearly as much, and who never perhaps had a good wish toward the Revolution. He next quoted the militia under Colonel Mercer, at Yorktown, who were successful in a skirmish with the enemy under Tarleton. These and several other arguments in favor of the militia, whom he still maintained to be the best security of a country, were used by Mr. P. He would not advocate the raising them from all parts of the United States, but only in such places as the safety of the frontiers required it most: they were not, to be sure, accustomed to the display of the column, &c., but they knew how to take the Indians in a proper way through the woods.

It gave him pain to hear the character of the militia so much traduced, and it also was a painful reflection to think of the two disgraceful defeats of our armies under Generals Harmar and St. Clair; indeed, it would have a strange appearance to the world, to think that this country is inhabited by the same men who lived in 1776. He repeated what he had before asserted, that most of the present regulars were collected from the stews and brothels of the cities, and had none of the spirit or principles of the honest yeomanry, who composed the militia during former wars, when every man turned out impressed with a good cause.

It was not, he said, his desire to criminate any individual in office, although he would maintain his right of expressing his opinion on that floor, so long as he held a seat in the House. But with regard to myself, said he, I am not disposed to pour incense into any man's cup; I respect the PRESIDENT as much as any man, and think him incapable of doing wrong, at least on those principles that foreign despots are supposed to do no wrong, because the people are their subjects, and dare not to say their Sovereigns do wrong, and dare not contradict this tyrannic maxim. If the House, or if the PRESIDENT, have committed an error, they ought to correct it; for my part, I conceived the whole of the plan wrong from the beginning. From the present appearances, he was convinced we should get no peace with the Indians, unless it were dictated by the British agents in Canada; for it was clear, as long as they can do us the injustice to withhold territory from us, we can have little reason to expect their aid or friendship in bringing about a peace which is so desirable. He hoped to live to see the day that America will be able to show herself superior to her enemies, and chastise them: at present, it would be improper to engage in any war, if it could be avoided.

In addition to the foregoing reasons offered by Mr. P. for being opposed to a war establishment, he also remarked, that it was from a desire to see the public debt redeemed without resorting to new taxes; for if they once should get fixed there, (pointing up to the Senate Chamber,) we should never be able to withdraw them, whether they were necessary or not. He concluded by a hearty wish that the motion made by his friend from North Carolina might succeed.

Mr. BOUDINOT was against the motion, as he thought any immediate alteration of the present system would be attended with dangerous consequences, under the present circumstances of the United States. He did not think it would be justifiable to alter it. It would show an instability in our public measures, especially at this moment, when we have done everything to bring about a peace with the hostile Indians: and, when it is just advancing to the season for effecting it—when it is at the eve of completion—shall we rashly counteract the whole? and after having brought the enemy, who were so much elated on account of their recent success, to a proper sense of our power and force to impose an honorable peace, would it not be extremely imprudent to lessen our own consequence before we have accomplished the object? The Indians would, in this case, most indubitably raise their demands in proportion to what they supposed to be our weakness. Mr. B. added several other observations.

Mr. WILLIS had always been strongly impressed with a dislike for standing armies; but when he considered the situation of the frontiers, and particularly of the State of Georgia, he must give his vote against the motion. Neither did he think two regiments by any means a sufficient force, even to garrison the posts.

On motion, the Committee rose and reported progress.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of State, enclosing a list of the several persons employed in his office, with the salary allowed to each, pursuant to the resolution of this House of the thirty-first ultimo; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill making compensation to the widows and orphans of certain persons who were killed by Indians, under the sanction of flags of truce; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 3.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to regulate the claims to Invalid Pensions: which was received, and read twice and committed.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to make compensation to the widows and orphans of certain persons who were killed by Indians, under the sanction of flags of truce; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had again had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, do lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of War, enclosing a list of the persons employed in the several offices of his Department, with the salary allowed to each, pursuant to the resolution of this House, of the 31st ultimo; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

The order of the day being called for, the House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. WHITE in the Chair,) on Mr. STEELE's motion for reducing part of the present military establishment of the United States.

In reply to the speech made yesterday by Mr. WADSWORTH, and which had been expressed in such strong language, Mr. STEELE thought it necessary to make a few observations, as a preliminary, before the House went further into the debate.

The gentleman from Connecticut had disputed the calculations which he, Mr. S., had produced. Perhaps the gentleman's calculations may be right, and perhaps both of our statements may be so; but with respect to those which I produced, if the acts of Congress are false, if the reports and estimates of the Heads of Departments on your table, Mr. SPEAKER, are false, then my statements are wrong, or "untrue" as the gentleman expressed it, and for which, I hope, on more cool reflection, he will not adhere to. Mr. S. then read the acts of Congress of the 29th of September, 1789, 26th of March, 1790, and 12th of August, same year; the 11th of February, 1791, and 23d December, 1792, &c., from which he clearly proved that every item of his calculations was exactly quoted. He knew of no surplussage unexpended at the War Department, but $140,000, as reported by the Secretary of the Treasury; if any gentlemen in the House knew of any other, he hoped they would mention them. For his part, he thought the estimate for 1793 showed very little savings any where from the grants of the preceding year, but it contained demands for new grants much larger than for any former year. This, however, was a subject he did not at present mean to say much on, until he should hear the sentiments of other members. He therefore sat down with a reservation, that he would take the liberty of replying to such arguments as might be adduced against his proposition.

Mr. WADSWORTH disavowed any intention of being indelicate in his expressions yesterday, toward the gentleman from North Carolina; and if he had, in the warmth of debate, said anything to which that gentleman could take offence, it was not meant so, and he was ready to retract it. He could not, however, avoid taking notice, that the gentleman's arguments appeared to him to convey a strong censure on the Executive, and to spread abroad improper impressions. The principal error which he dwelt on, was that of quoting the difference between the appropriations of 1789 and 1790, to be so great as appeared from that gentleman's statement. But the fact is, that the gentleman had overlooked the laws, and instead of quoting the amount of the two appropriations made in 1789, he had only mentioned the amount of one, consequently this was giving an improper impression of the real comparative appropriations of those two years; for, when they are taken in the whole, the difference is not so great, nor the increase so much as Mr. STEELE exhibited it, by $27,080. In like manner, the comparative increases of the other years, 1791, 1792, and 1793, have been misstated, and the truth is, that the total increases are not less, but more than the gentleman represented them by the sum of $567,530 72.

Military Establishment.

Mr. CLARK hoped the gentleman last up did not suppose that the House was going to war with the Secretary of War. He sincerely wished that some means should be adopted of conveying the sense of the House to the PRESIDENT, who would thereby be considerably relieved from the delicate situation in which he now stands with regard to the discretionary powers vested in him. Before Mr. C. sat down, he suggested the idea of filling up the blank in Mr STEELE'S motion, with the word three, so as to limit the military to three regiments.

Mr. MILLEDGE liked the spirit of the motion, in regard to the prevention of standing armies; but he was against its being put in practice at the present time. He differed from the gentleman from New Jersey, and as his motion had not a second he would proceed. He wished the question under consideration to go to a Committee of the Whole, that a fair and open discussion of every point of the important subject might be brought into view. The situation of the State he had the honor to represent, had been mentioned in the course of debate; he therefore felt himself called on to deliver his sentiments; that he was persuaded there was not a member in the House who more ardently wished for peace than himself, or who would go further to promote so desirable an object, as putting an end to a savage war, and an enormous public expense; but he was of opinion that the reduction of the military establishment would not answer either of those purposes; that it well became members to take into consideration such parts of the Union as lay exposed, and then judge the propriety of the intended measure; that it was well known that Georgia was a frontier State, bordering on one side by a nation with whom a just understanding and intercourse still remains to be settled by treaty, and on the other by a warlike tribe of Indians, the most numerous of any on the Continent, ten thousand warriors, besides the Cherokee nation of three thousand and five hundred. A State, in proportion to its wealth, and in proportion to what it contributes to the General Government, of the fewest inhabitants, an extent of frontier from the river St. Mary to the northernmost line, full three hundred miles—a country hardly at any period enjoying perfect safety, since the commencement of the Revolution. My constituents, said he, adopted the Federal system, from a hope that we should be protected: some of them, at this moment, have never been able to return to their habitations, which they left at the commencement of the war; and I am warranted in saying that a part of my constituents are now throughout the State under arms. Let members for a moment place their constituents in the situation of mine, and let me ask them if they would not demand the protecting arm of Government? As yet we have experienced little more than the enforcing a treaty, that has not been complied with on the part of the British, which has reduced some of our first citizens to a state of dependence on those who not long ago were their avowed and open enemies, and a deprivation of our territorial right, for the yielding of which a permanent peace and permanent line were to be established. Of the peace we have experienced no great share, and as for the permanent line it still remains to be run, and, from well grounded information, the half-way conduct of the Creeks the other day with Mr. Seagrove, gives very little reason to expect it. Such was the situation of his State. But to the point, he was of opinion that we set out wrong in warring with the Indians at any rate. Unfortunately for us, the event has not answered the design, and we are now reduced to that state that hardly any change can mend. The unaccountable success of the Indians has so elated them with their prowess, and which likewise has presented views to the English and Spaniards they never dreamed of, and the federated situation of the different tribes occasioned him not to hesitate in pronouncing that the several frontier States would be more or less exposed to the cruel ravages of a savage warfare. If the customs of savage tribes did not direct them towards us, they were incessantly excited by the British and Spaniards to amuse us with false pretences of peace, while they were engrossing the advantages of their trade. The aged Indians kept to their hunting, and the young men were gratified in the military exploits with the blood of our fellow-citizens. In this situation the frontier of the United States, a distance of not less than fifteen hundred miles, must be garrisoned. He left it to gentlemen to calculate what force would be required for that purpose, if troops should be employed in no other way. Militia, he said, were for sudden invasion; they were scattered when they returned, and must be protected while at home. The jealousy of the English, and their augmenting their force, surely ought not to occasion the reduction of any part of ours; if anything, it ought to have a contrary effect. He likewise said that it would be necessary to view the early history of our country, and find what had been the conduct of Spaniards and Indians about the commencement of the present century. The Spaniards, at the same spot where they now are, by their treachery, when they were at peace with the English, at a time when the Carolinians little suspected, when they imagined they were in perfect alliance with the Indians, the Yamasses, Creeks, and Cherokees, those Indians, by their instigation, massacred one hundred and thirty of their inhabitants, and drove the rest into Charleston. The inhabitants of the capital of Georgia are as much exposed as the Carolinians then were; a distance of twenty miles from Savannah, places them in an open, uninhabited country, to the Creek nation, and within that twenty miles, thinly inhabited on account of the nature of their cultivation. What had happened, he said, might happen again: the Spaniards had not changed their policy. If, therefore, we are forewarned, ought we not to be forearmed? That, from their dangerous situation, even on a peace establishment, there ought to be at least five hundred troops on that frontier.

If public officers have misapplied the public money, the Constitution pointed out a mode to punish them. The Government belongs to the people, the officers are their servants, we are their Representatives, and we ought to do them justice. He conceived it was praiseworthy in any member to afford any aid or information in his power to bring these things to light; that he felt it his duty to make strict inquiry into the expenditure of public money; that he was sent by his constituents to protect their property, and in doing that should vote against the present proposition.

Mr. FINDLEY observed that a difference of opinion existed in respect to the motion for reducing the Army. The mover was for filling up the blank with two regiments; but Mr. CLARK had proposed three, and was against discharging any of those already enlisted. The principle of the motion was what he wished to speak to. Passing by the comparative view, so much alluded to in the course of the debate, of militia and regulars, he struck at once into the heart of the question. The redemption of the public debt, from the savings to be made by the reduction of the Army, seemed to be a principal object with some members, but, in his opinion, it was no more than a secondary one: the defence of the frontier is of superior concern.

The origin of the war goes much farther back than that of the present Government; it arose out of the war with Britain; and it has been ever since changing for the worse, until it has at length assumed a very alarming complexion; for it has united a greater number of tribes than has ever been known, and it has exposed a much greater extent of our frontier. With regard to the mismanagement or abuses, if any there were, it was no place to discuss such subjects by desultory debating in this House, whilst there were other modes open. He did not, however, believe that any material abuses had taken place indeed. This war is not one of the faults chargeable to the Executive, for it might with more justice, perhaps, be said to have had its origin in the ineffectual measures of the Legislature. The first Congress assembled under the present Government found the Union in a state of war; and although one regiment was stationed at Pittsburg, yet the militia were not relieved from actual service. But the lately raised troops may perhaps be found more effectual, as it is said there is an excellent system of discipline established amongst them.

With regard to the argument that the Union cannot support so heavy an expense by new taxes, he was of opinion that every consideration ought to give way to the safety and protection of the country.

A particular plan is set into operation for accomplishing a peace, and it ought not to be arrested without a trial being made. The ill-defined law authorizing the PRESIDENT to call out the militia, and the levies under General Harmar, did not answer the end intended, for the time of their enlistment had nearly expired ere they had reached their destination; but if General Harmar had carried out two regiments of permanent troops, he could, without the assistance of the militia, have destroyed all the Indian towns and villages that stood in his way, and he would have completed the object of erecting a line of posts which would secure a lasting peace; but from the weakness of the force and the inefficacy of the law, the purpose was arrested at a critical moment, and the vengeance of the Indians roused to the utmost pitch; instead of their fears being alarmed, the next step of raising another regiment was of a piece with the former weak policy; for the encouragement was insufficient, and the miserable two-dollar men who were raised for a six months' service—their fate is too well known, and will be long remembered. They arrived at the wilderness with clothing that lasted only to the time they reached the scene of action, and those who were not cut off by the enemy were left to starve with cold in the most inclement season.

The fatal catastrophe of this campaign has only served to elate the Indians, and render them insolent, as appears from their treatment of our messengers under flags of truce. The parsimony on those occasions has been the cause of a double expense.

In opposition to this, it may be said that those parsimonious plans were recommended by the Executive, and only enacted into laws by the Legislature. This, however, if it were the fact, is no apology for the Legislature, for they have no right to cast their Legislative responsibility upon the Executive Department; nor can they do it without a breach of trust towards their constituents. The members knew that the encouragement of pay and time of enlistments would never answer any good purpose; the want of resources could have been no reason for that parsimony toward the defence of the frontiers, because it is known that we found revenue enough not only to pay the interest of the public debt, and to support the Government, but even to pay the debts of the individual States. The conviction of these mistakes induced Congress, at last, to make adequate provision, and now an attempt is made to withdraw the means before the end is accomplished. The other branch of the Legislature has prevented us from giving higher wages to encourage the recruiting service; but notwithstanding all this, it appears to go on with considerable success.

Here he mentioned something of the confidential communications which he was not now at liberty to explain. The gentleman who says that two regiments are sufficient to garrison the forts, ought to consider that garrisoning those, is not the only object in contemplation. If we expect to exist as a nation we must protect the whole frontier, and make it the interest of the Indians to be at peace with us.

But do gentlemen consider the consequences of throwing all internal defence and distant expeditions upon the militia? Is it not enough that they already stand as a piquet guard to their brethren who live at ease; that they eat their bread in the fear of their lives, and are frequently embittered with the view of mournful incidents; but that we must lay a deliberate plan for increasing the number of their fatherless children and childless parents?

To say that those States who have frontiers, ought to be left to protect themselves, is a very anti-Federal sentiment, which he was sorry to hear advanced in that House. Neither is it generous to say we will pay the expense, and let them fight for us. Do gentlemen contemplate to what issue these principles would lead? Do they not observe that the fate of the Government is deeply involved in the decision? Perhaps I may be asked, Did not the States depend chiefly upon their own exertion for the defence of the frontiers under the old Congress? Yes, they did, and were better protected than since that period. But let it be recollected that at the time the States had the command of their own resources, and the laying and executing their own plans, that the Indians were not so formidably combined. But that since the States had not the power of retaliating, nor the means of gratifying with presents; since the Indians have been solemnly told to look away from the little fires of the States, to the great fire of the Union, they have looked upon us as a more formidable and dangerous foe, and made their arrangements accordingly, and European nations, and emissaries among them, have improved upon the circumstance, and excited and aided them in their union and exertions.

He made some further remarks on the impolicy of oppressing the militia at Marietta, &c., and asked if it were possible that those unfortunate few could be able to protect the whole frontier against the united force of the Indians?

He agreed with those who said that the sense of the people of America was in favor of peace; but the question is come to this. It is not to begin a war that we have raised this army, but to procure a peace, and so soon as this end is attained, the Army will be discharged. It is raised to protect, not to oppress, or to aid in governing our citizens. I know, said he, that standing armies have always been sources of oppression and aids of tyranny. Our people may long be governed without such aids; their situation will not admit of abuses from standing armies, nor would the citizens submit to them.

He was confident that the Army would be discharged by the next Legislature, as soon as a prospect of our affairs will admit it. The present prospects were not of a very flattering nature, and therefore it was good policy to keep up the force at the present crisis; and it would be dangerous to repeal the law under the circumstances.

The present Indian war is essentially different from any former one. When Britain and France divided North America betwixt them, if the emissaries of both excited the Indians to war, the power of both afforded protection. When Britain became possessed of the Western posts, and many tribes of Indians commenced a war, the British Government conducted the war, carried it into the Indian country, and by the dread of their arms procured peace; but the Indians were not then supported by other Powers. In the present war, the Indians who at that time knew nothing of us, have combined to make it a common cause; and no superior Powers interest themselves in our favor. No: they conceive our interest to be inimical to theirs. But if they did not receive encouragement, protection, and supplies from our superior neighbors, a peace would soon be procured. The gentlemen who support this resolution know well how that matter stands, and they know explanations here are not convenient. He concluded by declaring that he could not vote for the motion.

The Committee now rose, and had leave to sit again.

FRIDAY, January 4.

SAMUEL [STERRETT, from Maryland, appeared and took his seat in the House.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments reported yesterday by the Committee of the Whole House to the bill to make compensation to the widows and orphans of certain persons who were killed by Indians under the sanction of flags of truce; and the same being read, some were agreed to and others disagreed to. And then the said bill, being further amended at the Clerk's table, was, together with the amendments, ordered to be engrossed and read the third time to-morrow.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, enclosing lists of the persons employed in the several offices of his Department, with the salary allowed to each; also, a Letter accompanying certain statements relative to foreign loans, which have been made by the United States, under the authority of the PRESIDENT, pursuant to the resolutions of this House of the 24th and 27th ultimo; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to regulate the claims to Invalid Pensions; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

SATURDAY, January 5.

A petition of the inhabitants of the city of Hudson, in the State of New York, was presented to the House and read, stating the inconveniences under which they labor, from being obliged to register, enter, and clear their vessels at the port of New York, and praying that the said city of Hudson may be made a port of entry. Referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, with instruction to examine the same, and report his opinion thereupon to the House.

An engrossed bill to make compensation to the widows and orphans of certain persons who were killed by Indians, under the sanction of flags of truce, was read the third time and passed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of War, accompanying the copy of a message of Cornplanter and New Arrow to Major General Wayne, dated the 8th of December last, relative to the measures which they have taken to conclude a Peace, on behalf of the United States, with certain tribes of hostile Indians; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the motion of the 28th ultimo, for reducing the military establishment of the United States:

Mr. MOORE said, that there was not sufficient information before the House respecting the prospect of a peace, to warrant a sudden reduction of the Army. He referred to the abuses which had been hinted at in some of the branches dependent on the War Establishment, but he did not believe there had been any worth much notice. He also mentioned the abstruseness of attempting an investigation into the origin of the war—whether the frontier settlers, or the Indians, were in fault, was a difficult thing to determine; but from many circumstances, it appeared to him, the white people were often guilty of committing depredations. This was, in his opinion, a good reason why the protection of those frontiers should not be intrusted to the militia that would be raised there. Shall we intrust the conduct of that matter to the very persons whom it has been alleged are often the aggressors? Can the PRESIDENT, at the distance he is situated from the Western Territory, check all the irregular proceedings that might happen amongst such a militia? There were two obvious reasons for passing the law of the 5th of March, 1792, for the protection of the frontiers by regular forces. First, it could not be expected that militia would always prove successful against the Indians, because the latter are gaining more experience every day in the mode of warfare, and there can be no dependence on a treaty between those militia and the Indians. The second reason was, that the PRESIDENT was strongly impressed with the necessity of establishing the greatest degree of harmony between the United States and the Indians, by encouraging and protecting a trade with them, and that this could be easiest and best effected by establishing a line of forts along the frontiers, to be garrisoned by regular troops. Mr. M. next mentioned something of the manners and customs of the Indians, whose practice it is to spend most of their time on their hunting grounds, leaving their old men, women, and children, in their towns. They have no regular plan of Government, and can only be attached by influencing some of their chiefs. The system of harassing them by burning and destroying their towns at the time they are employed in hunting, has come recommended to us by experience, and regular troops are the best to be employed in this service. Their present inexperience will soon be done away by a proper mode of discipline, and why may not these troops be soon instructed? Are they not as capable of receiving instructions as militia, and may we not expect more subordination amongst them, than could possibly be established over militia? He concluded by declaring himself against the motion.

[Here the SPEAKER informed the Chair that he had received a confidential Message from the PRESIDENT. The Committee then rose, and the galleries were closed for some time.]

The House having gone into Committee, the debate was renewed by Mr. WILLIAMSON, Mr. MADISON, and Mr. STEELE.

Mr. STEELE rose after Mr. MADISON, and said he was perfectly in sentiment with that gentleman, in regard to the propriety of inserting an amendment to the motion, which might secure a sufficient appropriation to carry on offensive operations against the hostile Indians, by the militia of the frontiers; and if an alteration was proposed to that effect, he would second it. The attention of the House to this question speaks its importance; it is probable one more important will not occur during the present session. On its decision are suspended the hopes and fears of the people of this country, their hopes of a speedy and honorable peace, and their fears of a standing army, with its usual retinue of political evils.

The present is regarded as an interesting epoch in the affairs of the United States; and it has been perceived, with serious regret, that while our national character is forming, (he hoped it was not yet formed,) it seems to partake, in some respects, more of the unnatural spirit of Monarchy, than of the mild and conciliatory temper of a Republic. The principle of keeping up standing armies, though highly obnoxious to the great body of the people, has not been equally so to the Government; they have been maintained and increased without affording protection, or even defence to the frontiers. The supplies necessary to support the establishment begin to discover an alarming derangement of the public finances, and it is now incumbent on the House of Representatives to check this growing mischief.

Mr. S. then adverted to the effects of standing armies on the morals and political sentiments of the people, wherever they had been employed; of the expensiveness of all such establishments, and of the wicked purposes to which they had been, and might be, subservient. He said he had prepared himself to have spoken largely to this point, and to have quoted the pernicious effects of such a policy in other nations; but the debate having been already lengthy, and the Committee probably fatigued, it would be sufficient for his present purpose, for the members to make their own reflections, and to mark the rapid progression of the Army from 1789 to 1792, both in numbers and expenses. Instances from foreign history are superfluous, when our own affords such ample testimony. The establishment began with one regiment: it is now five. The House was called on 1789 to appropriate a little more than $100,000 for that Department; in the present year, above

$1,000,000 is demanded. The reason of this extraordinary additional expenditure, this unexpected increase of the Army, if not enveloped in darkness, has been founded on policy hitherto not satisfactorily explained. He said, however lightly he was disposed to touch this part of the subject, he could not avoid reminding the Committee of the memorable sentiments of 1776, in regard to standing armies; of the universal abhorrence of the Americans to them at that time; and, to illustrate it more clearly, he read the expressions of some of the States in their Bills of Right. These were the sentiments of the Whigs of 1776, and to such Whigs he wished to appeal on this occasion. He also reminded the Committee of the recent debates of 1788, of the amendments proposed in several of the State Conventions, of the unanimity which prevailed among all ranks of people on this particular point; and it is now to be lamented, said he, that while the ink which recorded these objections to the Constitution is yet drying, the evil then predicted has taken place.

If there is a subject on which much deliberation is unnecessary, in order to form a right opinion, it would be in regard to military establishments. The feelings of a free people revolt at their continuance, and every man who reads or thinks, can point out their dangers. He said he felt more anxiety for the fate of this motion, than commonly marks his conduct, because this is the last session that will ever afford him an opportunity to trouble the House with his sentiments on this or any other subject. The motion was brought forward to discharge a duty which he owed to his constituents, to satisfy his own conscience, and to afford that protection to the frontiers which they deserved, and to save the public money. If an uncommon degree of zeal was discovered in supporting the motion, it ought to be attributed to these, and no other motives.

The question will now soon be taken; if adopted, I shall be among those who rejoice; if rejected, among those who have always submitted with a proper degree of decency to the decision of the majority. But in any event, the public will know that we have asserted the sense of the people against standing armies, that we are anxious to defend the frontiers against their enemies; that we have recommended a system of economy and efficiency, instead of profusion and delay; that we have recommended a system calculated to produce victory and peace, instead of disgrace and war, and that we wish to rescue the Government from the intoxication of the times, and all the apery of military establishments.

He said he had been attentive to the arguments of the opposition, and they led principally to four points. If neither of these positions be found tenable, the motion will certainly succeed; and that they are not tenable, is believed and will be shown.

1st. It has been boldly asserted that the PRESIDENT is the author of the existing system.

2dly. They call in question the sincerity of our declarations in wishing to afford effectual protection to the frontiers.

3dly. They deny the competency of the militia.

4thly. The impolicy of reducing the establishment, when a treaty is expected.

In regard to the first, we deny that the PRESIDENT is the author of this plan of prosecuting the war, not having avowed explicitly himself that he is so, no document appearing to confirm that opinion, we are justified in attributing a system which appears to us ineffectual to his Secretary and not to him.

It is true, that the Secretary is only a finger of his hand and the intimate connexion which must of necessity subsist between them, perhaps is the ground upon which the assertion has been made. The Secretaries are all equally near to the PRESIDENT, and if it be admitted that he is the author of this, he may with equal propriety, be said to have been the author of every system on general subjects which either of them have recommended.

Was he the author of the report on the fisheries? Was he the author of the plan for establishing the National Bank? It is known that he was not, and circumstances might be mentioned (which are withheld from delicacy) to confirm this opinion.

Was he the author of the Funding System? Some gentlemen in the opposition to this motion, would not be willing to give the PRESIDENT that credit if he claimed it, and some who support this motion would not only be sorry that the PRESIDENT had even claimed such a credit, but believe that it was in no respect attributable to him. The same gentleman, [Mr. WADSWORTH,] who first asserted that the PRESIDENT was the author of this military plan, in the same speech admitted it to be the War, as well as the plan of the House, and then argued on the necessity of stability in our measures. It is not very material to the present question whose plan it is, being a public measure, we are justified in offering our objections to it, and this is the first time that I have heard it publicly asserted that a Government should persevere in an error, because they had undertaken it. If the plan be a good one, it may be supported by reason; if a bad one, no name ought to be called in to prop it up.

The inconsistency of that gentleman's [Mr. WADSWORTH's] arguments not only supports the motion before the Committee, but shows the wretched shifts which have been used to defeat it.

It has been said, in the course of the debate, that individual members, and even this House, are incompetent to decide upon the efficacy or inefficacy of military plans. In answer to this it may be said, that if we are not all Generals, we are all members, and that we have the privilege of thinking for ourselves and for our constituents. To admit this doctrine in the latitude which has been expressed, would be to introduce military ideas indeed; it would be to make soldiers of us, instead of Legislators: nay, worse than that, it would be to revive the exploded doctrines of passive obedience, and non-resistance.

In regard to the sincerity of his intentions to afford effectual protection to the frontiers, Mr. S. said that he had been sufficiently explicit, that a feeling for the sufferers had dictated this motion; that he was sorry that it had been whispered in the ears of some of the members that it was intended to withhold the necessary appropriations, and divert them to other purposes.

If two regiments were insufficient to garrison all the posts necessary for defence, he would even, under certain restrictions, consent to continue the three sub-legions, thereby enabling the PRESIDENT to establish double the number of posts now erected if he should deem it advisable. Regular troops being incapable of active expeditions against Indians in the wilderness, his wish was to abandon that system and confine them entirely to the garrison.

The next objection to the motion is the incompetency of the militia, and to support this opinion the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. WADSWORTH] has made this expression, "that as to the expedition under General St. Clair, the regulars were few, and not to be named when compared with the number of the militia." The truth is, there was not a man engaged that day as a militia man, except the advance guard commanded by Colonel Oldham, which consisted of about three hundred, perhaps a few more, the field return of the day preceding the action being in the War Office, this can be ascertained with precision. The balance of the army on that unfortunate day, had been enlisted as regulars, were fought as regulars, even clothed as regulars, and poor fellows, died like regulars. They suffered the fate which awaits every regular army destined for similar expeditions. Even the handful of militia employed that day, did not deserve that name; they were chiefly substitutes for draughted men from the ceded territory. This draught became unavoidable, from a misfortune to General Sevier, which Mr. STEBLE related.

The attack on Major Adair has also been mentioned, as a proof of the incompetency of militia, and Mr. S. insisted that the only inference which could be drawn from thence was, that one hundred militia were able to repel, but not destroy near two hundred Indians. This event he conceived was in favor of and not against his motion.

He next adverted to the arguments of Mr. WADSWORTH, in regard to the war of 1762; of the establishment of posts in Pennsylvania and Virginia, and of the success of Colonel Boquet's expedition. If two worn out regiments at that time were sufficient to defend the frontiers, and, with the aid of the militia, to terminate the war, two new regiments, with all the vigor which the gentleman described them to possess, with the aid of established posts, and a much more effective militia, can certainly be equal to the same end. After examining Mr. W.'s arguments for some time, Mr. S. said, that when analyzed, it would be found that they proved more than they were intended to prove; but the merits of this motion did not require that he should take advantage of these indiscretions.

He showed from the history of 1762, that though posts were established, with a handful of regular troops in each, they never answered the purpose of effectual protection; but the frontier people were always obliged, in a great degree, to defend themselves; that they were best calculated for that service, and that they would perform it now with alacrity and success, if well rewarded.

Mr. S. then refuted the objection against the militia on account of their waste and expense which Mr. W. had alluded to. The law allows a mounted volunteer, furnishing himself with a good horse, good arms, provisions, and every other necessary, except ammunition, at his own risk and expense, one dollar per day. The exact expense, of such an expedition can be calculated. Whether successful or not, the charge to the public cannot be increased. The contractors, quarter-masters, and hospital departments, are all avoided, with the abuses, expenses, and frauds, attending such establishments. Mr. S. enlarged upon this point, and said that these were always found to be the most expensive departments in any army, and that the Federal Treasury had felt their effects already. In favor of the militia, it may be asked, who fought the battle of Bunker's Hill? Who fought the battle of New Jersey? Who have fought the Indians so often with success, under Generals Wilkinson, Scott, Sevier, and others? Who marched in 1776 under General Rutherford, through the Cherokee nation, laid waste their country, and forced them to peace? Who fought the battles of Georgia, under Clark and Twiggs? Who fought the battles of South Carolina, under the command of an honorable member now present? Delicacy forbids me to enlarge upon his successes in his presence.

Who fought the ever-memorable battles of Cowpens, King's Mountain, Hanging Rock, Blackstocks, the pivots on which the Revolution turned in the Southern States? In short, who fought all the battles of the Southern States, while we had a mere handful of regular troops, scarcely the shadow, much less the reality of an army?

They were all fought by freemen, the substantial freeholders of the country: the men attached to the Revolution from principle: men who were sensible of their rights and fought for them.

Such men will not enlist in regular armies, nor will any one who has the disposition or the constitution of a freeman. It would give me pain to describe the trash which composes all regular armies: they enlist for three dollars a month; which, in a country like the United States, is a sufficient description of their bodies as well as their minds. Such men are not fit to combat the most active enemy in the world. Here Mr. S. read Major Gaither's and Major Trueman's depositions, respecting the defeat of the 4th November, 1791, stating that they could not see the Indians, because they were behind trees, &c.; that the regular troops tried, but could not fight that way; that they seemed to be stupid, and incapable of resistance; and that if any General in the world had commanded such men that day, he must have been defeated as they were.

An additional argument, and one of the most weighty, too, against regular expeditions, in this species of warfare, is, that, by the slowness of their movements, the force of the enemy may be concentrated; time is afforded them to form alliances, and to confederate against those whom they consider a common enemy. It is otherwise with militia-incursions. He offered a number of reasons to show that it was so, and how essential for the interest of the United States to adopt a policy calculated to detach the tribes from each other as much as possible.

But it has been said, these men were not regular troops. Mr. S. asked, what, then, were they? They surely were not militia. The last objection, and the least serious of all, to this motion, is the expectations of a treaty in the Spring. Mr. S. said, if he thought the gentleman who threw this difficulty in the way believed himself that we have any reason to expect a permanent peace from the treaty now proposed, it may deserve an answer. Facts are more to be relied upon than words. From the channel through which these propositions have come—from the whole complexion of their talks, and from the late attack on Major Adair, it may safely be asserted that no peace can be effected in the Spring. He recapitulated some of the difficulties which this motion had to conflict with, and said that he could mention others, if he was at liberty to do so. Under such circumstances, success is hardly to be expected; but he knew the merits of the motion deserved it.

Mr. HULLHOUSE, who had hitherto sat silent, observed that nothing new had been advanced, in the whole course of this long debate, but what he had heard mentioned last Winter in that House. He was then opposed in principle to a war establishment, and he still retained the same opinion; but, from the complexion of affairs, it appeared to him that he ought to submit, and give up his own opinion to the general sense of the Legislature, which at present seemed to be for persevering in the system already adopted, and which, as it had scarcely had time for a fair trial, he thought, therefore, ought not to be arrested, perhaps in the very instant when its efficacy was to be expected. If peace should not be established during the next Summer, he would then join with such members as would propose a better system; but as the law provides for the discretionary powers of the Executive, it would be best to rely on them. A standing army, he said, was a thing impossible to be accomplished in the United States whilst the House of Representatives have the power of granting money only for two years at any time; he therefore had no fears on that score. An army existing in time of peace was the idea he had of a standing army, and not an army embodied for only a year or two. Upon the whole, it would be as expensive to disband the present force, and to institute another of militia, &c., as it will be to keep up the existing establishment for a little longer time; it was therefore his advice to let the matter rest where it is, with the Executive, for the present. But, in case of a peace not being accomplished within a reasonable period, he would join those who would be for a change in the system; and he was clearly of opinion that a system might easily be adopted, not only to protect our frontiers by repelling the savages, but to exterminate them altogether.

Mr. FINDLEY felt himself inclined to say a word or two more in reply to Mr. STEELE. He thought it would be unjust to lay so much of the weight of protecting the frontiers on the militia only. He expatiated on the meaning of the word militia as defined by law, &c. He also remarked that however it might be fashionable to despise the levies, yet amongst them there were examples of great bravery to be found, and particularly in one battalion of the unfortunate army on the 4th of November, 1791. He noticed the well-conducted retreat of Major CLARK, and the success of General Brodhead up the Alleghany. It was unjust to expect to raise enough of militia in the back parts of Pennsylvania; and the inhabitants of Virginia are so dispersed near the frontiers that they cannot be expected from that State. With respect to the men who went out with General Harmar, and whose time of enlistment expired soon after they reached the scene of operations, many of them remained and settled in that country. He again repeated the injustice of calling out heads of families from one part of the frontier; and, above all, he lamented the risk and loss of lives. But, if it should be determined to carry on the war with militia, let them be called from all parts of the United States. The burden already laid on a part of the inhabitants is extremely unequal, and must not lay longer on them. Let the troops now raising be disciplined. I am informed that many of them are considerably advanced in point of discipline, and may before Spring become expert soldiers. Let these go on in the present system, and let the militia also be kept up or increased, until the object shall be attained for which the law was intended, and then, and not before, it may be proper to talk of reducing the present establishment. We are now in a situation that it would be extremely imprudent to retreat from.

Mr. MURRAY delivered some opinions on the preceding arguments of all the members, and remarked that the army, under the present establishment, had no right to be compared to or called a standing army; it bore no more comparison to a standing army than a cameleon to an owl.

Mr. WADSWORTH closed this tedious debate with a few further explanations. He accounted for the difference between his calculations and those of the gentleman from North Carolina by observing that he got some of his statements from the War Office. Mr. STEELE's were taken from the appropriation laws, and in one instance he had underrated the appropriations. With regard to the opinions he had delivered on the militia, he had never meant to traduce the character of militia, because he had often experienced their brilliant actions; his arguments went no further than to show that the operations of regular troops were in general more effectual. He never wished to detract from the honor of militia, but only to remark that they were not so efficient as regular troops.

The question on the original motion being now put, was negatived.

Mr. WILLIAMSON did not entirely approve of the motion in its present form; the blanks might be so filled, he thought, as to import a thing opposite to his wishes—they might import a discharge of the regular troops already raised. He believed his colleague had no such desire; he thought the measure would be improper; but he wished not to have a regiment of officers without soldiers; he wished to fix a time at which the recruiting service should cease and the supernumerary officers should be discharged. As he intended to move that the proposition might be so amended, he should consider it in that light, and he believed the measure would not be imprudent nor inconsistent with the most vigorous measures of defence or offence.

It should be remembered that the House of Representatives, when they had the bill before them, which last Winter passed into a law, for defending the frontiers, sent it to the Senate, with a clause importing that officers below the rank of field-officers should not be put into commission any faster than troops could be enlisted. The Senate, adhering to their privilege, refused to agree to that clause in the bill, and it became necessary immediately to commission the officers for five thousand men, some of whom, if report speaks truth, not covetous of honor, are content with their pay, without having raised three men. By the proposed amendment the officers only would be dismissed, whom most of us wished never to have seen in commission.

The proposed regulation has been censured as implicating some kind of censure on the Executive. He viewed it in a different light. The Executive had done what was proper and necessary at the time. But if it should appear that other measures would fit the change of circumstances, he did not see why those measures should not be adopted. It should be recollected that, during the last Winter, when the estimate of five thousand men as necessary for the defence of our frontier was handed to Congress, there was no Militia law. A well-armed effective militia, that Palladium of Liberty, had once and again been recommended by the PRESIDENT to the attention of Congress; but Congress, from year to year, as if they wished for a standing army, had neglected the militia. Towards the close of the last session, indeed, they passed a law. He hoped he might, without offence, call it the shadow of a law. It was saying, in a few words, that the several States might have a good militia if they pleased; and, if they pleased, they might have none at all. Was the Executive to trust the defence of a country to a militia formed under such a law? He thought not. But he observed that, since the last Winter, it had come to be generally known that a class of our fellow-citizens exist on the frontiers who are at all times ready to serve, not as drafted militia, but as volunteers. These are the men by whom the Indians must be chastized, or we shall never have peace. They are the best woodsmen and marksmen, and they have no professional interest in spinning out the war. He must repeat the observation that volunteers of the militia are the only troops for vigorous offensive operations. Figure to yourselves an army of regulars creeping through the wilderness, with all its cannon and other military apparatus, in chase of a naked savage, who sees it without being seen. It is an elephant in chase of a wolf. The troops already raised may be pretty well disciplined before the season for action; they are sufficient, with the co-operation of the militia, to take a post, and build forts where they please; everything else is beyond their power, if they were not five but fifteen thousand. They will never see an Indian unless he chooses to be seen. He wished to be indulged in a single observation respecting a case in which it was said, the other day, the militia had been surprised. He was sorry that his naming Major Adair had produced the remark. He would nevertheless venture to repeat the case as an instance of vigilance and bravery. The Major, believing there was an enemy at hand, had visited all his posts at midnight in person; his Lieutenant, Madison, before the dawn of day, roused all the men, telling them that the Indians were coming. The Major, wishing to leave the ground before daylight, called in the sentinels; but the Indians, rushing in with them, gave a heavy fire before there was light by which they could be seen. The Major had not the merit, as he believed, of having been a Continental officer, but he had the merit, not less honorable, of having served bravely in the militia. He questioned whether any of the green troops to be recruited next Spring or Summer will make so good a defence as Major Adair's militia had made. They had taken scalp for scalp, though they fought against the odds of three to one. He prayed it might be remembered that his ideas were not founded on any hopes of sudden peace with the Indians; on the contrary, every motion of the Indians, and every measure taken by those who had most influence over the Indians, induced him to regard an Indian war as the perpetual tax of at least one million per annum. It is fortunate, as he conceived, that the United States know the source of their misfortunes; and if they are compelled to spend one million per annum in opposing a savage enemy, who seems to be hunted upon them, perhaps they may be taught to indemnify themselves by refusing to expend several millions which they can easily save. If a perpetual tax on this head must be raised, sound policy will readily point to the proper object of taxation; but this must remain over for our successors. In the mean time, believing that the troops already raised are sufficient to maintain every fort that is or may be erected, and being confident that volunteers may be found at any time sufficient, if it shall be necessary to extirpate every hostile tribe of Indians, he should vote for the proposition with the proposed amendment.

The question being taken on Mr. W.'s amendment, viz:

“Resolved, That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill to reduce the military establishment of the United States to — regiments, to consist of the men who are now in service, or who may be recruited before the — day of — next,” &c.—

was negatived—32 to 24. The question then was on the original resolution, as moved by Mr. STEELE; which, being put, it was negatived—21 members only rising in favor of it. The Committee then rose, and the Chairman reported accordingly. The report was laid on the table, and the House adjourned.

MONDAY, January 7.

Mr. LIVERMORE, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to repeal part of a resolution of Congress of the 29th of August, 1788, respecting the inhabitants of Post Saint Vincents; which was received, read twice, and committed.

Mr. LAURANCE, from the committee to whom was re-committed the bill making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1793, reported an amendatory bill; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House immediately.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the said Committee, and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto.

Ordered, That the said bill do lie on the table.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to regulate the claims to Invalid Pensions; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and reported progress.

TUESDAY, January 8.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1793, which lay on the table; and the said bill being amended, was, together with the amendments, ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill entitled "An act in addition to the act entitled 'An act to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States;' to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of State, accompanying a report of the assays and experiments made by the Director of the Mint, on the gold and silver coins of France, England, Spain, and Portugal, pursuant to the order of the 29th of November last; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The bill sent from the Senate entitled "An act in addition to the act entitled 'An act to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States,'" was read twice, and committed.

MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

The House proceeded to consider the motion of the 28th ultimo, for reducing the Military Establishment of the United States, to which the Committee of the Whole House had reported their disagreement on Saturday last. Whereupon,

A motion was made and seconded to amend the same by striking out the words "each of ——— non-commissioned officers, privates, and musicians," and inserting, in lieu thereof, the words "of ——— non-commissioned officers, musicians, and ——— of the privates who are now in service, or may be recruited before the ——— day of ——— next."

And the question being put thereupon, it passed in the negative—yeas 26, nays 32, as follows:

NAYS.—Fisher Ames, Abraham Baldwin, Robert Barnwell, Egbert Benson, Elias Boudinot, Shearjashub Bourne, Benjamin Bourne, Jonathan Dayton, William Findley, Thomas Fitzsimons, Andrew Gregg, Thomas Hartley, Daniel Heister, James Hillhouse, Daniel Huger, Aaron Kitchell, John Wilkes Kittera, John Laurance, John Milledge, Frederick Augustus Muhlenberg, William Vans Murray, Cornelius C. Schoonmaker, Theodore Sedgwick, Peter Sylvester, Israel Smith, William Smith, Samuel Sterrett, Jonathan Sturges, George Thatcher, Jeremiah Wadsworth, Alexander White, and Francis Willis.

And then the main question being put, that the House do agree to the said motion, it passed in the negative—yeas 20, nays 36, as follows:

NAYS.—Fisher Ames, Abraham Baldwin, Robert Barnwell, Egbert Benson, Elias Boudinot, Shearjashub Bourne, Benjamin Bourne, Jonathan Dayton, William Findley, Thomas Fitzsimons, Elbridge Gerry, Andrew Gregg, Thomas Hartley, James Hillhouse, Daniel Huger, Aaron Kitchell, John Wilkes Kittera, John Laurance, Richard Bland Lee, John Milledge, Andrew Moore, Frederick Augustus Muhlenberg, William Vans Murray, Cornelius C. Schoonmaker, Theodore Sedgwick, Peter Sylvester, Israel Smith, William Smith, Samuel Sterrett, Jonathan Sturges, George Thatcher, Thomas Tudor Tucker, Jeremiah Wadsworth, Alexander White, Hugh Williamson, and Francis Willis.

Ordered, That the committee to whom was committed the Letter and Representation from the Chief Justice and Associate Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, referred to in the PRESIDENT'S Message of the 7th of November last, be discharged from the further consideration of the same.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to regulate the claims to Invalid Pensions; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had again had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto; which were read, and partly considered.

INVALID PENSIONS.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill to regulate the claims to Invalid Pensions. Whereupon, a motion was made and seconded further to amend the same by adding to the end thereof the following section, to wit:

“And be it further enacted, That no person, not on the pension list before the twenty-third day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, shall be entitled to a pension, who shall not have complied with the rules and regulations herein prescribed, saving, however, to all persons all and singular their rights, founded upon legal adjudications, under the act entitled ‘An act to provide for the settlement of the claims of widows and orphans barred by the limitations heretofore established, and to regulate the claims to Invalid Pensions;’ but it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War, in conjunction with the Attorney General, to take such measures as may be necessary to obtain an adjudication of the Supreme Court of the United States on the validity of any such rights, claimed under the act aforesaid, by the determination of certain persons, styling themselves Commissioners.”

And the question being put thereupon, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 40, nays 20, as follows:

And then the said bill being further amended at the Clerk's table, was, together with the amendments, ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill entitled “An act to amend an act entitled ‘An act establishing a Mint, and regulating the Coins of the United States,’ so far as respects the coinage of copper,” with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of the House.

The House proceeded to consider the said amendments, and the same being read, were agreed to.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House ‘on the bill relative to claims against the United States not barred by any act of limitation, and which have not been already adjusted; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made an amendment thereto.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, do lie on the table.

CLAIMS AGAINST THE UNITED STATES.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the motion of the 12th ultimo, for opening a Loan to the amount of the balances which, upon a final settlement of accounts, shall be found due from the United States to the individual States.

After reading the report of the Commissioners for settling the accounts, Mr. GILES made some opposition to providing for these balances before they were ascertained; that is not done by the report of the Commissioners.

Mr. FITZSIMONS briefly stated the motives which had induced him to come forward with the resolutions previous to ascertaining the balances; he thought that, while there was an uncertainty in the matter, the decisions would be more readily and impartially made.

Mr. LIVERMORE objected to providing for balances before they were known; he thought the resolutions incomplete, as they recognised only creditor States, and say nothing about debtor States.

Mr. FITZSIMONS said he did not believe there

Claims against the United States.

would be any debtor States; he was sure there ought not to be any.

Mr. MADISON objected to the resolutions on the same principle with Mr. LIVERMORE; he enlarged on the idea, and insisted that, without the most urgent necessity, the provision contemplated ought not to be made in the present uncertain state of the subject. On the principles of justice and economy, he contended that a system which would be so complex in its operation ought not to be adopted; it would operate to the extension of taxation in the United States to the greatest degree, as it would involve a further levying of taxes to reimburse the States that shall finally appear to have large balances due them.

Mr. FITZSIMONS said he was not understood. Adverting to the act for assuming the State debts, he observed that these balances were there recognised, and the creditors to whom these balances are due are to all intents and purposes creditors of the Union. Mr. FITZSIMONS said he had no idea of the result contemplated by the gentleman in respect to the extension of taxes. No possible difference, he conceived, could take place whether the balances were now assumed, or the ascertainment of them was made previous thereto; the operation would be precisely the same in both cases.

Mr. SEDGWICK replied to Mr. MADISON. He stated various reasons to show that his objection on the score of increased taxes had really no foundation. Mr. SEDGWICK entered into a short discussion of the subject, and stated the real situation of some of the States, to whose citizens large sums are due. He said he had no doubt the General Government would consider themselves bound to pay those demands; could he despair of the public faith in this respect, he should despair of the Commonwealth; for he should anticipate the most pernicious consequences to flow from the withholding that justice, which those States now looked to the General Government to obtain.

Mr. MERCER observed, that the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania had brought forward his proposition in such a shape, as that it was difficult to determine what his object was; but he inferred from his explanations, unless he contradicted himself, that the real object was a further assumption of the State debts, and to effect the adoption of a question which was rejected the last session. Here Mr. M. entered into a consideration of the various principles which had been proposed as bases for settling and adjusting the accounts between the United States and individual States. He contended that the matter was not in such a state as to justify adopting the principle of the resolution. He adverted to the approaching dissolution of the present Congress. He remarked on the difference of the exertions which had been made by the several States; he inferred that there must necessarily be both debtor and creditor States, and hence deduced various considerations which should influence a postponement of this subject.

Mr. GERRY recurred to the Funding Act, to show that debtor and creditor States were therein recognised; with respect to the principles on which the accounts are to be settled, that matter rests with the Commissioners, whose decision by a law of the Government is to be final; but this he conceived had nothing to do with the present proposition. He noticed several other objections offered by Mr. MERCER, which he thought appeared to be brought forward merely to embarrass the subject. He observed that the present proposition was totally different from that agitated last session; that now offered is reasonable; is founded on equal principles; and its effect will not be to increase the creditors of the Union, nor induce a necessity for one farthing of taxation, which will not be wanted after the accounts are adjusted and the balances known. He hoped, therefore, that the proposition would be agreed to.

Mr. B. BOURNE supported the resolution, as being free from the objections urged to those offered the last session. He noticed the remarks which had been made on the resources in lands of the States to whom the balances are supposed to be due; Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and South Carolina are the States the most interested in the matter; those States have no lands. With respect to exertions in the common cause, it will not be pretended that those States have not made as great as any in the Union. The present proposition involves this simple inquiry, whether the United States shall pay the States as States, or whether they will pay the individual creditors? Justice required, in his opinion, that the latter ought to be paid; for their demands are recognised by a law of the Union, and they are, to all intents and purposes, creditors of the Union as fully as any description of creditors whatever.

Mr. CLARK said, when the resolutions were first proposed, he thought no objection would be made to them; but he had heard something which had alarmed him, and that was what fell from the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that there would be no debtor States; this, he said, alarmed him, as it appeared to convey an idea of the Commissioners for settling the accounts having adopted the principle; this he conceived they were not authorized to do. He further observed, that he did not think with those who supposed that the decisions of the Commissioners were not to be revised; he was pretty sure they would be revised, if they adopted any such principle as this, which he considered as involving great injustice.

Mr. FITZSIMONS rose to explain; he said he was misunderstood; he had not said there would be no debtor States. Different principles of settling the accounts have been mentioned, but he had not said whether the Commissioners would settle the accounts on the principle of debtor and creditor States, or make them all debtor or all creditor States. He had only given his opinion that there ought to be no debtor States. The question now before the Committee is, whether the United States shall pay the States in their corporate capacities, or pay the individual creditors. He conceived the gentleman was totally mistaken in his opinion respecting a revision of the judgment of the Commissioners; the law, he said, had put that entirely out of the power of the Legislature.

Claims against the United States.

Mr. W. SMITH said, that he conceived the present proposition had nothing to do with the question respecting debtor or creditor States; it relates simply to a provision for the sums due to the individual creditors of the several States, who are really creditors of the United States. He noticed the objection from additional taxes; no difference, he contended, would result from the measure, the balances are to be provided for at all events. That the present was the best time to take up the subject, he observed, was well argued by the gentleman from Pennsylvania; in addition to which, he thought the allusion to the state of affairs on the Representation bill, by the gentleman from Maryland, was directly in point; the difficulties on account of the ratio were increased, when the result of the census was known; and this would be the case if this matter should be postponed to the time when the accounts are settled. He therefore contended that the present was the most proper time to make the provision contemplated. Mr. SMITH noticed, in order, the various objections which had been made by several gentlemen, and concluded that he trusted, from what he had said, it would appear that the proposition was entirely clear of those difficulties which had been urged against it.

Mr. LIVERMORE moved an amendment to the first resolution; the object of which was to exonerate those States who on a final adjustment of accounts shall appear to be debtor States.

Mr. GERRY offered some objections to this amendment.

Mr. AMES said that the amendment appeared to him irrelevant to the subject now under consideration; he hoped, therefore, the gentleman would be induced to withdraw it.

Mr. MADISON observed, that when the amendment was first brought forward he had supposed it merely sportive, but it now appears that the gentleman is serious in moving it. He thought it in this view a proposition that might well excite attention; for he conceived it an extraordinary idea to be advanced, that any of the States who should be found debtor States should be released from all obligations to pay.

Mr. SEDGWICK offered various observations on the subject generally; the tenor of which was this, that however it might appear on the final adjustment of accounts, that there were sundry debtor States, yet it was hardly practicable to devise a mode of compelling payment from such States; nor could he collect it to be the opinion of any gentleman that an idea of compulsion was entertained by any one.

Mr. LIVERMORE said his motion was not understood; he had no idea of exonerating the debtor States in the manner suggested by several of the gentlemen who had remarked on it; by the explanation he gave of his motion, it appeared that his object was the apportioning the general charge, and to exonerate the debtor States from any demand against them, on account of the credit they were entitled to as members of the Union, not to release them from their full proportion of the average charge of prosecuting the war.

Mr. MERCER said he was more and more convinced that there was to be no debtor States; the proposition from the gentleman from New Hampshire says so; the resolutions originally moved speak the same language; the report of the Secretary of the Treasury is founded on the same principle. The meaning of all which is, burn the books.

Mr. CLARK moved that the Commissioners for settling the accounts should be instructed to report a statement of all the debts and credits of the several States. He reprobated the idea of making all creditor States, as he conceived the consequence would be a great increase of the balances to be provided for by the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMSON observed that he could not agree to the propositions, for reasons which he would give. In the law for settling the accounts of the several States, it is provided that the States who shall have balances placed to their credit on the books of the Treasury shall, within twelve months after the same, be entitled to have them funded. Such are the words of the law; but we are now requested to do the thing by anticipation which, according to the law, was to be done afterwards. Is there any consistency—is there any principle in such conduct? Whence this haste, this speed of funding? Have gentlemen such a pleasure in building up the ponderous structure of a national debt that no part of the work can remain for their successors? He hoped that a Representative from North Carolina might be allowed to complain of this unnecessary, unkind, he prayed it might not be fatal speed. North Carolina, at present, is not fairly represented. It is known that, instead of five members, she will have ten in the next Congress. The States in general are to have no such increase. Is it fair to anticipate measures contrary to the intent and promise of your law, as if you wished to tax our citizens before they can be properly represented? It is well known that much offence has been given to many good citizens by the Funding Act. It has been charged to motives which are very improper, considering the regard which is due to public opinion. He thought they were bound in honor to postpone rather than to anticipate the assumption of more paper. If gentlemen, however, could not trust this delectable business in the hands of a future Congress; if they could not trust their own States with the payment of a small debt; if they wished to render the National Government still more unpopular by giving it exclusively the iron hand of taxation, he hoped they would not make themselves accessaries to the most abandoned junto that ever disgraced society. If the propositions before the Committee should pass into a law, the State of North Carolina would be charged with something more than half a million of dollars, interest included, for certificates that were confessedly issued by the force of bribery and corruption. They were not founded on the shadow of service, and are prohibited by the laws of the State. The most sleepy sot in life would resent such conduct. They would suspect that such paper must have had some undue influence. He was confident that the propositions imported more than had been intended.

He wished that left-handed favors of this sort could be more equally divided. It was hard that North Carolina should be distinguished by her sufferings. In the settlement of her accounts he thought it was probable that she would lose near two millions of dollars by the manner in which her accounts were to be adjusted. He supposed that a rule by which a good horse put into the service does not bring the State more than half a dollar could not be a good rule. This must be a loss, first, to the citizens, afterwards to the State, which is nearly the same thing. There is another sum of about a million of dollars, which the citizens of that State seem to be in a fair way of losing by the measures of Government. They have received nothing for their certificates, and they are not permitted to fund them. Oblige the citizens of North Carolina, after all those losses or oppressions, to pay half a million that they do not owe, and you will at least deserve the title of hardy politicians. He said that he should offer no amendments to the propositions, because, in his opinion, they were improper in every part.

The question was then adjourned till the next day.

FRIDAY, January 11.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying his report of a supplementary statement of loans, made in behalf of the United States, pursuant to the resolution of the 27th ultimo; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Resolved, That the Attorney General be directed to report, at the next session of Congress, a table of costs and fees for the Courts of the United States.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the motion of the 12th ultimo, for opening a Loan, to the amount of the balances which, upon a final settlement of accounts, shall be found due from the United States to the individual States; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had again had the said motion under consideration, and made no amendment thereto.

SATURDAY, January 12.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the motion, made on the 12th ultimo, for opening a Loan to the amount of the balances which, upon a final settlement of accounts, shall be found due from the United States to the individual States, which was reported from the Committee of the Whole House, yesterday, without amendment. Whereupon, a motion being made and seconded to amend the first resolution, contained in the said motion, by adding, to the end thereof, the following proviso, to wit:

“Provided, That no such loan shall be opened in any State, without the assent of the Legislature thereof, by an act approving the measure.”

It was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 38, nays 23, as follows:

NAYS.—John Baptist Ashe, Abraham Baldwin, William Findley, William B. Orr, Josiah Parker, Cornelius C. Schoonmaker, John Steele, Thomas Tredwell, Hugh Williamson, and Francis Willis.

And then the main question being put, that the House do agree to the said first resolution, amended to read as follows:

“Resolved, That a loan, to the amount of the balances which, upon a final settlement of accounts, shall be found due from the United States to the individual States, be opened at the Loan Offices in the respective States, to commence within — months after the said balances shall be reported at the Treasury, and to continue open for the term of — months from the time of its commencement: Provided, That no such loan shall be opened in any State without the assent of the Legislature thereof, by an act approving the measure.”

It was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 34, nays 28, as follows:

of the certificates or notes issued by any of the said States, as, upon the final settlement of accounts, shall have a balance due to them from the United States, and which shall have been liquidated to specie value, prior to the — day of — last.

Resolved, That every subscriber to the said loans shall be entitled to certificates, according to the sum subscribed, of the like tenor and description, in the like proportions, and upon the like terms, as are specified and directed by the fifteenth and sixteenth sections of the act, entitled 'An act making provision for the Debt of the United States,' except that interest on such of the certificates subscribed to the said loan, as bear interest, shall be computed to the last day of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, inclusively, and that interest shall not begin to accrue upon any of the certificates which shall be issued in lieu thereof, till the first day of January, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four.

Resolved, That in all cases where the sum subscribed in the evidences of the debt of any State, shall exceed the balance due to such State, the same shall be reduced (in equal proportions) to the sum actually due to such State."

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolutions, and that Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. SEDGWICK, and Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, do prepare and bring in the same.

MONDAY, January 14.

A memorial of the officers of the late Delaware line of the Continental Army, in behalf of themselves and the soldiers of the said line, was presented to the House and read, praying that the depreciation which accrued on the certificates of debts granted them for military services rendered during the late war, may be made good to them, or such other relief afforded them as the present circumstances of the United States will admit.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to the Committee of the Whole House to whom are referred the memorials of the late officers and soldiers of the lines of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, and Maryland.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the amendment, reported on Thursday last, by the Committee of the Whole House, to the bill relative to claims against the United States, not barred by any act of limitation, and which have not been already adjusted; and the said amendment being twice read, was, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resumed the consideration of the amendments reported, on the 27th ultimo, by the Committee of the Whole House, to the bill to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes; and the same being read, were agreed to.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, do lie on the table.

PAY OF THE LATE ARMY.

Mr. BOUDINOT moved for the order of the day on the Bankrupt law. The importance of this subject to the general interest, and that of a number of individuals in several of the States, who, by reason of the State Governments being precluded from passing bankrupt laws, are in a very distressed situation, was urged by several of the members. It was further observed, that it had long been before Congress; and if it was not taken up at the present session, it was very problematical whether it would be completed at the next session.

In opposition to the motion, it was observed, that though the subject has been a long time on the carpet, yet it had not been reduced to any specific form till very lately. That the bill had been laid before the public for the express purpose of collecting the general sense of the people on the subject. Sufficient time has not elapsed for this purpose, and therefore it was not possible for the Legislature to proceed in the matter, aided by the general sense of their constituents relative thereto.

The motion was at length withdrawn; and, on motion of Mr. GERRY, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, (Mr. DAYTON in the Chair,) and took into consideration the memorials of the officers of the several lines of the late Army, on the subject of a deficiency of their pay. The several memorials were, from New Hampshire, Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland lines. The New Hampshire and Pennsylvania memorials being read—

Mr. GERRY said, in order to bring the subject before the Committee, he should move the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, As the opinion of this committee, that the contract between Congress and part of the officers and soldiers of the armies raised for the establishment of the Independence of the United States, has not been fulfilled on the part of Congress."

This motion was seconded by Mr. PARKER.

Mr. GERRY accompanied his motion by several observations, in which he showed that a depreciated medium could never be considered as an equivalent for services and supplies which were contracted to be paid for in specie.

Several members objected to the indefiniteness of this resolution. They suggested the propriety of the mover's bringing forward a sketch of the plan for which he intended the resolution as a basis.

Mr. MADISON suggested a variation of the proposition, to the simple question on the propriety of granting the prayer of the petitions.

After several observations from other members, and the Chairman had remarked that the resolution of Mr. GERRY was not in order, as referring to a part of the officers, whereas the memorials made no distinction,

Mr. CLARK moved, in order to take the sense of the Committee, the following:

Resolved, As the opinion of this committee, that the prayer of the petitions of officers of several lines of the late American army cannot be granted, and that the petitioners have leave to withdraw their petitions."

JANUARY, 1793.]

Mr. SEDGWICK observed, that he did not rise to express an opinion as to any vote which he might ultimately give on the subject now before the Committee. It was undoubtedly an important subject; important, as it respects the character of the applicants, and as it involved a consideration of the services which had been rendered by them. No man had a more respectful opinion than he entertained of the honorable patriotism of those brave and meritorious citizens who had ventured their lives in defence of their country. No man would more regret than himself, that those services should remain unremunerated. Thus feeling, he should be sorry if the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey should preclude a discussion of the various questions which might otherwise arise in the contemplation of this subject.

He said he knew several gentlemen who believed that it was impracticable to grant the prayer of the memorials, without producing evils, so many and so great, as infinitely more than to counterbalance the benefits intended. That it would be a criminating reflection on gentlemen who, with so much warmth of declamation, had espoused the cause of the applicants, to suppose that they foresaw those evils and were not prepared to guard against them. It would be indirectly charging upon them as the motive of their conduct, to give an approving countenance to an impracticable object, an intention of acquiring popularity at the expense of the reputation of the Government. This was a charge he had no disposition to make; he would therefore suppose the gentlemen had digested some scheme, in their opinion, of practicable compensation, which, by what they have said, they have pledged to bring forward to the consideration of the Committee; but they would be precluded from doing it, should the mover of the present question persist in having the fate of the memorials decided on his motion.

He said that, confident in the hope that the gentlemen would gratify the wishes of his friends, he would take the liberty of mentioning some of the embarrassing questions which the Committee must meet in the progress of this business.

The whole merit of the present application, in his opinion, rested on the supposition that by the terms of the Funding law the Government had made a saving to itself; or, to speak with more precision, to the debtor part of the community. In other words, that by the terms of the loan an adequate provision was not made for the public debt. This supposition is denied by many gentlemen, who did not hesitate expressly to declare that the provision is ample, and ought to be satisfactory. Others, he said, went further, and even insinuated that there existed a sympathetic sensibility between the majority of Congress and the public creditors, injurious to the great body of the people. This saving constituted that residuum of the original contract, which was the subject of the present demand. If, then, there was no saving there was no residuum, no subject of distribution. On this idea the application is to the generosity, not the justice, of Congress. On this ground the memorials, he presumed, were not advocated by those gentlemen. Should it, however, be demonstrated that the contemplated saving had been made to the public, he asked whether this was the only description of creditors to whom injustice had been done? And would not the same arguments which should demonstrate their rights prove equally the title of every other original holder to further provision? Was there any discriminating principle by which it would appear that these men alone were entitled to redress for a violation of justice? These questions were important, and being obvious, they must have occurred to the gentlemen, who, it might reasonably be presumed, had come prepared, if not with satisfactory, at least with plausible answers.

He said, that among the evils which had been endured during our struggle for freedom and independence, was a lapse of public credit, by which there had been apportioned a severe tax on the citizens; and although this was not in exact proportion, yet it was generally more equal than probably any reapportionment would make it. It was said, at least by some, that by comparing the relative circumstances of the army before and since the war, with the community at large, it might be presumed that they had not contributed to this tax beyond their proportion. If, on the whole, the claim of the army could not be distinguished from that of the other original creditors, and if justice required the provision contended for, then it would follow, irresistibly, that an account was to be opened with each original creditor; that even if a distinction could be discovered which would authorize a difference between the army and every other description of creditors, it was, he said, further asked by gentlemen who believed the project to be impracticable, whether it was intended, by a further distinction, to separate the officers from the soldiers, to provide for the former and not for the latter? If one part of the dilemma was chosen, it would operate manifest injustice; if the other, the Government would open those sources of speculation which seemed to threaten to inundate the country with enormous evils. He said gentlemen who were disposed to afford a favorable countenance to the present applications had undoubtedly considered these effects, and had also considered the means of preventing those evils, and candor required that they should be indulged with an opportunity of exhibiting their system.

He said that it was further objected, that the proposed measure would materially alter the Funding system, a strict adherence to which was guaranteed to the public by an almost unanimous vote of both Houses.

He said the objections he had mentioned were among the most important of those which had occurred on this subject; that a discussion of them would open an extensive field of argument. He thought it would be of public utility that they should be discussed; he therefore again solicited the gentlemen from New Jersey to withdraw his motion, that an opportunity might be afforded to gentlemen to bring forward a digested system.

Mr. BOUNDNOT assured the Committee that he had determined not to trouble them on this subject, and he should have carried that determination into execution, did he not find that the question was likely to be taken in a manner not altogether pleasing to him. He had expected that the claims of the officers would have been fairly met, and if decided in the negative, those gentlemen would have gone away fully satisfied that their claims had received a fair and candid discussion. But he feared, from the arguments of gentlemen, that the idea that the United States had unjustly failed in performing the contract with the Army, would take place, and an ungrounded imputation of partiality (at least in the minds of the petitioners) would be left on the Government, when Mr. B. thought a fair statement of the matter would undoubtedly put a very different face on the whole subject. The officers of the Army had come forward as creditors of the United States in a decent and becoming manner, and presented their claims founded on former contracts, which they conceived had not been fulfilled, and therefore they called on Government to do what was right and just on the occasion. Congress were the independent representatives of the whole Union, to whom every citizen ought to have free access; and where every citizen was to be considered as equally entitled to an impartial hearing. If, on examination, it should appear that justice required a further compensation to the petitioners as a class of public creditors, when considered on a general scale, no man in the House would be more ready than himself to give his voice for such a measure. But if it should appear that the contract on the part of the public had been complied with, as far as distributive justice would permit, he wished the petitioners to be convinced of it, and that those losses they had met with, were such as had been equally borne by other creditors of the Union, and therefore a general burden, by which he hoped they would receive full satisfaction on this subject.

Mr. B., while he acknowledged the patriotism and virtue of the American Army, and subscribed fully to their eminent services and patient sufferings, he could not join in decrying the essential services and sufferings of the other public creditors of the United States, who, in the day of her distress, had administered their property to the support of that Army and the defence of the Union.

All public creditors who presented themselves in the day of distress to the relief of the Union, were equally entitled to the attention of Congress; but, as the officers in their memorials had applied in behalf of the army alone, he wished to consider their case, in the first instance, abstractly, without connecting it with any other class of creditors, and then compare it with others of their fellow-citizens.

He undertook, therefore, in the first place, to state the public conduct towards the Army from the beginning to the commencement of the present Government. He would then examine the conduct of the present Government; and lastly, supposing their claim just, inquire into the practicability of satisfying it.

The Committee were well acquainted with the rise and progress of the late war. At the first alarm the patriotic citizens of the Colonies flew to their arms and formed in the field, without terms or stipulations as to their services. In 1775, Congress turned their attention to the Army as the first great object, and having organized it, fixed the pay at the rate of fifty dollars for a Colonel, and twenty dollars for a Captain. In 1776, desirous of encouraging citizens who were so zealous in their country's service, they gave a bounty of twenty dollars to each private, amounting in the whole to upwards of two hundred thousand dollars, besides a promise of one hundred acres of land; and to the officers at the rate of five hundred acres to a Colonel, and the rest in proportion. In October of the same year, desirous of keeping up the zeal of the officers, they increased the pay in the proportion of seventy-five dollars to a Colonel, and forty dollars to a Captain, and gave a suit of clothes per annum to every private, or twenty dollars in cash. In December, 1777, Congress showed their desire of encouraging the service, by giving a month's extra pay to the Army. The officers, anxious for their future support after the war was over, expressed an earnest desire of having some provision of this sort anticipated, and Congress, in compliance with their desires, after a consideration of three months, or more, agreed, in May, 1778, to give each officer half-pay for seven years after the end of the war, on condition that they did not hold any office of profit under any individual State, and eighty dollars to each private. In November following they gave to each supernumerary officer one year's pay extraordinary, and increased the allowance for every retained ration to 2s. 6d. in money. The Army, not being satisfied with this provision, in August, 1779, a committee, appointed for the purpose, reported further provision of half-pay for life, without any condition in favor of those who should continue to the end of the war, and recommended to the States to provide for widows of officers and soldiers who should be killed in the service. Congress likewise increased the allowance of monthly subsistence for officers to five hundred dollars for a Colonel, a Captain two hundred dollars, and a private ten dollars; and, added to all this, Congress allowed the officers to receive from the public stores one hat, a watch-coat, body coat, four vests, four pair of breeches, four shirts, four stocks, six pair of stockings, and four pair of shoes, per annum, nearly at former prices; and the soldiers in proportion. The half-pay for life was adopted, to the great offence of individual States, who sent forward petitions against the measure as impolitic and unjust. The war continuing, the distresses of the country increased, which reduced the public credit so low, as to produce great uneasiness among all classes of public creditors, both in the Army and country.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. HARTLEY,] in his argument, represented (in Mr. B.'s opinion) his own feelings on the occasion, rather than a comparative view of the sufferings of the citizens at large; for it is not uncommon, when gentlemen are connected with a particular class of sufferers, to view what he sees and hears as an exclusive and peculiar evil, without considering what passes elsewhere. Thus, the soldier considers the sacrifice of the Army as the only intolerable burden; while the merchant, knowing his own losses best, considers others' complaints as trifling compared to his; and the farmer, who earns every farthing by the sweat of his brow, blames the Government for not giving him the first place in all their systems. Yet the fair conclusion is, that the burden has been generally nearly equal, and a common tax for the defence of our country. And although Mr. B. readily subscribed to the great sufferings and patriotic exertions of the Army, yet they should also give credit for the attention of their country to the utmost of her abilities. As the gentleman from Pennsylvania is best acquainted with the line of his own State, Mr. B. undertook to mention what was done by Pennsylvania for her own officers in addition to the allowance of Congress. During the war, stores were provided, from which they received a partial supply at the hard money prices. The depreciation of their pay was fully made up to them; at the sales of the confiscated estates their certificates were received as hard money; the same for lands in the land office; the interest of six per cent. was paid on their certificates for a number of years; an additional bounty of land was given to them, ready surveyed and free from expense; and when the Funding System took place, they had their three per cent. and deferred debt made good to six per cent. by additional certificates from the State, which were afterwards redeemed at about fifty and thirty-seven per cent. in hard money.

In August, 1782, a memorial from the State of Pennsylvania called loudly on Congress for fresh exertions towards the settlement of all accounts, and making provision for the paying off the public debt. It is supposed the Army took the hint, and in December following, a deputation of field officers, with a strong memorial on behalf of the Army, waited on Congress. The substance of their request was—first, some present pay; secondly, a settlement of their accounts and security for their balances; and thirdly, a commutation of their half-pay for life; as they found that the measure was odious to their fellow-citizens, and would prevent the happy intercourse they expected on their return to private life. The present pay and settlement of accounts were immediately provided for, and as to security for the balances, Congress resolved, "as to what relates to the providing of security for what shall be found due on such settlement, that the troops of the United States, in common with all the creditors of the same, have an undoubted right to expect such security, and that Congress will make every effort in their power to obtain from the respective States substantial funds adequate to the object," &c. As to the commutation, it was urged, on the part of the Army, that five or six years full pay was but a reasonable sum to make good their sufferings, not only on account of the deficiency of their pay, but also on other accounts; and that it would be more agreeable to their fellow-citizens, than that they should be pensioners for life. Mr. B. mentioned this from his memory, which he said was confirmed by the Journals of Congress of February, 1783, when a resolution proposed was prefaced in this manner: "Whereas, in consequence of the faithful services of the officers of the Army of the United States, and of their great sufferings, not only on account of the deficiency of their pay, but on other accounts, Congress have, by divers resolutions, promised them half-pay," &c. The want of money having been raised as an objection against this measure, the officers contended that they expected nothing more than certificates for their balances, in the same manner as other creditors of the United States had received. Congress finally determined to grant their request; but to prevent the Army from alienating their certificates at an under rate, and thereby affecting the public credit, it was proposed that they should not be made transferable. As soon as the delegation from the Army were made acquainted with this, they spurned at the idea, and justly asked if they were not freemen; if the balances were not their own property; whether they had not the same right to dispose of their property as they pleased, with every other citizen? They therefore insisted to be put on a footing with every other creditor who had received certificates. The reasoning was too forcible to be answered with propriety; and therefore Congress, on the 22d of March, 1783, resolved, "that such officers, &c., shall be entitled to receive the amount of five years' full pay in money or securities on interest at six per cent. per annum, as Congress shall find most convenient, instead of the half-pay promised for life; the said securities to be such as shall be given to other creditors of the United States, provided it is at the option of the lines of the respective States to accept or refuse the same." "That, with regard to the retiring officers, the commutation, if accepted by them, shall be in lieu of whatever may be now due, as well as what might hereafter become due," &c. This commutation amounted to $4,500 to a Colonel, and $2,400 to a Captain.

Mr. B. alleged his privity to this arrangement, having been in Congress at the time, and of course one of the parties to the contract. He also observed very particularly on this measure originating with the Army, and especially the negotiable property of the certificates: that in this transaction all former demands were involved, and the express stipulation of the Army and the assent of Congress was, not to pay a specific sum in specie, but to give such securities for the balances as should be given to the other creditors of the United States. Here, then, was no difference between creditors; all were put on a footing; and every citizen who had made advances for the Government, or had fought her battles, were considered equally entitled to the attention of Government. From this time the demands of the Army put on the face of a settled debt, and requisitions were made to the different States for a fund on which to found a certainty of payment, at least of the interest, from year to year: all the States but one having made the necessary arrangements, the plan was frustrated; but many of the individual States made provision for, and did actually pay, the interest of six per cent. for several years. Notwithstanding these partial payments the public credit suffered much, and, among other causes, the great number of these negotiable securities brought to market was not the least. The distresses of some, the different objects of pursuit of others which required capital, the debts of others which called for payment as soon as the war was over, and the fears of others for the fate of the Government, all conspired to bring on a general bankruptcy. These securities fell from six shillings and eight pence to two shillings and six pence in the pound, and transfers were as common as any other merchandise. The public fears and the universal complaint of creditors finally brought about a change of the Government, and the new Constitution was formed, in which two material articles applied to all creditors: one, that the new Government was to be liable for the debts of the old; and another, that all contracts should be carried into effect agreeably to the terms of them. The old Congress had so far complied with their engagements as to give the securities required by the contract, and to apply to the individual States for the funds promised. The new Government, at the earnest request of her creditors, turned an early attention to the public debt. She found the contracts were with the original creditor, bearer, or assignee. The holder was equally a party to the contract, and demanded the whole debt, without regard to the sum paid for it to the original holder; on the other hand, many contended for the right of the first creditor as an equitable demand to the surplus, (or at least a part of it) after paying the principal and interest of the sum for which it was transferred. To this it was answered, that Congress could not consider themselves as a Court of Law or Equity to determine these claims; they were bound to A, B or bearer, or his assignee; the holder of the evidence of the public debt could alone, in law or equity, give a discharge of the debt; that it would be unconstitutional to destroy the contract of the parties, when made bona fide, and it was agreed that fraud could vitiate every contract for which the Courts of Justice were adequate: therefore it was, that all discrimination was refused; first, as a matter without the jurisdiction of Congress; secondly, as a matter unjust, on the principle of a fair contract made on a risk to be run; and, lastly, as impracticable in its very nature. In consequence of this, propositions were made to the holders of the public securities on the principles of the Funding System; the substance of which were, that as the Government in its infancy could not embrace a discharge of the debts, or, indeed, a payment of full interest, without risking the public credit as heretofore, and by this means again exposing the creditor to loss, it was therefore advisable to new-modify the debt, so that the creditor should give up three per cent. upon the interest, and two per cent. on the principal, for ten years, for which he should receive an equivalent in the following manner: It was a very reasonable conjecture, in case the new Government succeeded and public credit was restored, that interest would fall in five years to five per cent., and in ten years to four per cent.; in which case Congress might, by new loans, at that rate of interest, pay off the whole national debt: but on the present plan, she would secure to the holder full four per cent. on the principal for ten years, and afterwards six per cent. for a certain number of years, on terms, with three per cent. on the interest let the common rate of interest be what it might. This was accepted by the creditor as a reasonable equivalent, and the debt was subscribed.

The event proved the truth of the supposition, and the value of the Funded Debt at one time rose to twenty-five shillings on the pound on six per cent., while loans have been made by the United States at from four to five per cent. Congress then gave a certainty of six per cent. for a number of years, on the terms of the loans for a partial reduction for ten years, and a less interest on the arrears of interest then due. This was certainly a full and generous equivalent; and the only advantage gained by the public was, a modification of the debt, by which the burden would be divided, and the increased number of citizens, during fourteen or fifteen years, would bear their proportion of the expense of a war in the benefit of which they so essentially participated. At the time of funding the public debt, the irredeemable quality was considered as a full equivalent and a compliance with the public faith. Mr. B. alleged that he was then a public creditor, and considered it in that point of light. He was a creditor that had a right to feel a loss as much as any man. He was a creditor of 1776, when the Army could not be sent to Canada without hard money. He was a creditor in 1777, when the prisoners were perishing for want of food and clothing, and the Government could not furnish a single suit, or a tolerable supply, for their extreme distress. He was a creditor of 1778, when, at the Valley Forge, the tracks of the soldiers were marked with blood for want of shoes, which he collected in different parts of the State by his own exertions, and at his own expense, without fee or reward, and was not repaid till 1779. He was a large creditor of 1779, when Congress sent to all parts of the Union earnestly calling on the friends of their country to come forward with loans for the public exigencies; and he was a creditor as an officer of the Army, in which he had served. Under this view of the subject, Mr. B. acknowledged that he had entertained great jealousies lest some other end was aimed at by the present resolution than the ostensible one; this was raised when he heard gentlemen found the success of the resolution on the savings made by the Funding System, when those gentlemen had for years past been continually representing that system as founded on an extravagant waste of public treasure; that the irredeemability of the debt was a tax on the Government which ought never to have been admitted, as moneys might have been loaned at four per cent., and by that means one-third of the debt saved to the Union. What ideas, then, must we form of a resolution calculated to raise the hopes of the memorialists, which, in the end, would certainly turn out a mere shadow, and worse than a shadow? This, really, was trifling with the complaints of our fellow-citizens. There had been no savings. The creditors who had possession of the public contracts had received a full equivalent for their demand by their own free consent, at twenty shillings in the pound. Where, then, was room for a demand on the Government for any saving? If there was a foundation for a claim, it must be against the possessors of the certificates; but however just it might be, it was merely illusory to form the resolution on principles that had no existence.

The losses sustained by the line of the Army were not peculiar to them as creditors of the United States. All classes of citizens who had generously advanced their money for the support of this very Army in food, clothing, arms, and ammunition, as well as that of the Government itself at home and abroad, had been equal sufferers, without the emolument which the Army had received, in the most distressing times of the war. The Army had been a refuge for many gentlemen driven from their homes, while other citizens were obliged to wander for a considerable time without employ or relief. He extended his observations to other citizens who had suffered during the war, and particularly mentioned the sufferers at Falmouth, Charlestown, New York, Norfolk, Yorktown, and South Carolina, as those who were of the first class in the United States; as also the aged, the widows, and the orphan creditors, who had suffered without receiving any advantage whatever from the public bounty.

Mr. B. then proceeded to consider the practicability of the measure, supposing its equality and justice to be fairly established. As the application was now founded on the savings on each man's individual certificate, the principle equally reached every public creditor. Suppose, then, A, B, C, D, and E, received their certificates together: A sold his at six shillings and eight pence in the pound to raise a capital to purchase public lands, which, at one time in this city, sold at six pence per acre; B sold his certificate at two shillings and six pence in the pound, to save a wife and children from starving; C sold his to raise a capital to go into the speculating line; D sold on one day from necessity, but replaced it the next day, and kept it till the Funding System took place, and then sold at twenty shillings in the pound; while E having confidence in the Government, and not being under a necessity of selling, funded it under the present system. How could a discrimination take place here? or would it be fair equally to remunerate all these original holders? But suppose some had sold at twenty shillings, and also had received all the emoluments of the Pennsylvania line; where would be the distributive justice of the measure now proposed? If you extend this doctrine to the public creditors at large, it will appear in a strong point of light. It is well known that the common practice of the Government during the war, was, to issue certificates in fictitious names—the names of clerks in office, of heads of departments, or other persons—merely to make them answer the purpose of a paper currency: as they were payable to bearer, the name was never thought to be material. The person doing the service or lending his money received these certificates, and was really the original holder, yet the face of the certificate spoke a different language. In this case a discrimination would be impossible; and much the largest part of the public debt was contracted in this way, after the war was over. Many debts had been paid by merchants and others to their foreign creditors and others, in certificates at their nominal value; and, in other cases, individuals had failed, and the loss had wholly fallen on their creditors. Mr. B. earnestly contended that the expense of a discrimination would exceed the revenues of the United States. The nature of transferable stock, which is designed to operate as current money, forbids the idea of a discrimination, and all public credit must necessarily fail if such a doctrine was to prevail in the finances of the Union. This was a very serious and important idea, worthy the attention of the applicants, who certainly were interested in the public weal. The right of freemen to dispose of their own property as they please, was involved in the question: for if the Government was to make up every loss on a transfer, then it ought not to be made without their consent. Mr. B. hoped he would not be understood to deny either the services or the sufferings of the Army; but he alleged the promised recompense was given, which had been transferred with all the legal and equitable right to the holder, who had received from Government the full value, and therefore no further demand either in law or equity remained against the Government. The negotiable quality was a principle in the securities insisted on by the Army, and which they had used as they chose, for different purposes, and from different views. He acknowledged that the generosity, benevolence, and humanity of Congress, had been addressed: to this he answered, that they were but stewards of the people's property, for which they were answerable; that they were not sent here to show their generosity; it was to do justice; and that not to one class, but to every description of citizens. He knew of but one rule for every citizen of the United States. They were all equally represented in that House; but at all events it became them to be just before they were generous.

Mr. B. assured the House that he had taken up so much of their time, because he found that no one had come forward fairly to meet the question, and he had too great a regard for the memorialists to wish them to go away under the idea that anything had been refused to them which ought in propriety to have been done. At any rate, he had candidly and above-board given the reasons of his vote on this important occasion, which would be against the question proposed by the gentlemen from Virginia.

The Committee now rose, without taking any question.

TUESDAY, January 15.

An engrossed bill relative to claims against the United States, not barred by any act of limitation, and which have not been already adjusted, was read the third time and passed.

Mr. FITZSIMONS, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to authorize a Loan in the certificates or notes of such States as shall have balances due to them, upon a final settlement of accounts with the United States; which was read twice and committed.

On a motion made and seconded,

"That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill for placing on the pension list all such officers and privates of the Militia as have been or shall be wounded or disabled in the service of the United States, and not provided for by law."

Ordered, That the said motion be referred to the consideration of a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

On a motion made and seconded,

"That the memorial and petition of sundry merchants of the city of Charleston, in the State of South Carolina, engaged in commerce previous to the late Revolution, which was presented to this House at the last session, stating the particular hardships under which they labor, from the twofold causes of the operation of the fourth article of the definitive Treaty of Peace, and of so much of the act of Congress for funding the public debt, as redeems the old Continental money, at the rate of one hundred dollars thereof for one dollar specie; the former requiring them to pay their British debts in sterling money, with full interest to the present time; and the latter depriving them of all hope of indemnity from the effects of depreciation and tender laws, to which they were exposed during the war, and praying relief:" be referred to the consideration of the Committee of the Whole House to whom are referred the memorials of the lines of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland.

This motion occasioned a debate; those who opposed it, contended that it was a distinct and different case from that of the officers; that it involved a very different investigation and could not therefore be connected with it; and that it appeared to be designed to embarrass and perplex the application of the officers.

In support of the motion, a variety of reasons were adduced to show that the cases were parallel, and that there was no propriety in making a distinction between different classes of citizens in their application for relief in similar cases. After considerable debate,

The previous question being called for by five members, to wit: "Shall the main question, to agree to the said motion, be now put?"

It was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 30, nays 24, as follows:

And then the main question being put, that the House do agree to the said motion, it passed in the negative—yeas 24, nays 30, as follows:

PAY OF THE LATE ARMY.

The petitions of the officers of the late Army being under consideration in Committee of the Whole, the following motion was made by Mr. GERRY, viz:

"Resolved, As the opinion of this Committee, that provision be made for such officers, non-commissioned officers, and soldiers of the late Army of the United States, who received certificates for the balances due to them on a final settlement of their respective accounts: Provided, That such provision shall not exceed the difference between the nominal amount of the said certificates and the real amount, estimated at the present rates in the market, of the certificates which are or may be issued for those first mentioned, pursuant to an act making provision for the Debt of the United States."

Mr. CLARK moved an amendment, which was to insert in the first clause after the word "for," all persons who have received liquidated certificates for services rendered or supplies furnished during the late war; and, on this motion to amend, Mr. HARTLEY made the following observations:

Mr. H. wished that a question upon the prayer of the petitions might be fairly taken, without any embarrassment or connexion with another subject. Let us, he said, consider and discuss the claims of the officers and soldiers of the late Army, and either grant them, or dismiss their petitions with decency. The gentleman from New Jersey yesterday came forward with a resolution, expressing that the prayer of the petitioners could not be granted. If this was consistent with his opinion, it was candid; he appeared openly to avow his sentiments. I cannot say quite so much in his favor to-day for withdrawing his motion. Indeed, the motion presented by the gentleman from Massachusetts comes forward in so questionable a shape, that I am at a loss to know who are friends or enemies to the objects of the petitioners. To adopt the proposed amendment, I consider as death to the motion on the table; it embraces too much; it contemplates what the abilities of this country are not competent to. I hope it will not be agreed to. The officers and soldiers attempt to show that there is a distinction between their case and other citizens; besides, what have they to hope from the bounty and magnanimity of the nation? It may not be amiss for me here to mention, that I have never had a certificate, and that I am not personally interested in the question. I was an officer in part of the war, but have nothing to ask for here. I consider that the officers and soldiers have a claim of justice as well as equity, besides what they might expect from the magnanimity of the nation. I shall say but a few words on the sufferings and distress of the Army; they were great, and unexampled in the history of mankind. Those who are now present, and were either in the Cabinet or field, must know the force of my observation. I will not detail the scenes of misery exhibited during the war. To support the rights and liberties of the country, officers and soldiers freely entered into the service. In the year 1776, the officers had half-pay; in the year 1777, the pay was nominally increased, but unfortunately depreciation came on, and their actual compensation was less than the year before. I have a respect for a militiaman, but his case cannot be compared, in point of difficulties and danger, to that of the officer and soldier—the former occasionally called forth, the latter constantly at the post of danger and duty. There was certainly an inequality in their situations, which ought to have been compensated for to the soldier. The officer who was married, though he could meet the dangers of the field himself, yet could not view with fortitude the poverty and misfortune which threatened his family.

Congress had made no provision to grant half-pay to the officers (who should serve to the end of the war) until some time in the year 1778. Several officers who were well attached to the cause, owing to their necessities and the circumstances of their families, were obliged to resign. The Commander-in-Chief saw the evils which threatened his country and the Army; he stated them to Congress; some strong promises and appearances were absolutely necessary on the part of Government, or the Army would not be kept together. These were made in the most solemn manner. Many officers and soldiers were retained. Depreciation still continued. The soldier, hungry and forlorn, was obliged to take the paper that was offered him by the Government. This was not in general the case with the farmer; the latter most commonly parted with his property voluntarily. One kind of paper followed another during the war; each depreciated; but still Congress, by repeated resolutions, (in order to induce the officers and soldiers to remain at their post,) engaged that they should be compensated at the end of the war. Certificates of different kinds were issued; and I believe Congress, and the whole American world, expected they were to be paid in specie as soon as there was sufficient ability in the Government. And I still think there is a difference between their claims and those of the other citizens. At the first session of Congress under the present Government, the House resolved that they would support the public credit; and strong expressions were used. This gave great confidence to the public; certificates were enhanced in value, and many of them had passed into the hands of strangers, under the faith of Government; so that, when the Funding bill passed, nothing could be done without the consent of the holders. I wished exceedingly for an opportunity to give my aid in favor of the officers and soldiers who had served to the end of the war. It was a voluntary act in the holder to fund his debt at about four per cent., and it appears there is a considerable saving to Government out of the earnings of the officer and soldier, and which may fairly and honorably be granted to them. I mean to reach this. Those who concur with me in sentiment, ought to be against the amendment now under consideration, and assist to alter the motion so as to embrace the objects we have in view.

The Committee rose without coming to any conclusion.

WEDNESDAY, January 16.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the memorials of the late officers and soldiers of the lines of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had again had the said memorials under consideration, and come to a resolution thereupon; which being amended to read as follows:

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this Committee that the prayer of the memorials of the officers and soldiers of several of the lines of the late Army of the United States, ought not to be granted.

The question was taken, that the House do agree to the said resolution, and it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 43, nays 10, as follows:

Ordered, That Mr. GROVE be added to the committee appointed the 14th of November last, to take into consideration that part of the PRESIDENT'S Speech which relates to the transmission of newspapers, and report whether any, and what, alterations may be necessary in the act passed last session, for the regulation of the Post Office, in the room of Mr. STEBLE, excused from serving thereon.

Ordered, That Mr. MENCER be added to the committee to whom was recommitted the report of the committee appointed to inquire into the causes of the failure of the expedition under Major General St. Clair.

THURSDAY, January 17.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill for determining the Northern boundary of the territory ceded to the United States by the State of North Carolina; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made an amendment thereto; which was read twice, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to continue in force, for a limited time, and to amend the act, entitled "An act providing the means of intercourse between the United States and foreign nations:"

INDIAN TRADE.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, which lay on the table;—when

Mr. MADISON'S amendment came up for consideration, viz: to strike out the eighth section, which provided that no sale of land made by any tribe of Indians shall be valid to any person or State, whether such State may have the right of pre-emption or not, unless the same be made and executed at some public treaty held for that purpose, under the authority of the United States: And in lieu thereof, to insert a new section, declaring that no person shall be capable of acquiring any title to any lands beyond the Indian boundaries, and within those of the United States, by purchase, gift, or otherwise, from the Indians claiming the same; and that it shall be a misdemeanor in any person, punishable by fine and imprisonment, at the discretion of a jury, to obtain, accept, or treat, for any title to such lands. And when any Indians shall desire, of their own accord, to sell any part of their lands, and it shall be deemed for the interest of the United States that a purchase shall be made, the same shall be done no otherwise than by a treaty to be entered into pursuant to the Constitution; the lands so purchased to enure to the use of whoever may have the right of pre-emption thereto, and who shall pay the price thereof.

Mr. MADISON observed, that misunderstandings, quarrels, and wars with the Indians, had originated from the circumstance of persons having obtained, through fraud, or other improper means, possession of lands belonging to the Indians. This consideration rendered it highly important that this whole business should be under the absolute and sole direction of the public authority, in order to guard effectually against the fatal consequences which may result to the public by being precipitated into a war, through the arts of unprincipled persons, who, while the public are made to sustain great calamities, often find means to extricate themselves from bearing their proportion of its inconveniences and expenses.

Mr. LIVERMORE moved, that the words "at the discretion of a jury;" "and it shall be deemed for the interest of the United States that a purchase shall be made," be struck out.

Mr. BARNWELL objected to the amendment. He thought the original section as comprehensive as the other; that it was better worded, and liable to fewer exceptions; for though the latter is longer, yet, sales made pursuant to treaties held under an authority not expressly pointed out, would be liable to cavil and revision; and the persons holding a treaty for the purpose of making purchases, are exposed to a penalty.

Mr. GILES preferred the substitute, because it provided a penalty for improper purchases.

Mr. FITZSIMONS proposed to retain the original section, and to amend it, by inserting after the word sale, or gift;" and to add the penalty contained in the substitute.

The original section was struck out, and the new section was amended as proposed; and the bill and amendment were ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

FRIDAY, January 18.

An engrossed bill to continue in force, for a limited time, and to amend the act, entitled "An act providing the means of intercourse between the United States and foreign nations," was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill for determining the Northern boundary of the territory ceded to the United States by the State of North Carolina was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes was read the third time, and passed.

JOHN TUCKER.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to compensate John Tucker.

Mr. SEDGWICK moved to fill the blank with five hundred and nine dollars. Mr. Tucker's petition stated that his actual expenses in attending on the Court five different times amounted to three hundred dollars, and that he paid nine dollars for a seal for the Circuit Court of Rhode Island.

The motion was opposed. It was said that it would establish a dangerous precedent for the Government to pay the voluntary expenses of an applicant for an appointment under the United States; and that in the present case the actual services only ought to be compensated according to the provision made by a subsequent law. In reply it was said, that it was taken for granted Mr. Tucker had applied for the appointment, but no evidence of this is adduced; several circumstances were mentioned to show that the contrary was the fact, and that he was called to discharge the duties of the office. The question is, whether he ought not to have his necessary expenses, incurred in attending the courts reimbursed?

The motion for five hundred and nine dollars was superceded by a motion for three hundred and nine dollars, which was agreed to. The Committee rose and reported the bill with this amendment; which was adopted by the House, and the bill ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On a motion made and seconded,

"That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill to make provision of half-pay for seven years, to the widows and orphans of such officers of the Army of the United States as have been killed in the service, since the third day of June, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-four, or who may hereafter be killed in the service of the United States."

Ordered, That the said motion be referred to the consideration of a Committee of the Whole House on Wednesday next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee to whom was referred the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the petition of Joseph Henderson; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said report under consideration, and directed him to report to the House their disagreement to the same.

The House proceeded to consider the said report; and, on the question that the House do agree with the Committee of the Whole in their disagreement to the same, it passed in the negative.

And then the said report being amended at the Clerk's table to read as follows:

"Resolved, That there be allowed to Joseph Henderson a yearly salary of one hundred dollars, for his services as Paymaster to the Navy Board for the Eastern Department, from the tenth day of August, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-eight, to the tenth day of August, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-two, being four years; and that the officers of the Treasury be authorized to pass the same to his credit, and to settle his account accordingly."

It was, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution; and that Mr. AMES, Mr. BENJAMIN BOURNE, and Mr. CLARK, do prepare and bring in the same.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act respecting fugitives from justice, and persons escaping from the service of their masters," in which they desire the concurrence of this House.

MONDAY, January 21.

An engrossed bill to compensate John Tucker was read the third time, and ordered to be recommitted to a Committee of the Whole House tomorrow.

Mr. WILLIAMSON, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for the relief of sick and infirm seamen; which was read twice, and committed.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act respecting fugitives from justice, and persons escaping from the service of their masters," was read twice, and committed.

BALANCES DUE CERTAIN STATES.

Mr. FITZSIMONS, from the committee to whom was recommitteed the bill to authorize a Loan in the certificates or notes of such States as shall have balances due to them upon a final settlement of accounts with the United States, reported an amendatory bill; which was received, read twice, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House immediately.

The House, accordingly, resolved itself into the said Committee; when

Mr. GILLES moved that the proviso in the second section of the bill should be struck out, respecting the assent of the individual States to the new Loan, as it does not agree with the idea precisely, contained in the resolutions on which the bill was founded; and, adverting to the provision contained in the Funding Law respecting these balances, he observed, that the bill now reported interfered with the disposition of the balances, whereas that law has vested the disposition of them exclusively in the several States.

Mr. FITZSIMONS said, that there was a variation in the proviso in the bill, from that in the original resolutions, which had accidentally taken place. He said, that the variation was certainly not in order, and he therefore moved that the proviso in the bill should be amended so as to conform to the resolutions.

Mr. SEDGWICK remarked, that the gentleman last speaking was undoubtedly right in respect to the point of order, but he did not draw the same conclusion. The proviso in the bill may vary from that in the resolutions; but if it more completely comports with the ideas of a majority of the Committee, he saw no good reason for not adopting it. He added some observations on the remarks of Mr. GILLES, which he considered as making it a question, whether the Government should literally comply with its engagements or not? This, he hoped, would never be made a subject of debate in the Legislature of the United States.

Mr. FITZSIMONS said, he hoped the amendment which he suggested, would take place.

Mr. CLARK observed, that he thought the bill was altogether wrong; he moved, therefore, that it should be recommitted. Mr. C. entered into a general consideration of the subject.

Mr. LAURANCE was in favor of the Committee's rising. He cited an instance in point, which occurred the last session. A select committee on the census had exceeded the limits of the principles agreed to in the Committee of the Whole; the bill they reported was accordingly recommitted; the House would not then consent to altering the bill in the House, as it would sanction a deviation from established principles.

Mr. MURRAY was opposed to the Committee's rising; he saw no occasion for it; the variation is merely verbal, and can be easily corrected.

The question for the Committee's rising was put, and agreed to. They accordingly rose, and reported progress. On motion, the Committee of the Whole was discharged. The bill was then recommitted to the select committee which reported it. The requisite alteration being made, the bill, as amended, was reported to the House twice read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

The Committee proceeded in the discussion of the bill.

Mr. MERCER, after stating that various unfriendly remarks were made on the Government, and on particular members, in consequence of the former assumption, and informing the Committee that there was a large sum of the paper money of a particular State in this town, which was selling at ten shillings in the pound, observed that this bill would appreciate the value of that paper perhaps to 20s. in the pound. In order, therefore, to give the fullest information to the people of the United States, and to prevent those at seven or eight hundred miles distance from being defrauded, he moved an amendment, the object of which was to prevent certificates which have been transferred within a certain period from being subscribed to the loan.

Mr. FITZSIMONS said, as he had brought forward the resolutions on which the bill was founded, he thought it incumbent on him to notice the observations advanced by the gentleman in support of his motion. He remarked, that with respect to the general sentiment of the people, perhaps he knew as little about it as others; but this he knew, that if unfavorable impressions had not been made, it was not because attempts had been wanting for that purpose on the part of individuals within these walls. With respect to himself he felt no solicitude; but if any member of this House knew of any facts of the kind alluded to by the gentleman, let the person who knows of such things boldly come forward and charge openly the guilty; with respect to the present motion, he would have no objections to it, provided it did not interfere with the general provisions of the bill.

Mr. BOURNE said, he should be in favor of the motion, provided it was practicable; but he did not see how it could be carried into execution.

Mr. WILLIAMSON supported the motion. He said it met his approbation so far as it would conduce to protecting the original holders of the State debts from such speculations as they suffered at the time of the former assumption.

Mr. SEDGWICK remarked on the rapid rise of the value of the paper, in consequence of the former assumption, and said, that, considering what human nature was constituted of, the speculations alluded to, and which he had lamented as much as any man whatever, were to have been expected. He then adverted particularly to the remarks of Mr. MERCER, in which he had said he had his suspicions even of the members of the House. Mr. SEDGWICK said, the ears of members had been often assailed by insinuations and suspicions of the base conduct of individuals in this House, as speculating in their own measures. If, said Mr. SEDGWICK, there is so base and infamous a character within these walls; if there is one member of this House who has been guilty of this abominable conduct, of plundering his constituents of their property, in the manner represented, let his name be mentioned, let the man be pointed out. From the part he had taken in this matter from the beginning, and from the suggestions which had been circulated, he had some reason to suppose it might be intended to implicate him in the charge. He could not help feeling himself called upon to notice such indiscriminate insinuations, such attempts to affix a stigma on particular characters; men whose reputation is their dearest possession. Mr. SEDGWICK then offered several objections to the motion; he remarked that its tendency would be to keep open the door of speculation.

Mr. MERCER replied to Mr. SEDGWICK; he observed, that his remarks were directed to human nature at large; he considered it as a point not to be controverted that temptation, in proportion to its extensive and flattering prospects, would always have an influence; for himself, he could never wish to have his own honor and integrity put to the test. He subscribed to the sentiments of Mr. SEDGWICK, respecting the sacred nature of reputation, and repeated the lines from Shakspeare:

"He that robs me of my good name," &c.

Mr. WHITE said he disapproved of the principle on which the amendment was brought forward. He believed the aspersions on the members of Congress were totally unfounded. He did not doubt but speculations had been carried on to a very great extent, during the dependence of the Funding Act; but this could not be avoided; men would venture according to their opinion of the final event of the measure, and prices would consequently fluctuate. When the proposition for discrimination was brought forward, the price of paper fell: when it was rejected the price rose again. It was probably the same with regard to the State Debts, in the various stages of the subject; but surely no suspicion of improper conduct could fall on those who voted uniformly either for or against the measure. Indeed the above has generally fallen on those who opposed the assumption in the extent first proposed, and voted for it as finally modified. These were but five in number; they were easily known; three yet retain their seats, two are of the same State with the gentleman who offered the amendment, and are not now members of the House; that he was of the number, and he was confident that no man applying the charge of speculation to himself or to any one of those who voted with him, would believe there was the shadow of truth in it; but he would attend to the discussion; and, however he might dislike the reason assigned for offering the amendment, if he found any good likely to arise from it, would give it his vote.

Mr. MERCER's remarks brought out several other members, who, severally advertising to the circumstances attending the passing the Funding Act, showed that though they had voted for the system, that they were not influenced by personal considerations.

The motion of Mr. MERCER was repeatedly modified and altered, and then further debated.

Mr. BARNWELL said, he disapproved of the motion; it appeared to be a very extraordinary measure indeed; the ostensible motive is to prevent speculation, but it will have directly the contrary effect. The way, in his opinion, to prevent speculation, was to appreciate the value of the certificates in the hands of the holders; but what will be the effect of this measure? it will lessen the value of the paper immediately, by preventing the possessor from transferring the property. This he considered as a retrospective measure, and that the Government had no right to abridge the right of transferring; it is a quality of the property, and cannot be taken away by any subsequent law. He considered the measure as counteracting the principles of the bill altogether, the design of which is to give a value to the paper in the hands of the owners. In every view of the proposition he was opposed to it; and though it appears designed to benefit the distant creditors, yet he felt so fully persuaded that it would operate to the disadvantage of his constituents, that he should under every modification vote against it.

Mr. MADISON replied to Mr. BARNWELL; he observed, that the gentleman argued from proper principles, if they had been applied to a different case. The present proposition of providing for these balances is a voluntary business, which this Government is under no obligation to engage in; but having engaged in it, the measures it may adopt on the occasion, have no necessary reference to, or connexion with the general regulations under which the paper now exists; the Government may make just what arrangements it thinks proper. The provision now contemplated, he remarked, was however to be justified on its own merits; the uses and the consequences resulting from it, were designed to be salutary; and with respect to persons remote from the Seat of Government, who are equally entitled to protection in every sense with those who reside there, they would evidently be benefited by the regulation.

Mr. MURRAY opposed the motion, as being hostile to the public faith, as involving an infraction of that faith, so far at least as the value of the certificates have been enhanced in consequence of what has already been done.

Several other members spoke on the occasion; and the motion was at length negatived by the Committee.

TUESDAY, January 22.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of War, accompanying his Report on the petition of Thomas Wishart; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A memorial of the manufacturers of cordage, lines, and packthread, of Providence, in the State of Rhode Island, was presented to the House and read, praying the attention of Congress to the said manufacture, by repealing the drawback of the duties imposed by law on the reshipment and exportation of cordage, twine, and packthread, of foreign manufacture; and allowing a drawback of the aforesaid duties on foreign hemp, in case of its being manufactured and reshipped in the United States, or otherwise, as to the wisdom of Congress may seem meet.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to Mr. BENJAMIN BOURNE, Mr. GOODHUE, and Mr. MOORE; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Mr. WILLIAMSON, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to promote commerce by the increase of American seamen; which was received, read twice, and committed.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee on the petition of Henry Emanuel Lutterloh, made on the 8th of May last: whereupon,

Resolved, That the Accounting Officers of the Treasury cause the account of Colonel Henry Emanuel Lutterloh, for his traveling and passage expenses, incurred in coming to America and joining the Army of the United States, in one thousand seven hundred and seventy-seven, being seven hundred and forty-six dollars, to be settled, and the amount thereof to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution, and that Mr. GROVE, Mr. SCHOONMAKER, and Mr. BENJAMIN BOURNE, do prepare and bring in the same.

BALANCES DUE CERTAIN STATES,

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to authorize a Loan, in the certificates or notes of such States as shall have balances due to them upon a final settlement of accounts with the United States:

Mr. MERCER's proviso was again under consideration, some objection being made, Mr. MERCER offered the proposition in a new form, still preserving the original object respecting transfers or sales of certificates. The debate was renewed on this motion. The question being at length taken, the proposition was negatived—32 to 28.

The second section being read, Mr. STURGES moved an addition, which authorizes the States respectively to prescribe the several species of the notes or certificates which shall be subscribed to the loan. This was agreed to.

A proviso was moved by Mr. WILLIAMSON to the following purport: "That no certificate of any State shall be considered as the debts of the State which shall not be recognised as such by the Legislature thereof within twelve months after the same shall have been subscribed." Without deciding on this, the Committee rose, and reported progress.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 23.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Governor of Maryland, enclosing a return of the election of WILLIAM HINDMAN, to serve as one of the members of this House, for the said State, in the room of JOSHUA SENEY, who has resigned his seat; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A member, in his place, laid before the House a Letter from the Governor of Kentucky, enclosing a representation from the Legislature of the said State, respecting an adjustment of a claim of that State against the United States, for the expense of certain expeditions against the Indians; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

LOANS AND FINANCES.

Mr. GILES submitted to the consideration of the House certain resolutions; after reading which, he proceeded to mention the reasons which had influenced him in moving them. The resolutions are as follows:

"Resolved, That the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES be requested to cause to be laid before this House copies of the authorities under which loans have been negotiated, pursuant to the acts of the fourth and twelfth of August, one thousand seven hundred and ninety, together with copies of the authorities directing the application of the moneys borrowed.

"Resolved, That the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES be requested to cause this House to be furnished with the names of the persons by whom, and to whom, the respective payments of the French debt have been made in France, pursuant to the act for that purpose; specifying the dates of the respective drafts upon the Commissioners in Holland, and the dates of the respective payments of the debt. A similar statement is requested respecting the debts to Spain and Holland.

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before this House an account exhibiting, half-monthly, the balances between the United States and the Bank of the United States, including the several Branch Banks, from the commencement of those Institutions, to the end of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two.

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before this House an account of all moneys which may have come into the Sinking Fund, from the commencement of that Institution to the present time; specifying the particular fund from which they have accrued, and exhibiting, half-yearly, the sums uninvested, and where deposited.

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to this House the balance of all unapplied revenues at the end of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, specifying whether in money or bonds, and noting where the money is deposited; that he also make report of all unapplied moneys which may have been obtained by the several loans authorized by law, and where such moneys are now deposited."

The resolutions, said Mr. GILES, have grown out of the embarrassments I have met with in attempting to comprehend the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made in pursuance of an order of this House of the 27th of December, 1792, exhibiting sundry statements respecting foreign loans. These embarrassments have increased in proportion to the attention which I have bestowed on the subject; and a number of official papers to which I have had reference for information, instead of elucidating, seem rather to obscure the inquiry. To obtain necessary information, therefore, is the object of these resolutions, and no one can doubt the immediate applicability of this information to a bill now lying upon your table, for the purpose of reimbursing the loan of $2,000,000 made of the Bank of the United States, by opening a new loan for that sum abroad, and by changing the application of the like sum already borrowed and appropriated to the discharge of the debt to France from its original destination to the immediate discharge of the debt to the Bank.

The first resolution has arisen from that part of the printed Report of the Secretary of the Treasury which exhibits the terms upon which various loans have been made abroad, but neither presents the precise authorities under which those negotiations have been made, nor the precise amount of the sums borrowed for the separate and distinct objects of the two acts mentioned in the resolution.

Another reason has more strongly suggested the propriety of calling for the information requested by this resolution. The bill now upon your table, which has been before alluded to, contemplates the whole of the moneys borrowed from abroad, and now on hand, as being originally appropriated to the discharge of the French debt, and proposes to change the original destination of these identical moneys; and the reason assigned for this measure has been the unsettled state of affairs in France.

In the printed Report of the Secretary of the Treasury, he remarks that the same moneys are applicable to the Sinking Fund. It appears strange, that after express and distinct appropriations by law, that any misunderstanding relative to this object should exist, and the information called for may possibly explain this seeming contradiction.

The second resolution has arisen from that part of the printed Report marked B, and which exhibits the payments made to France, but does not furnish the names of the persons engaged in those negotiations, nor does it present to view the length of time those persons have been possessed of the public moneys, by stating the dates of the respective drafts in Holland, and the dates of the actual application of the moneys to the discharge of the debt; and it is evident that from the times the loans are respectively created, to the times of the actual application of the moneys borrowed, the United States are paying the usual interest upon the debt intended to be redeemed, and the stipulated interest upon the moneys borrowed for the redemption. This remark is equally applicable to the payments of other foreign debts with the payments of the debt to France.

The third resolution has arisen from calculations drawn partly from the last page of the printed report, and from the original Bank book of the United States, from which it appears that the balances in Bank in favor of the United States were as follows:

In Bank, Philadelphia, 30th May, 1792, and 16th June, same year, in branch banks	$676,952 55
1792, June 30th, in all banks in the United States	555,271 22
July 28th and 31st, in all banks in the United States	511,423 91
August 25th, 30th, and 31st, in all banks in the United States	740,903 87

On the 1st of June, a loan was negotiated with the Bank of the United States on the part of the United States, for $100,000, at 5 per cent. per annum. On the 1st of July, another loan was made upon the same terms for the like sum. On the 1st of August, another loan was made upon the same terms for the like sum. On the 1st of September, another loan was made upon the same terms for the like sum. It appears from the last page of the printed Report, that there had been drawn into America, from the 15th of December, 1790, to the 27th of January, 1792, of the moneys borrowed abroad, the sum of 2,663,621 florins, 2 stivers, and 6 deniers. If this sum were unexpended, and lodged in the bank at the times of making these loans, (and Congress have never yet been informed of any deficiency of revenue,) the United States will, of consequence, have paid upon the moneys borrowed from the Bank of the United States, from 15 to 17 per cent. per annum, to wit: they will have paid 5 per cent. upon the original debt to France, 5 per cent. upon the moneys borrowed for its redemption, exclusive of douceurs and other charges, and 5 per cent. upon the sum borrowed of the bank, which may be deemed part of this deposit made in the Bank by the United States. But, discarding these inferences, it must at least be admitted that the United States are paying 5 per cent. for the loan of moneys from the Bank, when a sum larger than the loan itself, is actually deposited in Bank. It is here to be remarked, that a balance of cash is admitted, by the Treasurer's return, to have been in his hands on the 31st of December, 1790, amounting to $973,342 43, and in July 30, 1791, the sum of $582,189 54.

I am informed that bills are often drawn in favor of the Bank for moneys in the hands of the revenue officers in distant parts of the United States, and that credit is entered in the Bank book upon the receipt of such bills, although the moneys may not actually be in Bank for some time after the credit is entered, and hence it is inferred that the Bank-book does not conclusively show the real sum in Bank, not to mention that such bills answer all the purposes of cash, and ought therefore to be credited upon the receipt of them. It is to be remarked that there is a regular and continual influx of moneys into the Bank by the operation of these bills. It is not very material whether a bill lodged in Bank to-day, should be paid to-day, provided something like the same sum should be paid in consequence of a bill lodged in Bank one or two months ago, and the bill of to-day should be paid one or two months hence. The following statement will, in some measure, explain this idea, by exhibiting half-monthly the balances of public money in all the banks, about the middle and end of each month, beginning with May, 1792, and ending with December of the same year:

May	$340,322 11
May	332,116 35
June	776,107 65
June	523,272 22
July	441,637 13
July	521,426 91
August	743,470 19
August	740,903 08
September	695,302 23
September	367,961 25
October	456,895 52
October	473,388 99
November	681,250 09
November	811,212 51
December 15	1,020,824 73
December 22, and January 5— last returns	790,642 11

The fourth resolution has arisen from that part of the printed Report which remarks that the residue of the sum drawn from Holland, amounting to $1,668,188 27 is applicable to the purchase of the public debt. It is known that the sum of $1,374,656 40, being the surplus of the revenue up to the end of December, 1790, was originally appropriated to the Sinking Fund; that the surplus of other appropriations have been applied to this fund, and that the interest of the debt purchased has also been wholly appropriated to its increase. It is also known that between $1,100,000 and $1,200,000, and no more, of the original appropriation, have been really invested in the purchase of the debt; it is, therefore, somewhat unaccountable that so large a sum as $1,668,188 should be drawn from the loans abroad, when the Sinking Fund has always overflowed from domestic resources, and when the probability of purchasing is extremely lessened by the rise in the price of paper and the limitations of the last act of Congress upon that subject. It would not be deemed an economical arrangement to make a loan of so large a sum of money upon terms by no means honorable or advantageous, and appropriate it to the purchase of the debt under limitations which would forbid its investiture. The information called for in this resolution may possibly explain these difficulties.

H. OF R.]

Loans and Finances.

The fifth and last resolution has arisen from that part of the printed Report (page 5) which states the whole sums drawn from Holland to amount to $2,304,769 13; but neither immediately presents to view the balance on hand, nor informs where that balance is deposited. It appears by the Bank-book, that the whole deposit of the United States in Bank at this time, from all resources, amounts to $790,642 11. Hence, it will appear from a statement partly conjectural, and partly founded upon the statements in the printed Report, and some official documents, that $1,554,851 43 remain unaccounted for, as will appear from the following account:

In this last estimate, cents have not been taken into calculation, which makes an inconsiderable variation in some of the sums.

Another circumstance appears somewhat singular: in the printed Report, 2,986,000 florins are stated to have been drawn from Holland in the year 1792. In the Bank-book, it appears from the list of bills drawn, that 8,695,237 florins were drawn for in the same time. This difference, I presume, may admit of explanation probably from the manner of negotiating this matter, or from some casual mistake. It deserves, however, to be explained.

It appears from another statement, made up to the 1st of April, 1793, that there ought to be at that time a sufficient sum of money in the Treasury to reimburse the loan of 2,000,000 dollars to the Bank, and to answer all the other purposes of Government.

The papers from which I have collected these statements may be deceptive in themselves, or may be subject to explanations from others. Candor, however, induces me to acknowledge that impressions resulting from my inquiries into this subject, have been made upon my mind, by no means favorable to the arrangements made by the gentleman at the head of the Treasury Department. But I shall keep myself open to conviction, in case of any sufficient explanation which may be hereafter given, and I now avow that my acknowledgment of mistake shall be at least commensurate to any conviction produced.

I cannot help remarking, before I sit down, that we have been legislating for some years without competent official knowledge of the state of the Treasury, or revenues; in the course of which time, we have been engaged in the most important fiscal arrangements; that we have authorized a loan of the Bank of the United States for more than $500,000, when probably a greater sum of public money was deposited in the Bank; that we have passed a vote this session, authorizing a further loan for $800,000, and that we were upon the point of authorizing a loan abroad for $2,000,000, without knowing the extent of the authorities at present existing for borrowing, the amount of moneys on hand in consequence of loans already made, or the application of the moneys which may have been used; and I conceive it is now time that this information be officially laid before this House.

The said resolutions were then severally agreed to by the House.

States as shall have balances due to them upon a final settlement of accounts with the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMSON's proviso was taken into consideration.

Mr. MACON offered another, in lieu of Mr. WILLIAMSON'S; the purport specifying particularly certain notes of the State of North Carolina, which that State had proscribed, and which he proposed should be excluded from the loan now under consideration. The certificates are those issued at Warrenton, in 1786; certificates to pay for a militia expedition against the Indians in 1788; and certificates signed Patrick Travers.

Mr. WILLIAMSON withdrew his motion, and that moved by Mr. MACON was agreed to.

Several other amendments were moved, but not agreed to.

The Committee, having gone through with the discussion of the bill, rose, and reported it, with sundry amendments. The House took the same into consideration, and agreed thereto.

Mr. MERCER then renewed his motion for a proviso respecting assignments or transfers of State certificates. The object is, to exclude from the loans all certificates so transferred or assigned, from the first day of January, 1793, to the first day of June following.

Some further debate took place. It was urged in support of the motion, that the provision now to be made for a certain description of creditors, is merely a benefit; in conferring which, the Government had a right to annex what conditions they thought proper; that it was the duty of the Legislature to take measures to prevent those at a distance from the Seat of Government from being speculated upon, to their great injury and loss; that imputations have been thrown upon the members of the Legislature, in respect to the advantages taken of the uninformed on the first assumption; and therefore, as an opportunity is now offered to the House to purge themselves of all suspicions of improper motives, the amendment ought to take place. In answer to the objection on the proviso's being retrospective, it was said, that it had relation to such assignments or transfers only, as have taken place since this act originated.

In opposition to the proviso, it was said, that the present bill was not merely a bounty or benefit conferred on the creditors; it is a measure just, reasonable, and proper in itself; and on this principle only it is to be justified. It was further urged, that the proviso was unconstitutional, having a most manifest retrospective operation, interfering with contracts which the parties at the time had a most undoubted right to make, and thus altering the value of their property; it was reviving the principle of discrimination between the original holders and the assignees, a principle that had been so pointedly reprobated by a large majority of the Legislature on a former occasion.

A motion was then made, and seconded, further to amend the said bill, and debate arising thereupon, an adjournment was called for, and the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, January 24.

BALANCES DUE CERTAIN STATES.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill to authorize a Loan in the certificates or notes of such States as shall have balances due to them, upon a final settlement of accounts with the United States; whereupon, a motion was made, and the question being put, further to amend the said bill, by adding, to the end of the second section, the following proviso, to wit:

"Provided, That no such notes or certificates shall be subscribable in any name, other than that of the original owner, if living, or if dead, of his legal representative, and except such as are, or may be, transferred by executors, administrators, or assigns, under any bankrupt act, unless accompanied with an affidavit, certified by a magistrate, that the transfer or assignment to the party, in whose name and behalf the subscription is offered, was not made at any time between the first day of January and the first day of June next, and that such party is the true and bona fide proprietor thereof."

It passed in the negative—yeas 30, nays 33, as follows:

A motion was then made, and the question being put, further to amend the said bill, by inserting, after the word "State," in the second section, the words "for services rendered, or supplies furnished, during the late war:" it passed in the negative; yeas 29, nays 30, as follows:

Ordered, That the further consideration of the said bill be put off until to-morrow.

FRIDAY, January 25.

Mr. AMES, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to authorize the adjustment of a claim of Joseph Henderson against the United States; which was read twice and committed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill granting further compensation to certain Receivers of Continental taxes; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto.

And on the question, that the said bill be engrossed and read the third time, it passed in the negative—yeas 22, nays 24, as follows:

YEAS.—Egbert Benson, Benjamin Bourne, Thomas Fitzsimons, Elbridge Gerry, William B. BALANCES DUE CERTAIN STATES.

An engrossed bill to authorize a Loan in the certificates or notes of such States as shall have balances due to them, upon a final settlement of accounts with the United States, was read the third time, and the bill being on its passage—

Mr. HARTLEY said: I have attended to the debates on this bill, and considered the subject, and am fully convinced that the bill should pass. By the act for settling the accounts between the United States and individual States, the balances were assumed to be paid to the creditor States. The bill under consideration gives the alternative to the State (which shall be found a creditor) either to receive the balance herself and pay it to her citizens, or suffer them to fund their certificates with the General Government. I believe it will be found, on experience, most convenient to the creditor, and least expensive to the people, for the creditors to subscribe to a loan with the General Government. This, however, will rest in a great measure upon the individual States. Two taxes will be more expensive to collect than one; and if money is to go through two hands instead of one, in general it is attended with a double charge.

It is said, that the bill will offer a new field for speculation. It is possible that, to a certain degree, there may be weight in the observation; but after the experience we have had, the holders of certificates will not be easily imposed upon; and if the certificates of the individual States would be equalized, I am led to believe, that it would be of service to the community. They might, in a considerable degree, act as a medium in commerce, and in the transfer of property; but whilst they remain at different values, they will be mere objects of speculation. I regret exceedingly the great inequality of fortune, which has arisen among citizens, by the speculations in our paper; but in a great and mighty revolution, some partial evils must be expected, to obtain a general good. We are bound to pay our debts. I do not think that a large national debt is a blessing, but it is of high importance that the Government which is in debt should so dispose of it, as to do as little injury as possible, and if the same is practicable, produce a partial good.

In Pennsylvania our affairs appear to be in the highest state of prosperity; the farmer compensated for his labor; the mechanic everywhere fully employed and amply paid; commerce flourishing. Objections have been made against the law; yet I imagine if it is published, and the reasons for enacting it known, the public opinion of the State I represent, will be in favor of it. If we pass the act this session, we shall save the next Congress from much trouble and perplexity. We act now upon principle, without knowing how the balances will operate. If the creditor and debtor States were known, it would be found exceedingly difficult to reconcile the several interests. Remember the Representative bill; the Government had like to have been dissolved, on account of the various interests.

Much has been said about the interested motives of members. I may here say that I do not belong to that class called aristocrats, (if such there is among us.) I have always supported the rights of the people, according to the best of my judgment and abilities. I have almost in every instance received their approbation of my public conduct. In the present question I am not more interested than any other citizen; I have no certificates, I am no public creditor of any sort. I mean to act upon principle, and vote for the passing of the bill.

Mr. PAGE, having moved the previous question, said that, in consequence of his aversion to waste the time of the House, which he always regarded as precious, he generally waited for the question, without troubling the House with his reasons for his vote, always satisfied if what occurred to him in support of it was offered by any other member, who might be better heard and understood—but that, when the names of the voters were to be held up to the public view, and when the vote he meant to give had been represented by some members, for whom he had the highest respect, as injurious to public creditors, as retrospective, and therefore unconstitutional in its operation, he thought himself bound to endeavor to justify his vote.

If the creditors, Mr. SPEAKER, who are the object of the bill before you, were, by the amendment, excluded from an application to their debtor, or were the General Government the only body to whom they could look for payment or common justice, I would most scrupulously avoid interfering with their claims; or, did the bill extend its influence to all the creditors of the States impartially, I might listen to some objections which have been made to a discrimination, said to be produced by the amendment. But, sir, granting all that has been objected to have its full force, I only find that such creditors of creditor States (for no others are to be benefited by this bill) as may not be able to establish their claims founded on a speculation, which was grounded on a supposition that this bill would pass, without the amendment now proposed, will only be left where they are, and where, in my opinion, they ought to be left—that is, to look to their original contract; and I do not contribute to seduce them from their attachment to their State, and from their reliance on its plighted faith. I wish not to see them deluded into an acceptance of four per cent. interest from the General Government of the United States, instead of six from their respective States, which I believe are willing and able to comply with their engagements. But, sir, if I were even an advocate for the assumption and for the complicated Funding System, I should vote for the amendment now proposed; because I think with my colleagues [Messrs. MADISON and GILES] and the member from Maryland [Mr. MERCER] that it is not only well calculated to prevent an improper scramble among speculators for the supposed benefit of the bill, but is proper to rescue the members of Congress from temptation, as well as from suspicion of speculating on their own laws. I therefore think, sir, I can honestly and conscientiously vote for the amendment.

Whilst I am up, (said Mr. P.,) I will take the liberty of remarking that those gentlemen who so loudly and warmly replied to the member from Maryland, and supposed they were vindicating the honor of the House, in my opinion were greatly mistaken; their conduct tended to check free debate and bold investigation, and their remarks respecting newspaper information might be a dangerous check to the freedom of the press. What avails the declaration of our Constitution respecting the freedom of the press, if it may be restrained by the conduct of members in either House of Congress? And surely it may be restrained by such remarks as have been so warmly made by members here, merely on a member's stating information in his place, and referring to newspapers for further confirmation. Bold must be the printer, and on a broad basis of a large subscription must he stand, who can repeat information so severely quoted in this House. The honor of the House can never be vindicated by such expressions; on the contrary, they may lead our constituents to suppose that at least passions prevail here, and animosities exist, which ought to have no place among us; and, indeed, such conduct may tend directly to produce consequences of a serious nature to members concerned in debate.

Mr. MADISON remarked, that an amendment now incorporated in the bill has changed its principles altogether. It was contemplated by the original bill to provide for debts incurred only for the support of the war; but by this amendment, debts are to be subscribed to the loan which were created subsequent to the period in which those debts originated that have been hitherto called debts of the United States. Another amendment has been added, which postpones the subscription to a period so distant as to anticipate the proper business of a subsequent Legislature, which will be more competent to decide upon it than this House is. The gentleman who brought forward this motion, assigned as a reason, that by this postponement the Senate would have a control over the subject which they would not have without passing the bill, and with this amendment.

Mr. M. reprobated the idea of controlling the deliberations of a subsequent Legislature. He said the ground of the bill was changed. The postponement of the subscriptions renders it entirely unnecessary for the present Congress to decide upon it. He was in favor, therefore, of postponing it, and of the previous question.

Mr. GRAY said he did not expect this opposition to the bill, at this stage of the business, especially from gentlemen who had advocated the very principle on which the bill is founded, viz: a provision for the balances which shall be found due on a final settlement of the accounts. The motion for the previous question is founded on the remonstrance of the State of Virginia;* a State which justly has the reputation of being wise in her councils and decisions, but on the present occasion is single and alone in her conduct in regard to this subject. No other State has come forward with such a remonstrance against the act and doings of the National Legislature. He concluded, therefore, that in this instance at least, that State is in an error; especially as the grounds of her complaints have been obviated. He then adverted to the general provisions of the bill, and showed that they were perfectly consonant to the existing provisions made by former acts of the Government, respecting the balances which shall appear to be due to the several States. He alluded next to the several provisoes and amendments of the bill which had been ingrafted in it, to accommodate it to the wishes of those who, notwithstanding, appeared to be as much opposed to it as ever. He was really surprised and confounded at the conduct of gentlemen in the Opposition. He noticed briefly the justice of the claims of the creditors; and concluded by observing that there were already sufficient difficulties to embarrass the operations of this Government, and he conceived that the opposition to measures calculated to doing justice in this particular case, was calculated to increase those difficulties and embarrassments.

Mr. AMES reprobated the idea of putting the previous question. After a discussion of three weeks, it is now proposed to prevent a decision of the subject. He considered this as a very unfair and unjustifiable mode of procedure; such an one as the gentlemen in opposition to the bill, on mature reflection, would not themselves justify. He then noticed the scope of the arguments offered in support of the previous question, and urged a variety of considerations to show that the present was the most favorable time to decide the question. He deprecated the consequences of a postponement; it would be considered as a denial of justice on the part of the present Legislature, and as placing the creditors in the most uncertain situation as to their future fate; in short, he conceived it was such an evasion of justice as might put the country in a flame.

Mr. GILES replied to Mr. AMES. He conceived the consequences would be directly the reverse from those he had anticipated; he thought those who were to be benefited, who were comparatively but a small number, would not put the country in a flame: the danger was, that those who would suffer by the burdens which would result from the measure, would be thrown into a flame. He then entered into a general consideration of the subject, and urged a variety of reasons against the bill, and in favor of putting the previous question. Mr. G. also enlarged on the impropriety of precipitating the subject the present session.

Mr. WHITE said he had, last session, voted against the bill for assuming the State debts, but he should vote for the bill now under consideration. In this he thought he was perfectly consistent, as there was a radical difference between the two. The former was a proposition for assuming all the debts of all the States—the same which had been originally proposed at New York, and which he had uniformly opposed. The present is only for assuming to the amount of the balances which may be due to creditor States: this he always approved. He said he had heard but one argument against the propriety of coming to an immediate decision, which appeared to have any weight—that was, the unequal and imperfect representation. This, he said, was a circumstance which he felt as sensibly as any member of the House, and if the proposition was to impose burdens on the people, or to change an established system, he should hesitate before he agreed to it; but neither of these was the present case; no additional sums were to be raised by the bill, and no change made in the mode of payment of the balances without the approbation of the States to which they may be due.

Having thus obviated this objection, he said, he would give the reasons which induced him to believe the matter ought now to be decided. He observed that, perhaps, it might have been well had the subject not been brought forward, considering the opposition which had taken place. He did not, however, censure the gentleman who introduced it; that gentleman had, as well as himself, been acquainted with the proceedings respecting the assumption, from the commencement. And he declared he did not expect, when the resolutions were laid on the table, that an objection would be made to them; and it was probable as little apprehension was entertained by the mover of the resolutions; but he thought the manner in which the bill had been opposed, and in which it had been supported, required an immediate decision. It had been made the criterion of the public faith of the Government, and of the fidelity of its officers. Those who were in favor of the bill, alleged, as one reason in support of it, that when the balances were known, the debtor States would not agree to make provision for those balances, agreeably to the existing law. He believed that this suggestion was unfounded; he did not believe it was possible that any man, whom the confidence of his fellow-citizens should place on this floor, would ever refuse to carry that law into effect. He considered it as one of the pillars of the Constitution—a solemn compact between the United States and individual States—and he believed if ever this Government should be guilty of so gross a breach of faith, in a matter of importance sufficient to attract the general notice of the citizens, that there was an end to the Government itself. It was a Government founded on opinion; and when the opinion of the people ceased to support it, the Government must fall. On the other hand, the bill had not been opposed on its merits. No gentleman had attempted to point out the individual or the description of men who would be injured by the operation of the bill; they had opposed it wholly on collateral circumstances; they had supposed that if the States who had debts due to their citizens should have their balances discharged by assuming those debts, that they would oppose the payment of the balances to States which have no creditors. It had likewise been alleged, that the Commissioners for settling accounts might conduct themselves in such a manner as to render a legislative interposition necessary, to arrest the measures consequential on the settlement. He had no apprehension of such conduct on the part of the Commissioners, and could not legislate on a supposition that they would conduct themselves in a manner so very improper; but if they did, he could not see that the change in the payment of the balances could have any effect. If the Legislature could interfere where States were concerned, they might do the same in the case of individuals. But as jealousies had taken place in the minds of the members, and as both sides of the House seemed to consider the passing this bill as giving a greater force and stability to the act for settling the accounts between the United States and individual States, it was a strong reason with him to give his assent to it. It had been said the passing the bill by so small a majority would occasion discontent and uneasiness among the people. This might be the case, but the same reason is equally applicable to a rejection of the bill by a small majority. But who are most likely to be dissatisfied? Those who by a rejection of the bill would feel themselves injured, at least disappointed in their expectations of advantage; or those who, notwithstanding its passage, would be left in their present condition? He believed, the former: so that as far as that argument had any weight, it was in favor of the bill.

Mr. MURRAY was in favor of the previous question. He thought the present stage of the business was the most proper to call for that question. It would, he said, have been justly exceptionable had the question been called previous to debate, but now it was strictly proper. Adverting to the merits of the bill, he objected to it as an infraction of the Funding System; that system provides for funding the balances in favor of the States, not the individual creditors. On this principle he considered the bill as establishing a dangerous precedent, and as affording a pretext for future infractions and mutilations of that system.

Mr. M., adverting to certain observations which had been thrown out respecting the uneasiness which was said to exist in some of the States, informed the House, that with respect to the State he had the honor to represent, the greatest apparent satisfaction with the measures of the General Government prevailed. It is true, said he, my constituents feel the pressure of taxes in common with the rest of their fellow-citizens, but they discover no disposition to complain; they consider the public burdens as the price of their liberties and independence, and, under this idea, submit to them with the utmost cheerfulness; at the same time confiding in the wisdom and justice of the Government that their impositions will be regulated according to the exigencies of the nation, and that no unnecessary taxes will ever be laid. He thought it necessary to say thus much, as he conceived too high a coloring had been given to some representations which the fancy of members had brought forward in their zealous opposition to the bill.

The previous question being called for by five members, to wit: "Shall the main question, that the said bill do pass, be now put?" it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 33, nays 31, as follows:

Orr, John Page, Josiah Parker, Cornelius C. Schoonmaker, Jeremiah Smith, Israel Smith, John Steele, Thomas Tredwell, Abraham Venable, Hugh Williamson, and Francis Willis.

The main question, that the said bill do pass, being now put, it was resolved in the affirmative, the House being equally divided, viz: yeas 32, nays 32, and the SPEAKER declaring himself with the yeas.

The yeas and nays were as follows:

YEAS.—Jonathan Trumbull, Speaker, Fisher Ames, Robert Barnwell, Egbert Benson, Elias Boudinot, Shearjashub Bourne, Benjamin Bourne, Jonathan Dayton, Thomas Fitzsimons, Elbridge Gerry, Nicholas Gilman, Benjamin Goodhue, James Gordon, Thomas Hardley, James Hillhouse, Daniel Huger, John Wilkes Kittera, John Laurance, Amasa Learned, George Leonard, Samuel Livermore, Frederick Augustus Muhlenberg, Theodore Sedgwick, Peter Sylvester, William Smith, Samuel Sterrett, Jonathan Sturges, Thomas Sumpter, George Thatcher, Thomas Tudor Tucker, Jeremiah Wadsworth, Artemas Ward, and Alexander White.

Ordered, That the Committee of the Whole House, to whom was referred the bill sent from the Senate entitled "An act in addition to the act entitled "An act to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States," be discharged from the further consideration of the same; and that the said bill be committed to Mr. BENSON, Mr. HILLHOUSE, Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, Mr. WHITE, and Mr. KITTERA.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, with an official statement of the expenditures to the end of the year 1792, from the sum of ten thousand dollars granted to defray the contingent expenses of Government, by an act passed on the 26th of March, 1790; also, an abstract of a supplementary arrangement made in the District of North Carolina, in regard to certain surveys, to facilitate the execution of the law laying a duty on distilled spirits.

The papers accompanying the said Message were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

HALF-PAY TO WIDOWS AND ORPHANS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the motion of the 18th instant, for making provision of half-pay for seven years to the widows and orphans of such officers of the Army of the United States as have been killed in the service since the third day of June, 1784, or who may hereafter be killed in the service of the United States.

Mr. HARTLEY, who brought forward the motion, moved to strike out June 3, 1784, and insert 4th day of March, 1789.

Mr. LIVERMORE said he should be in favor of the motion if it went as far back as the year 1775, and comprehended the widows and orphans of the officers of the Army killed within two years from the commencement of the war.

Mr. WILLIAMSON said he should consider it his duty to move for an amendment to the proposition, in the progress of its discussion, by inserting a clause to provide for the widows and orphans of the officers of the militia.

Mr. WADSWORTH stated the reasons on which he supposed provision had not been made for the widows and orphans of those officers which were killed during the period alluded to by the gentleman from New Hampshire: one principal one was, that the new Government was not authorized by the Constitution to create any demands against the United States; the Government was bound to take up the debts as they found them. The old Government had not recognised the claims of those widows and orphans alluded to. With respect to the present resolution, he was opposed to the amendment; he thought it ought to go back to June, 1784, the commencement of the present Indian war. He should move for other amendments to the resolution, that it should provide not only for those who may fall by the sword, but for such as die in the public service. He should also be for extending the provision to the widows and orphans of the officers of the militia. He considered it as a most disgraceful thing to a Government not to make provision for the families of those who sacrificed their lives in the cause of their country.

The motion for striking out June 3, 1784, was put and carried. The other part of the motion, to insert 4th day of March, 1789, was not put, being superseded by a motion for the Committee's rising. The Committee then rose, and reported progress.

TUESDAY, January 29.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee to whom was referred the Report of the Secretary of War on the petition of Thomas Wishart. Whereupon,

Resolved, That Thomas Wishart is entitled to the pay of a Lieutenant in the Army of the United States, from the 15th of November, 1776 until the 15th of October, 1781; and that the Comptroller of the Treasury be authorized to settle and adjust the account of the said Thomas Wishart accordingly.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution; and that Mr. PARKER, Mr. GORDON, and Mr. ASHE, do prepare and bring in the same.

Mr. BENSON, from the Committee to whom was referred the petition of Robert Heaton, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill sent from the Senate entitled "An act regulating Foreign Coins, and for other purposes; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

The said bill, together with the amendments thereto, was then read the third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill entitled "An act to regulate the claims to Invalid Pensions," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to amend an act entitled "An act to promote the progress of the Useful Arts;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and had leave to sit again.

WEDNESDAY, January 30.

Another member, to wit: WILLIAM HINDMAN, returned to serve in this House, for the State of Maryland, in the room of JOSHUA SENEY, who has resigned his seat, appeared, produced his credentials, and took his seat in the House.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill entitled "An act to regulate the claims to Invalid Pensions." Whereupon,

The amendments of the Senate to the bill to regulate claims to Invalid Pensions, were taken into consideration. Being read, it was moved that the bill should be recommitted to a Committee of the Whole.

This motion was objected to, as it would set the whole subject afloat, and might in its consequences preclude the Senate from an opportunity of receding from their amendments, and agreeing to the bill as it passed the House.

In answer to this objection, it was said, that the amendments involved an entire new principle, a principle which had not been discussed in the House; and that is, they make distinction in the situation of those invalids whose cases have been decided on by the Secretary of War, and that of the persons whose claims have been examined by the judges. The cases of the latter are not recognized by the amendments.

The motion for recommitting was carried in the affirmative, and the subject made the order of the day for to-morrow.

PROMOTION OF THE USEFUL ARTS.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to amend an act entitled "An act to promote the progress of Useful Arts."

The motion offered by Mr. WHITE, the purport of which is, to amend the first section by striking out what relates to the Director of the Mint, and inserting a clause which provides for the appointment of an officer to be denominated "the Director of Patents," was further considered.

Mr. LIVERMORE objected to the form of the amendment as indirectly providing for a new establishment.

Mr. WHITE withdrew his motion, and offered the following, in substance, in lieu of it:

"That an office shall be established for the purpose of granting patents, vesting in the authors of useful inventions and discoveries the exclusive right to their inventions and discoveries: said office to be under the direction of an officer to be denominated ——."

Mr. LIVERMORE said he liked this motion, because it brought the subject directly before the Committee. This object, however, he disliked; it sounded like a provision for granting —— dollars per annum—a sound which he was always averse to. He was altogether in favor of devolving the business on some officer already appointed: the Secretary of State he mentioned as a proper officer to superintend this subject.

Mr. PAGE said he should not agree to the amendment if he thought a salary would be the consequence. He supposed that provision might be made for the officer without recurring to a salary: he alluded to fees from the patentees. He objected to devolving the subject on the officer of the Mint, or of the Secretary of State, as interfering with the essential duties of those officers; and, though the gentlemen at present in those offices are abundantly qualified to execute the duty, yet it may happen that persons may hold those appointments at some future time not qualified for this particular service.

Mr. MURRAY observed that the amendment contemplated the appointment of one officer only, and that to be fixed at the seat of Government. He suggested several considerations in favor of investing the Judges of the District Courts with the power of granting patents in the several States, for the greater accommodation of the citizens, and the more extensive encouragement of genius. He was in favor of giving greater facility to the issuing of patents than has hitherto been considered as advisable.

Mr. WHITE said he thought the gentleman's idea would not do, as patents might be issued in the different parts or extremes of the Union for the same invention.

Mr. MURRAY said that he conceived a remedy for this inconvenience might easily be devised.

Mr. BOUDINOT said that one great objection to the present mode of obtaining patents was, the great delay and expense incurred by the applicants in being obliged to wait till the officers now empowered to decide on applications could find leisure, from the special duties of their offices, to attend to them. With respect to devolving the duty on the judges, he hoped that would not be done; as it would be found, judging from the engagements of the District Judge of Pennsylvania, that they could not possibly attend to the business.

Mr. BALDWIN objected generally to any amendment which should provide for the institution of a new department. His opinion was, that no office should be created till there was an absolute necessity for it. He entered into a brief consideration of the subject, and attempted to show that the business might with ease and convenience be attended to by some officer already appointed.

Mr. WILLIAMSON, adverting to the principles of the bill, said it was an imitation of the Patent System of Great Britain; that the provisions were such as would circumscribe the duties of the deciding officer within very narrow limits; the settlement of disputes arising from contested claims will devolve on referees altogether. He was decidedly opposed to creating a new Department—expense to the Government would be the inevitable consequence. The question on Mr. WHITE'S motion was negatived.

Mr. MURRAY said, he intended to move to strike out "Director of the Mint," for the purpose of inserting "the Judge of the District wherein the applicant might reside." As he thought the bill of great consequence as it related to the useful and ornamental arts, he would trouble the Committee with his reasons. He thought it was of consequence that, while the law holds out an invitation to genius, the mode of gratifying the fair and honest inventor should be as easy as possible. The Director of the Mint must reside at the Seat of Government; and, if he alone, or any other person, were exclusively empowered to issue patents, the benefits of invention would be but very partially enjoyed by the citizens who reside at a distance from the Seat of Government. The law ought to facilitate the granting of patents; and, as the right of exclusive enjoyment, at least for a limited term, was inherent in all equally, in every part of the nation, so all should, as far as possible, have equal facility in making their pretensions known and effectual. A country in Europe (Great Britain) had afforded, it was true, much experience on the subject; but regulations adopted there would not exactly comport in all respects either with the situation of this country, or with the rights of the citizen here. The minds of some members had taken a wrong direction, he conceived, from the view in which they had taken up the subject under its analogy with the doctrine of patents in England. There is this strong feature which distinguishes that doctrine in that country from the principles on which we must settle it in this. These patents are derived from the grace of the Monarch, and the exclusive enjoyment of the profits of a discovery is not so much a right inherent as it is a privilege bestowed and an emanation of prerogative. Here, on the contrary, the citizen has a right in the inventions he may make, and considers the law but as the mode by which he is to enjoy their fruits. England in one entire kingdom. Its Court is the scene where its prerogative diffuses its bounties, and, being stationed at London, the business can be well managed in a single spot. Here, on the contrary, there are fifteen States, sovereign as to many purposes, and forming within themselves centres of attraction for the ingenious and aspiring. London, in that country, not only attracts as the mart of genius and of all that contributes to ease or gain, but, by its immense combination of things, aids invention, and draws the genius into action which it may have attracted. But we are differently circumstanced, both as to local situation, and as to the thing as it regards the principle on which it is to be obtained. The distance from the extremes of the Union, or from its centre to its extremes, is very great. If the power were lodged with the District Judges, the citizen of ingenuity would have an opportunity of taking a patent certainly with more ease than if you oblige him to take a journey of perhaps six or eight hundred miles. The facility of enjoyment would prove an incentive to invention. Difficulty and distance would discourage it, and would frequently overpower the wish to obtain a patent for a discovery the profits of which would often be doubtful.

One and but one objection had been made to this alteration: that if the District Judges have the power, patents may issue in different places for the same discovery. This would be an evil, but is not without a remedy. Patents are matters of record. Let it be the duty of the Judge, immediately after the granting of a patent, to transmit a copy of the application, with all the necessary description of the article, to the Supreme Court, from which it may be easily disseminated to every District Court, and through the United States. An inventor desirous of obtaining a patent, would, of course, examine the patent records to see whether he had been anticipated. The grant of a patent does not destroy a claim or right founded in priority. Here he would observe, that, if the inconvenience were not entirely removed by this measure which he proposed, neither was the inconvenience of clashing claims as to originality and priority of discovery removed by any provision of the bill as it stands; nor could human ingenuity, perhaps, devise a complete mode in which it could be obviated. If a man who is really the inventor, chooses to try his title as to the originality of the invention, even after a patent is given to another, he will make and vend the article, and the solid title will be tried before a jury in an action brought against him by the patentee. If the measure he proposed were not deemed a sufficient guard, he would suggest the propriety of a further caution: Let the application be published and remain in the office, as in England it does (he believed) two months in the office of the Attorney General, that a caveat may be entered by any man who might claim or dispute the applicant's title.

He believed that the bill, either as it tended to foster the genius of men, or was considered with respect to distant emolument and national character, was extremely important. It was almost immediately one of those laws that embraced national views and national citizenship, and looked to an object of advantage which nothing but a National Government could secure. Without the aid of a General Government, the genius of the Americans could not reap its fruits. Nor had the State Governments given a fair occasion for the display of the ingenuity which he believed existed in the country. As to this great object, which requires national citizenship, the State laws were impotent. He thought that it was of consequence that no invention, however small or irrelative it might at first appear, should be lost; and, where he saw the idea of a patent law ridiculed by some, and unattended to by others, he believed they were accustomed to take things in their appearances, and had not exerted their reflection. A little reflection would teach us that whatever is great and astonishing in the works of art was humble in its origin, had been opposed by ignorance or cramped by poverty, and had become important but by gradual accumulation and a very slow progression; and that the wisdom of Government should be exerted in forming a repository, where nothing that might eventually be of service should be suffered to perish. He therefore wished to see such a law as would not only secure what might be offered near the Seat of Government, but invite and draw forth the useful invention of those who lived at a distance. That it should present an easy method of granting its protection, he therefore moved, that the Judge of the District wherein the applicant may reside, should be substituted for Director of the Mint.

Mr. WILLIAMSON offered a few objections to this motion, the question on which was taken, and decided in the negative.

On motion of Mr. SNEDECOR, "Director of the Mint" was stricken out, and "Secretary of State" inserted.

Mr. WHITE moved an amendment by way of proviso, the purport of which is, to preclude the inventor of an improvement to a machine from using the original invention, or the author of the original machine from using the improvement. This motion, after some opposition, was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMSON moved an amendment to the second section, which provides that the requisite oath or affirmation may be taken before any Judge of the United States, or of any particular State, or any person authorized to administer an oath in the place where the applicant resides. Agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMSON proposed another amendment, which should vest a discretionary power in the officer to dispense with the production of a model when he should think proper. Agreed to.

The Committee proceeded in the discussion of the bill as far as the seventh section; they then rose and reported progress, and the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, January 31.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have agreed to to the amendments proposed by this House to the bill entitled "An act regulating Foreign Coins, and for other purposes," with an amendment to the last amendment; to which they desire the concurrence of this House. The Secretary also brought to the House a Letter, received and read in the Senate, from Monsieur Le Brun, heretofore Royal Commissioner at the Tribunal of the District of Coutances, in France, addressed to the Congress of the United States, stating the delay of payment of a debt due to the heirs of Jerom Michael Le Brun, late an officer in Armand's Legion, for services in the United States during the late war.

A petition of Brown & Francis, of Providence, in the State of Rhode Island, merchants, was presented to the House and read, praying to be allowed the amount of the drawback on a quantity of gin and codfish, exported from the port of Providence, and duly landed at Calcutta, in the East Indies, and St. Eustatia, in the years 1791 and 1792, of which they are possessed of sufficient evidence, although not in the form prescribed by law.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, with instruction to examine the same, and report his opinion thereupon to the House.

Mr. GROVE, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to reimburse Henry Emanuel Lutterloh for expenses incurred in coming to America to join the Army of the United States; which was received, read twice, and committed.

Mr. PARKER, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to authorize the Comptroller of the Treasury to settle the account of Thomas Wishart, late a Lieutenant in the Army of the United States; which was received, and read twice and committed.

PROMOTION OF THE USEFUL ARTS.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to amend an act entitled "An act to promote the progress of Useful Arts."

The seventh section was read; some amendments were proposed, but disagreed to.

A motion was made to strike out the 8th section, for the purpose substituting another, which should provide, that all interfering claims for patents, should be determined at the option of the parties, either by the Secretary of State, or by arbitrators, &c. This motion gave rise to debate. It was at length moved to amend the motion, by striking out all the words after "Secretary of State;" this motion was not agreed to. Various other amendments to the motion were moved, and last, it was finally agreed to the following modification: That interfering applications for patents shall be determined by the Secretary of State; or, if all parties require it, by arbitrators, &c.

The motion for striking out the 8th section, and inserting the amendment, was put, and agreed to.

The Committee finished the discussion of the bill; they then rose and reported the same with amendments, which were laid on the table.

FRIDAY, February 1.

The Letter from Monsieur Le Brun, communicated in a message from the Senate yesterday, was read, and ordered to be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, with instruction to examine the matter thereof, and make report thereupon to the House.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the amendment proposed by the Senate to the last amendment of this House to the bill entitled "An act regulating Foreign Coins, and for other purposes:" Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the said amendment to the amendment.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill entitled "An act to regulate the claims to Invalid Pensions;" and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said amendments under consideration, and directed him to report to the House their agreement to some and disagreement to others of the said amendments. The House proceeded to consider the said report and amendments: Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the amendments to the first and second sections; and doth disagree to the amendments to the fourth and fifth sections of the said bill.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the amendments reported yesterday by the Committee of the Whole House to the bill to amend an act entitled "An act to promote the progress of Useful Arts;" and, the same being read, were agreed to. And then, the said bill being further amended at the Clerk's table, was, together with the amendments, ordered to be engrossed and read the third time on Monday next.

A petition of James Montgomery, master and commander of the revenue cutter called the General Greene, in behalf of himself and the officers of the said cutter, was presented to the House and read, praying that the compensation allowed by law to the officers and crews of revenue cutters may be augmented, and rendered more adequate to their services.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, with instruction to examine the same, and report his opinion thereupon to the House.

A memorial and petition of the manufacturers of cordage, lines, twine, and packthread, in Philadelphia, was presented to the House and read, praying that so much of the existing revenue laws of the United States as allows a drawback on foreign cordage, lines, twine, and packthread, may be repealed, and the duties imposed on said articles increased; and that the duty on hemp, when manufactured within the United States, and exported therefrom, may be refunded to the exporter.

Ordered, That the said memorial and petition be referred to the committee to whom was referred, on the 22d ultimo, the memorial of the manufacturers of cordage, lines, and packthread, of Providence, in the State of Rhode Island; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

PROMOTION OF THE USEFUL ARTS.

The amendments to the bill to amend the act, entitled an act to promote the progress of Useful Arts, were taken into consideration; some amendments being made to these amendments, the whole were agreed to; additional amendments were proposed; among others,

Mr. MURRAY moved to add the words "being citizen or citizens of the United States," after the words person or persons; the object of which is, to prevent foreigners from obtaining patents in this country for inventions which they have already obtained patents for in Europe; by which means the citizens of the United States might be prevented from obtaining patents for the same, or similar inventions.

This motion was agreed to.

Mr. KITTEBA moved to reduce the period for which patents should be granted, from fourteen to ten years; this motion was negatived. The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

MONDAY, February 4.

An engrossed bill to amend an act entitled "An act to promote the progress of Useful Arts," was read the third time and passed.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the petition of Alexander Contee Hanson, which was made on the 30th of April last: Whereupon,

Resolved, That the Accounting Officers of the Treasury be authorized to liquidate and pay the account of Alexander Contee Hanson, for traveling expenses and attendance at New York as one of the Judges appointed by the General Government to determine a controversy between the States of South Carolina and Georgia, which was, without his knowledge, compromised; and that the allowance be the same as that provided by law for the traveling expenses and attendance of the present members of Congress.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution; and that Mr. MERCER, Mr. PAGE, and Mr. STURGES, do prepare and bring in the same.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying a report, and sundry statements marked A, B, C, D, E, and F, made in pursuance of the resolutions of this House of the 23d ultimo; which were read and ordered to lie on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill sent from the Senate entitled "An act respecting fugitives from justice and persons escaping from the service of their masters;" and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made an amendment thereto; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, do lie on the table.

TUESDAY, February 5.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to authorize the Comptroller of the Treasury to settle the account of Thomas Wishart, late a Lieutenant in the Army of the United States; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto.

Ordered, That the said bill be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed, to join such committee as may be appointed by the Senate, to ascertain and report the mode of examining the votes for PRESIDENT and VICE PRESIDENT, and of notifying the persons who shall be elected of their election, and to regulate the time, place, and manner of administering the oath of office to the PRESIDENT.

Ordered, That Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, Mr. MADISON, and Mr. LAURANCE, be of the said committee on the part of this House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to repeal part of a resolution of Congress of the 29th of August, 1788, respecting the inhabitants of Post St. Vincents; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto. And then, the said bill being amended at the Clerk's table, was, together with the amendment, ordered to be engrossed and read the third time to-morrow.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill or bills for allowing a compensation to the PRESIDENT and VICE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, to commence from the 4th day of March next; and that Mr. SEDGWICK, Mr. DAYTON, and Mr. BARNWELL, be the said committee.

The House proceeded to consider the bill sent from the Senate entitled "An act respecting fugitives from justice and persons escaping from the service of their masters," which lay on the table: Whereupon, the said bill, together with the amendment agreed to yesterday, was read the third time; and, on the question that the same do pass, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 48, nays 7, as follows:

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee to whom was referred the petition of Woodrop and Joseph Sims; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said report under consideration, and come to a resolution thereupon; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That the remission of duties on a quantity of salt and wines entered at the port of New York, which, together with the ship, was lost on the passage from thence to Philadelphia, in March last, ought to be granted, agreeable to the prayer of the petitioners.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution; and that Mr. KEY, Mr. GROVE, and Mr. TUCKER, do prepare and bring in the same.

Mr. MERCER, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to make compensation to Alexander Contee Hanson; which was received, and read twice and committed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the motion of the 18th ultimo, for making provision of half-pay for seven years, to the widows and orphans of certain officers of the Army of the United States; and, after some time spent therein, Mr. SPEAKER resumed the Chair, and Mr. KEY reported that the Committee had, according to order, had the said motion under consideration, and come to a resolution thereupon; which he delivered in at the Clerk's table, where the same was twice read, and agreed to by House, as follows:

Resolved, That provision of half-pay for — years to the widows and orphans of such officers of the Army of the United States, as have been killed in the service, since the fourth day of March, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-nine, or who may hereafter be killed in the service of the United States, ought to be made by law.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution; and that Mr. HARTLEY, Mr. WADSWORTH, and Mr. GREENUP, do prepare and bring in the same.

A message from the Senate, informed the House, that the Senate disagree to the bill, entitled "An act to authorize a Loan in the certificates or notes of such States, as shall have balances due to them upon a final settlement of accounts with the United States." The Senate also insist on their amendments, disagreed to by this House, to the fourth and fifth sections of the bill, entitled "An act to regulate the claims to Invalid Pensions," and desire a conference with this House on the subject-matter of the said amendments; to which conference, the Senate have appointed managers on their part: The Senate have also agreed to the amendment, proposed by this House, to the bill, entitled "An act respecting fugitives from justice, and persons escaping from the service of their masters." The Senate have also passed the bill, entitled "An act to continue in force, for a limited time, and to amend the act, entitled 'An act providing the means of intercourse between the United States and foreign nations.'"

The House proceeded to consider so much of the said message, as desires a conference on the subject-matter of the amendments depending between the two Houses to the bill, entitled "An act to regulate claims to Invalid Pensions." Whereupon.

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the said conference, and that Mr. SEDGWICK, Mr. GILES, and Mr. BOUDINOT, be appointed managers at the same on the part of this House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to reimburse Henry Emanuel Lutterloh, for expenses incurred in coming to America, to join the Army of the United States during late war; and after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto. The bill was then ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. HARTLEY, from the Committee appointed presented a bill to make provision of half-pay to the widows and orphans of certain officers; which was received, read twice and committed.

The House, according to the order of the day, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to authorize the adjustment of a claim of Joseph Henderson, against the United States; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto. The bill was then ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, February 6.

A memorial of the officers of the Rhode Island line of the late American Army, in behalf themselves and the soldiers of said line, was presented to the House and read, praying that the depreciation which accrued on the certificates of debt granted them for military services during the late war, may be made good, or such other relief afforded them, as the present circumstances of the United States will admit.

Ordered, That the said memorial do lie on the table.

A petition of John Rogers was presented to the House and read praying compensation for certain lands on the Mississippi river, granted him by the State of Virginia, for his services as an officer in the line of the said State, prior to the cession made to the United States, of the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio; the title to which lands has since been ceded to the Chickasaw Indians, by the treaty of Hopewell, in the year one thousand seven hundred and eighty-six.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to Mr. PAGE, Mr. LIVERMORE, and Mr. CLARK; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

An engrossed bill to repeal part of a resolution of Congress of the twenty-ninth of August, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-eight, respecting the inhabitants of Post Saint Vincents, was read the third time and passed.

An engrossed bill to authorize the Comptroller of the Treasury to settle the accounts of Thomas Wishart, late a Lieutenant in the Army of the United States, was read the third time and passed.

An engrossed bill to reimburse Henry Emanuel Lutterloh for expenses incurred in coming to America, to join the Army of the United States, during the late war, was read the third time and passed.

An engrossed bill to authorize the adjustment of a claim of Joseph Henderson against the United States, was read the third time and passed.

Mr. SEDGWICK, from the committee appointed, presented, according to order, a bill providing compensation to the PRESIDENT and VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, which was received, and read twice and committed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the Secretary of War, to whom was referred the petition of Simeon Thayer; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported, that the Committee had had the said report under consideration, and come to a resolution thereupon; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That Simeon Thayer, late a Major in the Army of the United States, who was disabled at the battle of Monmouth, be placed on the pension list of the United States; that he be allowed the half-pay of a Major, from the first of January, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-one, provided he return his commutation of half-pay, with interest thereon.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution, and that Mr. BENJAMIN BOURNE, Mr. GILMAN, and Mr. ISRAEL SMITH, do prepare and bring in the same.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee on the petition of Elijah Bostwick: Whereupon,

Resolved, That there be allowed and paid to the said Elijah Bostwick, the sum of fifty-eight pounds, three shillings and four pence, current money of New York, being the amount of costs which he incurred in defending a suit commenced against him, as agent to the deputy Commissary General of the Northern Department, on public account.

Ordered, That a bill be brought in pursuant to the said resolution, and that Mr. SYLVESTER, Mr. KEY, and Mr. GROVE, do prepare and bring in the same.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the engrossed bill to compensate John Tucker; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made an amendment thereto; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, be engrossed, and read the third time, immediately.

An engrossed bill to compensate John Tucker, was read the third time; and, on the question that the said bill pass, it passed in the negative. And so the said bill was rejected.

PENSIONS TO DISABLED OFFICERS, &c.

Mr. GREENUP's resolution for placing on the pension list all such officers and privates of the militia as are or may be wounded in the service, and who are not provided for by law, was taken up in Committee of the Whole. The resolution was read by the Chairman.

Mr. GREENUP supported this resolution by observing that, as the militia was now called into service by the General Government, it was reasonable to make provision for such as may be wounded or disabled. Except this was done, he conceived that the United States would find it extremely difficult to procure an effective militia force on any occasion. Indeed, it was to be imputed to this cause that the militia had hitherto discovered so great a backwardness in turning out; and that those who had been in service were so indifferent, being principally substitutes. He added some remarks on the justice and good policy of making the provision; nor did he conceive that the increase of the pension list was a sufficient reason to prevent making that provision, when it is considered how important a subject is a competent defence to our frontiers.

Several gentlemen objected to the resolution as involving a very great and increasing expense. The increase of the pension list, it was said, ought not to be thought lightly of in a republican Government. It was said that, in the Militia law, the object of the resolution was in a great measure provided for; it does not, indeed, look back; but provision for particular persons may be made without going to an unlimited retrospective view of the case. The resolution was modified to refer to such officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates of the militia as have been wounded or disabled since the — day of —, or who shall hereafter be wounded or disabled in the service of the United States.

The debate was continued to a considerable length, in which the difference between the militia and the regular troops was stated. The latter, it was said, abandon every other pursuit and occupation when they engage in the service; and, in cases of wounds and disabilities incurred in the public service, are left absolutely without any other resource than the provision made for them by the public as pensioners. With respect to the militia, they are commonly persons of property, who leave their respective occupations for a time; and when the service is performed they have their farms and their various occupations to return to. It was said that it would be unspeakably better to pay the militia at an enhanced rate—such a rate as may be sufficient to induce them to turn out. That extending the system of pensions in the manner contemplated, would render the matter complex, extensive, and enormously expensive—while at the same time it would subject the public to innumerable impositions.

A motion was made that the Committee should rise, and that the resolution should be referred to the committee which reported the bill providing half-pay to the widows and orphans of the officers of the regular troops. After further debate, this motion was put and negatived.

The question on agreeing to the resolution, as modified, was then put and agreed to.

Mr. BARNWELL moved an additional resolution, which was agreed to; the purport of which was to regulate the mode of ascertaining the nature and degree of the disabilities, and the annual allowance to be granted for the same.

The Committee then rose and reported the two resolutions to the House, as follows:

Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law for placing such officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates, of the militia, as have been disabled in the service of the United States, since the — day of —, or shall hereafter be disabled in such service, on the pension list.

Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law for establishing such regulations as may be necessary to ascertain the nature and degree of such disabilities, and the annual allowance to be made for the same."

The House adopted the resolutions, and referred them to a select committee, with instructions to report a bill.

THURSDAY, February 7.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have agreed to the resolution of this House, of the fifth instant, for the appointment of a joint committee to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for PRESIDENT and VICE PRESIDENT, and of notifying the persons who shall be elected, of their election, and for regulating the time, place, and manner of administering the oath of office to the PRESIDENT; and have appointed a committee for that purpose on their part.

Mr. BENJAMIN BOURNE, from the committee to whom were referred the memorials of the manufacturers of cordage, lines, twine, and packthread, of Philadelphia and Providence, made a report; which was read, and ordered to be referred to the consideration of a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill providing compensation to the PRESIDENT and VICE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

And then a motion being made and seconded further to amend the said bill at the Clerk's table, by adding to the end thereof the following section, to wit:

"And be it further enacted, That this act shall continue in force for, and during the term of, four years, from the third day of March next, and no longer."

It passed in the negative—yeas 27, nays 33, as follows:

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time tomorrow.

Mr. KEY, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for the remission of the duty on a quantity of wines, the property of Woodrop and Joseph Sims; which was received, and read twice and committed.

Mr. BENJAMIN BOURNE, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for the relief of Simeon Thayer; which was received, read twice and committed.

Mr. KEY, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to refund to Jacob Bell certain duties on pickled fish; which was twice read and committed.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee on the petition of Robert Heaton; Whereupon,

Resolved, That it is advisable that the several impost laws of the United States, so far as they may be deemed to impose a duty on horses, and other useful beasts imported into the United States for breed, be repealed.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution, and that Mr. BENSON, Mr. SEDGWICK, and Mr. MADISON, do prepare and bring in the same.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee to whom was referred, on the sixteenth of April last, the petition of the inhabitants of Newark, in New Jersey; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said report under consideration, and come to no resolution thereupon.

FRIDAY, February 8.

An engrossed bill providing compensation to the PRESIDENT and VICE PRESIDENT of the United States was read the third time and passed.

Mr. SYLVESTER, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for the relief of Elijah Bostwick; which was read twice and committed.

A memorial of the officers of the late American Army, now residing in the State of South Carolina, in behalf of themselves, and the non-commissioned officers and privates of the said Army, was presented to the House and read, praying that the depreciation which accrued on the certificates of debt granted them for military services during the late war, may be made good, or such other relief afforded them as the present circumstances of the United States will admit.

Ordered, That the said memorial do lie.

A memorial of the merchants and inhabitants of the towns of Norfolk and Portsmouth, in the State of Virginia, was presented to the House and read, stating the inconveniences under which they labor from the number of sick and disabled seamen that daily frequent that port, and praying that a tax may be imposed on all vessels or seamen, for the purpose of establishing, in or near the seaport towns of the United States, marine hospitals, for the reception and support of sick and disabled seamen; or that such other regulations may be adopted, as to the wisdom of Congress shall seem meet.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to the Committee of the Whole House to whom is committed the bill for the relief of sick and infirm seamen.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to make provision of half-pay to the widows and orphans of certain officers; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto.

Ordered, That the bill, with the amendments, do lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act relative to claims against the United States, not barred by any act of limitation, and which have not been already adjusted," with an amendment; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the said amendment; and the same being read, was agreed to.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill to establish fees in the Treasury Department, for the transfer of public securities, and that Mr. CLARK, Mr. FINDLEY, and GERRY, be the said committee.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill for the remission of the duty on a quantity of wines, the property of Woodrop and Joseph Sims; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto. And, on the question that the said bill be engrossed, and read the third time, it passed in the negative; and so the said bill was rejected.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate disagree to the bill, entitled "An act for determining the Northern boundary of the territory ceded to the United States by the State of North Carolina." The Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

ing that the title to certain lands in the territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, which they purchased from the agent of the Scioto Company, in 1790, may be confirmed to them.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to Mr. WADSWORTH, Mr. SEDGWICK, Mr. FINDLEY, Mr. WHITE, and Mr. BARNWELL; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report their opinion thereupon, to the House.

A petition of the officers of the Georgia line of the late Army of the United States, on behalf of themselves and the non-commissioned officers and soldiers of the said line, was presented to the House and read, praying that the depreciation which accrued on the certificates of debt granted them for military services, during the late war, may be made good, or such other relief afforded them as the present circumstances of the United States will admit. Laid on the table.

Ordered, That the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same," be referred to Mr. GOODHUE, Mr. FITZSIMONS, and Mr. PARKER; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee to whom was referred the memorials of the manufacturers of cordage, lines, twine, and packthread, of Philadelphia and Providence; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said report under consideration, and directed him to report to the House their disagreement to the same.

The House proceeded to consider the said report; and, on the question, that the House do agree with the Committee of the Whole House in their disagreement to the same; it passed in the affirmative; and so the said memorials were rejected.

Mr. CLARK, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to establish fees to be paid on the transfer of public securities; which was read twice and committed.

Mr. GOODHUE, from the committee to whom were referred the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and regulating the same," made a report; and, the same being read, the House proceeded to consider the said report and amendments: Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the said amendments.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate disagree to the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the settlement of the accounts of Lewis Garanger, for military services rendered during the late war."

MONDAY, February 11.

An engrossed bill for the relief of Simeon Thayer was read the third time and passed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Postmaster General, respecting a tax imposed on the proprietors of the lines of stages, by a late law of the State of New Jersey; which was read, and ordered to be referred to the committee appointed to take into consideration that part of the PRESIDENT'S Speech which relates to the transmission of newspapers, and report whether any, and what, alterations may be necessary in the act passed last session, for the regulation of the Post Office.

THE PUBLIC DEBT.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on so much of the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made the third of December last, as relates to a plan for the redemption of the Public Debt. The Report being read:

Mr. GILES adverted to the imperfect state of the information before the House, relative to the state of the funds, particularly as the resolutions calling for this information had not yet been complied with, and he was apprehensive the requisite statements would not be furnished during the present session: this being the state of things, he thought the Committee were not in a situation to go into a discussion of the subjects of the new loans and new taxes, without further light; he moved therefore that the Committee should rise. This motion was seconded.

Mr. FITZSIMONS was opposed to the motion. After briefly stating the importance of the subject, the general expectation of the people that something would be done the present session relative to a provision for reducing the Public Debt, the duty of the Government to avail itself of the right reserved to it of paying off a part of the Debt, the state of the Treasury, the material information already received from the Secretary, the actual surplus in the Treasury, &c., concluded by saying, that he hoped the Committee would not rise, but go into a discussion of the subject, take up the propositions offered by the Secretary, and adopt or reject them, as their merits shall dictate, or agree to others which may be brought forward by any member of the Committee.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, alluding to the Speech of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, respecting this particular object, and the answer of the House thereto, gave a short account of the progress of the business in the House; it had been neglected ever since the 30th November, though the Secretary's Report has been in its possession ever since that period.

For the Committee then to rise, would be tantamount to a relinquishment of the object of the present session. He stated several particulars to show that it was probable the existing funds would be adequate to the object in some degree, without being obliged to have recourse to new taxes. He said, that he had been informed a gentleman of the Committee had prepared some resolutions relative to the subject; he hoped, therefore, that the Committee would not rise, but that the gentleman would produce his resolutions; that the Committee would take them into consideration, and at least take such steps in the matter as would manifest some disposition to meet the wishes of the people, and justify the professions made by so great a number of the members of the Legislature.

Mr. GILES repeated his objections, arising from the imperfect state of the information before the House: adverting to the PRESIDENT'S Speech, he said, the propositions before the Committee were in direct opposition to the Speech. The Speech does not contemplate any new taxes, but the reverse. The propositions directly propose them. He was as much disposed as any member to go into measures for a reduction of the Debt; it was an object he much desired; but he called on gentlemen to show how this could be done with any propriety, when the most important and most necessary information respecting the funds is not in their possession.

Mr. LAURANCE adverted to the resolutions brought forward a few days since by Mr. GILES; and going over them one by one, he asked what connexion the present subject had with a solution of the principal part of the inquiries contained in those resolutions? The most important information expected from the requisitions contained in the resolutions, he observed, was in the possession of the House, particularly that which had any bearing on the present matter. He was opposed to the motion for the Committee's rising.

Mr. MERCER said, he saw no good end that would result from the Committee's rising. Had he the least suspicion that the project of the Secretary of the Treasury would be adopted, he would be one of the last that would rise in support of a motion to go into the discussion at the present time; but he had no such expectation. He then entered into a consideration of the documents before the House, received from the Secretary of the Treasury; he observed they were inaccurate, defective, and imperfect; they do not furnish the requisite information as to the expenditures of the public moneys which have been already paid by the people. He showed the impropriety of laying any new taxes until satisfaction was had relative to the sums already paid; the people would not consider their interest consulted until this was done. He then urged several reasons in favor of a postponement of a permanent provision for the reduction of the Public Debt, till a more competent representation was on the floor; that it was extremely improper for the reliques of an imperfect representation at the close of the session to go into the consideration of so important business. He professed his wishes that provision should be made for the reduction of the Public Debt, and concluded by suggesting, that a temporary provision only be made the present session; further than this, he thought, it would be improper to go in the present state of affairs.

Mr. FITZSIMONS observed, that the gentleman last speaking furnished him with an opportunity to suggest to the consideration of the Committee some ideas he had revolved in his own mind respecting a temporary provision. He then pointed out resources within the control of the Legislature that might be applied to this object, without recurring to new taxes, specifying the sum that would be wanted to begin the operation; he mentioned a particular surplus, and the Bank dividend as being adequate to the object.

Mr. CLARK said, he wanted information as well as the gentleman from Virginia; but he saw no use in the Committee's rising; they would get up where they sat down, if they should now rise. He wished the propositions which had been mentioned were brought forward, that they might be considered; but there was another subject which he thought had a prior claim to attention, and that was the debt due the Bank: in December that business was pushed with great zeal; since that time nothing had been said about it; this appeared mysterious.

Mr. LAURANCE rose to explain the state of the matter respecting the debt due to the Bank. The subject had been suspended, in order that the House might receive complete information as to the state of the public funds.

Mr. PAGE offered some general remarks on the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury, which he said, were considered by many persons as exceptionable in all its parts. He had his objections to it. He wished the whole subject to revert to the consideration of the Legislature, and had therefore seconded the motion for the Committee to rise, as the most delicate mode of giving the subject the go by.

Mr. MADISON defended an observation brought forward by Mr. GILES, which was, that there was a manifest impropriety in bringing forward abstract propositions for discussion, when it was not known what consequences were involved in the adoption of those propositions. Mr. MADISON stated a variety of particulars to show that such abstract propositions are improper. He professed his wishes that some provision should be made for reducing the debt; he believed his colleague was sincere in his professions to the same purpose. He recapitulated some of the objections arising from the imperfect state of the information before the House.

Mr. GILES withdrew his motion; his object in doing so was to give an opportunity for bringing forward the propositions which had been alluded to.

Mr. FITZSIMONS, after offering some remarks in answer to observations which had been made, tending to impeach his consistency and sincerity in the present case, read two propositions, the purport of which is, that an annual fund be constituted, to consist of one hundred and three thousand one hundred and ninety-nine dollars and six cents, to begin to accrue the first day of January, 1793; and that a loan to the amount of five hundred and fifty thousand dollars be made.

These being read by the Chairman, Mr. GILES renewed his motion for the Committee to rise.

Examining Votes for President, &c.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. MADISON objected to these resolutions, as being abstract propositions.

Mr. VENABLE objected to them; he informed the Committee that in the course of the discussion he should move to apply the Sinking Fund to the object now under consideration.

Mr. MERCER objected to diverting the Sinking Fund from its appropriate object.

The Committee then rose and reported progress, and had leave to sit again.

EXAMINING VOTES FOR PRESIDENT, &c.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, from the committee appointed on the part of this House, jointly, with a committee appointed on the part of the Senate, to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for PRESIDENT and VICE PRESIDENT of the United States, and for other purposes expressed in the resolution of the fifth instant, made a report; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

"That the two Houses shall assemble in the Senate Chamber on Wednesday next, at twelve o'clock: That two persons be appointed tellers on the part of this House, to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared: that the result shall be delivered to the PRESIDENT of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the vote, and the persons elected, to both Houses, assembled as aforesaid, which shall be deemed a declaration of the persons elected PRESIDENT and VICE PRESIDENT, and, together with a list of the votes, be entered on the Journal of the two Houses."

Ordered, That Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, and Mr. LAURANCE, be appointed tellers on the part of this House, pursuant to the said report.

TUESDAY, February 12.

Mr. BENSON, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for repealing the several impost laws of the United States, so far as they may be deemed to impose a duty on useful beasts imported for breed, and for remitting the duties heretofore accrued on such importations, in the cases where they have only been secured to be paid; which was twice read and committed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill for the relief of Elijah Bostwick; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made an amendment thereto; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have agreed to the report of the Joint Committee appointed to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for PRESIDENT and VICE PRESIDENT of the United States, and for the other purposes expressed in the resolution of the fifth instant, and have appointed a teller on their part, pursuant to the said report.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on so much of the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made the third of December last, as relates to a plan for the redemption of the Public Debt; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, reported progress, and had leave to sit again.

WEDNESDAY, February 13.

An engrossed bill for the relief of Elijah Bostwick was read the third time, and passed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to refund to Jacob Bell certain duties on pickled fish; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto.

Ordered, That the said bill be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to make compensation to Alexander Contee Hanson; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

And on the question, that the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed and read the third time, it passed in the negative; and so the said bill was rejected.

VOTES FOR PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT.

A message from the Senate informed the House that a PRESIDENT of the Senate is elected for the sole purpose of opening the certificates, and counting the votes of the several States, in the choice of a PRESIDENT and VICE PRESIDENT of the United States; and that the Senate is now ready, in the Senate Chamber, to attend, with this House, on that occasion.

Resolved, That the SPEAKER, attended by the House, do now withdraw to the Senate Chamber, for the purpose expressed in the said message.

The SPEAKER accordingly left the Chair, and, attended by the House, withdrew to the Senate Chamber, and, after some time, returned to the House.

The SPEAKER resumed the Chair.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH and Mr. LAURANCE then delivered in, at the Clerk's table, a list of the votes of the Electors of the several States, in the choice of a PRESIDENT and VICE PRESIDENT of the United States, as the same were declared by the PRESIDENT of the Senate, in the presence of the Senate and of this House; which was ordered to be entered on the Journal, and is as follows:

The SPEAKER laid before the House two Letters from the Secretary of the Treasury, the first accompanying copies of certain powers, instructions, statements, and correspondence, in relation to foreign loans, transmitted pursuant to the resolutions of this House, of the 23d ultimo; the second of the said Letters, accompanying three several statements in relation to the Sinking Fund, and two other statements of cash in the Treasury during the years 1791 and 1792, also transmitted in pursuance of the said resolutions; which were partly read.

THURSDAY, February 14.

Mr. WADSWORTH, from the committee to whom were referred the petitions of the French inhabitants of Gallipolis, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act to provide more effectually for the collection of the duties imposed by law on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels,'" to which they desire the concurrence of this House; also, that the Senate have agreed to a resolution for the appointment of a committee, jointly, with a committee on the part of this House, to wait on the PRES-

DENT, and to notify to him of his unanimous re-election to the office of PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, from the committee appointed to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate, to ascertain and report the mode of examining the votes for PRESIDENT and VICE PRESIDENT of the United States, and for other purposes expressed in the resolution of the 5th instant, made a report; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to join such committee as may be appointed by the Senate, to wait on the PRESIDENT, and to notify him of his unanimous re-election to the office of PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Ordered, That Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, Mr. MADISON, and Mr. LAURANCE, be of the said committee, on the part of this House.

The House resumed the reading of the Letters and statements communicated from the Secretary of the Treasury, yesterday, and made further progress therein.

FRIDAY, February 15.

An engrossed bill to refund to Jacob Bell certain duties on pickled fish, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BENJAMIN BOURNE, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of sundry printers and booksellers of the city of Philadelphia, made a report; which was read, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of the Whole House to whom is committed the bill for repealing the several impost laws of the United States, so far as they may be deemed to impose a duty on useful beasts imported for breed, and for remitting the duties heretofore accrued on such importations, in the cases where they have only been secured to be paid.

Mr. GREENUP, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for placing on the pension list such officers and privates of the militia as may be wounded and disabled in the service of the United States; which was read the third time, and committed.

Ordered, That the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act to provide more effectually for the collection of the duties imposed by law on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels,'" be committed to Messrs. GOODRUE, HINDMAN, and JEREMIAH SMITH.

The House resumed the reading of the Letters and statements communicated from the Secretary of the Treasury, on Wednesday last, and went through the same.

Mr. BENSON, from the committee to whom was referred the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act in addition to the act, entitled 'An act to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States,'" reported several amendments thereto; which were read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

Transfer of Public Securities.

Mr. GILES, from the committee to whom was recommitment, on the 14th of November last, the report of the committee appointed to inquire into the causes of the failure of the expedition under Major General St. Clair, made a revisionary report; which was read, and, together with the first report, ordered to be referred to the consideration of a Committee of the Whole House on Wednesday next.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act to promote the progress of Useful Arts, and to repeal the act heretofore made for that purpose," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the said amendments, and, the same being read, were agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, from the committee appointed to join the committee appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait on the PRESIDENT, and to notify him of his unanimous re-election to the office of PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, reported that the committee had performed that duty.

SATURDAY, February 16.

TRANSFER OF PUBLIC SECURITIES.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to establish fees to be paid on the transfer of public securities.

The bill was read by the Chairman. An amendment was proposed, which was, to strike out the last line of the bill, and to substitute a clause providing for the disposal of the fees, which are to be received by the Comptroller of the Treasury and the Loan Offices.

Mr. FITZSIMONS said he did not know whether he should vote for the bill or not. At present he had his doubts on the expediency of departing from a principle established in the Government, which is, that public officers should be compensated for their services without being authorized to receive any fees. This principle has been adhered to in all cases where it was practicable; and it must appear the most eligible mode, when it is considered how difficult it is to guard against abuses and frauds. He considered it would be extremely difficult, if not impossible, to provide adequate checks.

Mr. BENSON objected to the provision, generally. He considered it as laying a tax on a particular species of property already encumbered with various restrictions, in respect to which there is no option left to one of the parties. The Government has prescribed for its own security a particular process in the subject of transferring public certificates. He saw no reason in imposing a tax in addition to these regulations.

Mr. DAYTON (in replying to Mr. FITZSIMONS) observed, that the process of making the transfers, at the several Loan Offices, would afford an opportunity to provide complete and adequate checks against any abuse in the transaction, or embezzlement of the fees; the names of the parties are always entered in books kept for the purpose, and these would furnish the necessary criterions. With respect to the objection arising from the provision's operating as a tax, he conceived it did not apply with any greater force than what might be urged against fees imposed on deeds, &c. Mr. D. conceived that, as a host of clerks were employed in the Treasury Department on this business of transfer, which was done for the benefit of individuals, he thought it no more than reasonable that they should pay the expense.

Mr. CLARK followed Mr. DAYTON in a train of similar observations. He said he saw no difficulty in the case; the expense will fall on the speculators only.

Mr. STURGES said, it appeared to him that the bill would operate as an infraction of the law making provision for the Public Debt. He conceived that that law does not contemplate any charge being paid by the proprietors of public securities for transferring the certificates; they never supposed that they would be clogged with any such charge. In this view of the subject, he should be opposed to the bill.

Mr. BENSON replied to Mr. DAYTON's remarks on the tax imposed on deeds; he said the cases are not parallel. In the present case, there is no option to the public creditors; the Government has already prescribed how this business shall be done; it must therefore be considered as a breach of the rights of the creditors. With respect to the expenses falling exclusively on speculators, he said the gentleman was mistaken, and mentioned an instance to show that persons who are not speculators will be subject to the tax. Mr. B. doubted the propriety, however, of a regulation which should operate so partially. He very much doubted the legality of framing a tax that should be pointed at any class of citizens in particular.

Mr. MERCER, after a few introductory remarks on the general utility of public institutions, and the obligation which every citizen is under to support them, remarked, that however true this principle is, yet it is but just that those who derive peculiar personal advantages from these institutions, should pay for those advantages. He applied this reasoning to the case in hand, and observed, that on this principle he thought the provision contemplated by the bill was reasonable and just. With respect to taxing the property in the funds, he remarked, that the subject involved the most extensive considerations. He should not at present enter into a discussion of them; but, he observed, that it was clearly his opinion that that species of property was liable to taxation in common with every other; and this idea he said was sanctioned by the usages and customs of nations.

Mr. BARNWELL said, it appeared to him that the particular regulation established in the Treasury Department was made for the public advantage; if so, he could not see the justice of throwing the expense on individuals. If the bill should be sustained, he contended that the individuals should have the alternative of transferring or not, as is the case in respect to deeds. He should therefore be opposed to the bill, unless some provision for an alternative should accompany it.

Mr. GERRY objected to the bill on general principles. He stated sundry consequences extremely injurious to the public credit, which might be grafted on the principle contained in the regulation proposed.

Mr. BOUNDNOT observed, that when the proposition was first brought forward, he entertained a favorable idea of the provision; he had not, however, till this morning, critically examined the operation of the principle in relation to the contract between the Government and the public creditors. He was indebted, he said, to the gentleman from New York, for the idea of an interference. Mr. B. then analyzed the provision respecting the Public Debt, in order to show that the regulations adopted were considered as final and conclusive; full and complete provision was made to defray the expense by the Government; from hence he deduced this consequence, that the tax contemplated would have a retrospective aspect—would interfere with the stipulations of the contract, and go to injuring the public credit essentially; for, said he, if Congress can lay a tax on the transfer of the public securities, they may extend the principle to such a degree as to interdict all transfers whatever, yea, to taxing the Debt; an idea he conceived totally subversive of public credit.

Mr. DAYTON remarked, that the reasoning of his colleague, and of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. GERRY,] went too far; it would apply to every species of imposition whatever; and the Government would thereby be in effect precluded from laying any duties on impost and tonnage.

Mr. S. BOURNE was in favor of the bill. He cited precedents from Probate and other offices in the several States, to show that paying fees was customary, and was submitted to by the people. The parties deriving the benefit, it is universally conceived, should bear the expense incurred. With respect to the fees, he conceived the precedent is already established by the Government; fees are paid in the Department of State, these fees are accounted for to the Secretary of the Treasury. He thought a similar mode might be adopted in the present case. Let the fees be paid for the benefit of the United States, and let the several officers account with the head of the Treasury Department for the same, who will account to the Legislature.

Mr. CLARK supported the bill by further remarks. He extended his ideas to taxing the public securities: this expedient, he said, the public exigencies may possibly require. He repeated his observations relative to the number of clerks in the Treasury, employed on the business of transfers: the great expense hereby incurred, he said, was for the advantage of speculators, of which a host was collected in a neighboring city, where, as from a centre, they extended their negotiations to all parts of the Union.

Mr. LAURANCE said, he always considered it as indicative of the badness of a cause, when a person descends to general invectives against public bodies. He alluded to Mr. CLARK's reflection on the City of New York.

Mr. CLARK said, he had not mentioned New York.

Mr. LAURANCE said, his remark was applicable to the gentleman's reflection, let him refer to any city whatever. Mr. L. then entered into a general consideration of the subject, and stated the various steps of the process prescribed by the Funding law in relation to transfers. The deductions he drew were similar to those made by Mr. BENSON.

Mr. MURRAY was against the bill. He thought it wrong in principle, and, thinking so, no argument speciously drawn from a small gain to the public, which it was unworthy in them to demand, should tempt him to vote for it. He declared, that when the bill was first noticed, his reflections had presented the provision merely in a sort of analogy with fees justly demanded in Courts, and in common civil offices—as offices for the registering of deeds; but the moment the course of his reflections had traced the subject in that analogy, he discovered a strong and insuperable objection. These institutions, for the support of which fees were demandable from such as had business, were such as the law established for the intercourse between one individual and another; here, on the contrary, the law relates to a proceeding in which a debtor public is to transfer its promissory notes to individual creditors. The public is a debtor, has issued negotiable paper, part of the value of which depends on the facility of negotiation; the necessity of registering transfers being merely to secure the public. As the debt was subscribed under the idea of transfers being free of expense, so to force the parties to pay fees would diminish the value of the property; for, if it be an expense now to the public, and that expense be intended to be taxed on the thing transferred, it would amount to something like diminishing of the debt without discharging it. There is a solid difference between laws that regulate fees to be paid on the transactions between man and man, and such as relate to transactions like this, between a debtor public and an individual creditor. If a debtor constitutes a debt of a negotiable kind, and at the time of issuing his note makes each transfer necessarily to depend on an act of his own, he cannot expect to be paid for this; this quality forms a part of the value he has parted from.

The debate on the subject was continued till a late hour; several other gentlemen spoke on the occasion. The motion to amend the bill was at length agreed to. The Committee then rose, and reported accordingly.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, do lie on the table.

MONDAY, February 18.

A petition of the Directors of the Library Company of Philadelphia, and of the Trustees of the Loganian Library, was presented to the House and read, praying that so much of the existing revenue laws of the United States as imposes a duty on books imported for the use of public libraries, may be repealed.

Proceedings.

[H. OF R.]

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to Messrs. FINDLEY, LAURANCE, and MURRAY; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon to the House.

Mr. MURRAY, from the committee appointed to take into consideration that part of the PRESIDENT'S Speech which relates to the transmission of newspapers, and report whether any, and what, alterations may be necessary in the act passed last session for the regulation of the Post Office, made a report; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act in addition to the act, entitled 'An act to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States;'" and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, do lie on the table.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, laying before Congress a report and plat of the Territory of the United States on the Potomac, as given in by the Commissioners of that Territory, together with a Letter from the Secretary of State, which accompanied them. The papers referred to in the Message were ordered to lie on the table.

TUESDAY, February 19.

A memorial of sundry merchants and traders of Providence, in the State of Rhode Island, was presented to the House and read, stating the disadvantages which attend the operation of the existing revenue laws of the United States, and praying that the same may be revised and amended. Referred to the Secretary of the Treasury.

A petition of Caleb Newbold, John Black, and Sarah Newbold, executors of the last will and testament of Caleb Newbold, deceased, praying compensation for provisions furnished for the use of the militia and navy of Pennsylvania, in Continental service, during the late war; also, a petition of Thomas Coit, Collector of the Revenue for the Second Division, in the State of Connecticut, praying to be exonerated from the payment of a certain sum of money, which he collected on account of the duties accruing on a quantity of distilled spirits, and deposited in his storehouse at Norwich, in the said State, as a place of safety, and which, together with a part of the money so deposited, was consumed by fire on the night of the 15th ultimo.

Ordered, That the said petitions be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, with instructions to examine the same, and report his opinion thereupon to the House.

A memorial of sundry paper-makers in the States of Pennsylvania and Delaware was presented to the House and read, praying that so much of the existing revenue laws of the United States as imposes a duty on imported rags used in the manufacture of paper, may be repealed; and also, that the present duty on foreign paper imported into the United States, may remain. Laid on the table.

On a motion made and seconded that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Commissioners for purchasing the Public Debt be directed to lay before this House a statement of all their proceedings not heretofore furnished:—"

A motion was made, and the question being put, to amend the said original motion, by inserting, after the word "House," the words, "their resolves as Commissioners, approved by the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, together with:—" it passed in the negative—yeas 30, nays 31, as follows:

Mr. SEDGWICK, from the Managers appointed on the part of this House to attend the conference with the Senate on the subject-matter of the amendments depending between the two Houses, to the bill, entitled "An act to regulate the claims to Invalid Pensions," made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, stating that it had been agreed on the part of the United States, that a treaty or conference shall be held at the ensuing season with the hostile Indians Northwest of the Ohio, in order to remove, if possible, all causes of difference, and to establish a solid peace with them; and that, as the estimates heretofore presented to the House for the current year did not contemplate this object, it would be proper that an express provision be made by law, as well for the general expenses of the treaty, as to establish the compensation to be allowed the Commissioners who shall be appointed for the purpose; and that he would direct the Secretary of War to lay before the House an estimate of the expenses which may probably attend this measure.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of War, accompanying the estimate referred to in the foregoing Message; which, together with the said Message, was read, and ordered to be committed to Mr. BOUDINOT, Mr. WHITE, and Mr. WADSWORTH, with instruction to report thereon by way of bill or bills.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate recede from some, and insist on others of their amendments, disagreed to by this House, to the bill, entitled "An act to regulate the claims to Invalid Pensions;" the Senate have also passed the bill entitled "An act to authorize the Comptroller of the Treasury to settle the account of Thomas Wishart, late a Lieutenant in the Army of the United States," with an amendment; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the amendment, and, the same being read, was agreed to.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanied with sundry statements and reports, containing a further answer to the resolutions of this House, of the twenty-third of January last; which were ordered to lie on the table.

WEDNESDAY, February 20.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of the House.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act in addition to an act, entitled 'An act to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States,'" together with the amendments agreed to on Monday last, was read the third time and passed.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee on the petitions of the French inhabitants of Gallipolis, in the territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio; whereupon,

Resolved, That there be granted to the said petitioners thirty thousand acres of land, to be divided among them in quantities proportioned to their late purchases of the Scioto Company; and that the further quantity of twenty thousand acres be divided equally among such of the said petitioners as are actual settlers of the said territory.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution, and that Mr. WADSWORTH, Mr. SEDGWICK, Mr. FINDLEY, Mr. WHITE, and Mr. BARNWELL, do prepare and bring in the same.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill fixing the time for the next annual meeting of Congress, and that Mr. MUHLENBERG, Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, and Mr. SEDGWICK, be the said committee.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee on the petition of James Warrington, attorney in fact of Joseph Blachford, surviving partner of Harris & Blachford; whereupon,

Resolved, That the Accounting Officers of the Treasury cause the sum of nine thousand seven hundred and sixty-eight dollars and ninety cents, charged to John Banks on the thirty-first day of December, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-three, to be credited to the said John Banks, and that the sum so credited be charged to the account of such other person as in their opinion shall be justly chargeable therewith.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution, and that Mr. GILES, Mr. LIVERMORE, and Mr. FITZSIMONS, do prepare and bring in the same.

The House proceeded to reconsider the amendments depending between the two Houses on the bill, entitled "An act to regulate the claims to Invalid Pensions," together with the report of the Committee of Conference on the subject-matter of the said amendments; whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth adhere to its disagreement to the amendment insisted on by the Senate to the fourth section of the said bill.

Resolved, That this House doth recede from its disagreement to the amendment insisted on by the Senate to the fifth section of the said bill.

THURSDAY, February 21.

Mr. BOUDINOT, from the committee appointed, presented a bill making an appropriation to defray the expense of a treaty with the Indians Northwest of the river Ohio; which was received, read twice, and committed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of War, accompanying his report on the petitions of Rawleigh P. Downman and Oliver Towles; and the same being read, Ordered, That so much of the said report as relates to the petition of Rawleigh P. Downman be referred to Mr. PARKER, Mr. SUMPTER, and Mr. WARD; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Ordered, That so much of the said report as relates to the petition of Oliver Towles do lie on the table.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill for the following purposes: To regulate the mode of taking bail in certain cases; to regulate the recovery of costs against informers or relators, in certain cases; to point out the mode in which suits for penalties under the revenue laws of the United States shall commence; to extend executions on transcripts of judgments from one district to another, and to regulate the costs and fees in cases of the commitment of witnesses; and that Mr. MURRAY, Mr. BOUDINOT, and Mr. JEREMIAH SMITH, be the said committee.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of State, communicating certain reasons for delaying his Report on the nature and extent of the privileges and restrictions of the commercial intercourse of the United States with foreign nations, as directed by the order of the House of the twenty-third February, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, and suggesting that he is now ready to report on that subject, if the House shall be pleased to direct him so to do.

Ordered, That the said Letter be referred to Mr. GILLES, Mr. LAURANCE, Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, Mr. BALDWIN, and Mr. BENJAMIN BOURNE; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon to the House.

A memorial of Eli Elmer, late a Captain Lieutenant of Artillery in the Army of the United States, was presented to the House and read, praying the liquidation and settlement of a claim for depreciation of pay, supplies of clothing, and other stores, due to him for military services rendered during the late war.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to the Secretary of War, with instruction to examine the same, and report his opinion thereupon to the House.

Mr. GILLES, from the committee appointed, presented a bill directing the officers of the Treasury to pass to the credit of John Banks the sum of nine thousand seven hundred and sixty-eight dollars and ninety cents; which was received, twice read, and committed.

SETTLEMENT OF STATE ACCOUNTS.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill received from the Senate, entitled "An act in addition to and for amending the act, for extending the time limited for settling the accounts between the United States and the individual States.

A motion was made to strike out the first section of the bill. This section goes to repeal the second section of the former act, which makes the State of Vermont a party to the accounts between the United States and individual States. In support of the motion it was said that Vermont, participating in all the advantages of the independence of the country, and, being a member of the Union, is justly chargeable with its quota of all the expenses that have been incurred; that as, on the one hand, were she a creditor State, she doubtless would come in for her proportion of the balances which shall appear to be due from the United States to the creditor States; so on the other, if she is a debtor State, it is but reasonable that she should be liable to pay her proportion of those balances; a contrary principle, it was said, will increase the burdens of other States. It was further said, that in all the great questions relative to the finances and accounts of the United States, the voice of Vermont has had its proportional influence; and she is therefore on every principle to be considered as a constituent part of the Union, and liable to all the disadvantages resulting from the connexion.

In opposition to the motion, it was said that Vermont, as a Government, bore her proportion of the expenses and sacrifices of the war. She was a frontier State, and the only barrier between the United States and Canada. Her exertions during the war were made by her citizens alone, without assistance from the other States. That, in consequence of the peculiar confusion which prevailed in that State, the accounts of her services and supplies were left in a very deranged situation. That though the former act allowed twelve months for her to bring in her claims, yet it is said the other States have had a much longer time. That, though it should be concluded that Vermont ought to be considered as a part of the Confederacy prior to her adoption of the Federal Constitution, the time certainly ought to be extended for her to bring in her accounts. But it was urged that she could not be so considered; and therefore is not a party to the accounts, prior to that period. Since she came into the Union under the new Constitution, she has borne, and will continue to bear her proportion of the burdens of the United States, and will be obliged to pay her proportion of the balances which shall be found due from the Union. In answer to the reasoning from her being represented on the floor of Congress, it was said that the Representatives of that State are Representatives of the Union; they act in a Legislative capacity, and not as a committee of accounts.

The motion for striking out the first section was negatived. Some further amendments were moved, but disagreed to. The bill was reported without amendment. In the House, Mr. W. SMITH renewed the motion for striking out the first section, and called for the yeas and nays, which were—yeas 17, nays 39, as follows:

Ordered, That the said bill be read the third time to-morrow.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill for exempting from impost duties useful beasts imported for breed.

The bill being read, it was moved to add after the words "for breed," or on rags.

Mr. LIVERMORE objected to this motion. He observed that the object of the bill is to encourage the importation of stallions, bulls, and boars, for the purpose of improving the breed of useful animals. These, he said, ought to stand alone; he thought it would be a very odd association to connect them with rags. Besides, said he, I do not conceive there is any necessity for bringing in the article, for when the rage of calling for information is abated, there will be such a diminution of the business of printing, that he doubted not a sufficient quantity of rags might be obtained in the country by the paper-makers.

Other objections were made by several members, and the motion being put, was lost. The bill was then reported without amendment. Some verbal amendments were made in the House. The bill was then ordered to be engrossed.

FRIDAY, February 22.

A memorial of Arthur St. Clair, Governor of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, was presented to the House and read, stating that, in the execution of certain duties, and the performance of sundry services, prescribed by the late Congress, the memorialist made disbursements, and contracted debts, which considerably exceeded the funds placed in his hands, and praying that the officers of the Treasury may be empowered to adjust his accounts, and pay whatever balance may be found due to him.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. THATCHER, and Mr. HINDMAN; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

A memorial of John Ross, of the city of Philadelphia, merchant, was presented to the House and read, praying that a claim for a balance due to the memorialist by the United States, for sundry purchases of merchandise in Europe, on commission, and for which he rendered an account to the late Congress, in the month of January, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-three, may be considered and decided on.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to Mr. GERRY, Mr. HUGER, and Mr. TUCKER; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

A memorial of Hugh Hughes, of the State of New York, was presented to the House and read, praying the liquidation and settlement of a claim for services as Commissary of Military Stores, and Assistant Quartermaster General in the Army of the United States, during the late war.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, with instruction to examine the same, and report his opinion thereupon to the House.

A memorial of the Society "for promoting the Abolition of Slavery, for the relief of persons unlawfully held in bondage, and for improving the condition of the African race," in the States of Rhode Island and Massachusetts, was presented to the House, and read, praying the attention of Congress to the subject of their memorial, presented the eighth of December, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, relative to the slave trade.

Also, a petition of Elizabeth Fish, late relict and widow of Lieutenant Colonel George Derrance, of the county of Luzerne, in the State of Pennsylvania, deceased, praying relief in consideration of the loss of her late husband, who was killed in an engagement with a detachment of British troops and Indians, whilst in the militia service; as also, that she may be reimbursed for the loss of property belonging to the deceased, which was plundered or destroyed by the said detachment, in the year one thousand seven hundred and seventy-eight.

Also, a petition of Patrick Jack, of Franklin county, in the State of Pennsylvania, praying that the title to a tract of land of fifteen miles square, on the south side of the Tennessee river, granted to the petitioner, by the late Province of North Carolina, the seventh of May, one thousand seven hundred and sixty-two, and which has since been ceded to the Cherokee Indians, by the United States, at a late treaty, may be restored to him, and himself and his friends permitted to settle thereon, with the consent of the said Indians.

Also, a petition of sundry inhabitants of Nine Mile and Baker's Creek, on the frontiers of the Territory of the United States south of the river Ohio, to the like effect.

Also, a memorial of John Parker, of the city of Philadelphia, praying that such alterations may be made in the act establishing the Post Office, as to place the transmission of monthly publications on the same footing with newspapers published within the United States.

Ordered, That the said memorials and petitions do lie on the table.

Mr. MUHLENBERG, from the committee appointed, presented a bill fixing the time for the next annual meeting of Congress; which was received, twice read, and committed.

Mr. MURRAY, from the committee appointed, presented a bill concerning bail, process, and costs, in the Courts of the United States; which was received, twice read, and committed.

Mr. GOODHUE, from the committee to whom was committed the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act to provide more effectually for the collection of the duties imposed by law on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels,'" reported an amendment thereto; which was read, and, together with the said bill, ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

A motion was made and seconded that the House do now adjourn for half an hour.

On which motion, the yeas and nays being demanded by one-fifth of the members present, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 42, nays 18.

One o'clock, P. M.

The House met, according to adjournment.

Mr. WADSWORTH, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to authorize a grant of land to the French inhabitants of Gallipolis; which was received, twice read, and committed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying a further statement in answer to the late resolutions of this House; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Appropriation Bill for the year 1793 was taken up, with some amendments of the Senate, one of which was, that in the bill sent to the Senate, the House of Representatives had specified all the items of each sum granted to the support of the War Department; but the Senate's amendment condenses the whole into one aggregate sum. This occasioned some debate; and it was observed that, by thus making one sweeping grant, the particular items are kept out of view, so as to render any future inquiries into the application of the public money extremely difficult, and leaves too much discretionary power in the hands of the Head of the Department; for, although it would be expected that he should apply the money to each particular object of the many expressed in the estimate by him furnished, yet, if they were not also specified in the law, he would not be obligated to pursue this conduct; in fact, he might apply the whole to a few of the objects, perhaps to only one, and leave all the others unsupported. Indeed, it must be granted that there are discretionary powers which ought to be allowed, such as respect particular contingencies, &c., but this should never be permitted to extend to such an extravagant degree as the Senate's amendments would authorize. Several members spoke on the occasion; and it was argued that the items had been already examined and discussed in the House, and that, as the total was not altered by the Senate, there could not be any danger in concurring with the amendments. On the other hand, it was objected that, as there was an expectation of peace with the Indians, and that therefore the recruiting service would be arrested, all these hopes of the public might be frustrated, in case the recruiting service was continued, and larger sums might be applied to it than would be proper, unless the law should expressly limit it. And there was no limitation of specific sums mentioned in the Senate's amendment but the sweeping total of nine hundred and sixty-three thousand dollars, and thirty thousand dollars for contingencies—nearly a round million. It was again urged by those who wished the House to concur with the Senate that a discretionary power lodged in the hands of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES would be a sufficient check; and it was therefore suggested that a committee of conference be appointed between the two Houses, to introduce a clause in the law for this purpose. A discretionary power must be lodged somewhere to meet contingencies; for instance, it may be found expedient to mount the militia, or to vary the mode of carrying on the war, and therefore in some cases to apply the money, specifically appropriated for some of the objects which might upon trial be discovered unnecessary, to other objects of real utility. The debate was continued for a considerable time; and at length the question for concurring was negatived.

The question was then taken, that the House do agree to the said amendment, and passed in the negative—yeas 30, nays 31, as follows:

An amendment to the section which authorizes the President to make a Loan to the amount of $800,000, was arrested by an objection to the section itself, which had already passed the two Houses. Without deciding on this amendment, the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, February 23.

An engrossed bill to repeal the several impost laws of the United States, so far as they may be deemed to impose a duty on useful beasts imported for breed, and for remitting the duties heretofore accrued on such importations, in the cases where they have only been secured to be paid, was read the third time and passed.

An engrossed bill, fixing the time for the next annual meeting of Congress, was read the third time and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act to provide for the widows and orphans of certain persons who were killed by Indians, under the sanction of flags of truce," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act in addition to and alteration of an act, entitled 'An act to extend the time limited for settling the accounts of the United States with the individual States,'" was read the third time.

The passage of the bill was warmly opposed. The opposition arose from the idea that if the State of Vermont is not considered as a party in the settlement of the accounts between the United States and the individual States, as contemplated by the bill, it will operate to the injury of the other States. A motion for recommitting the bill was made and negatived.

And, on the question that the same do pass, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 39, nays 17, as follows:

APPROPRIATION BILL.

The consideration of the amendments proposed by the Senate to the Appropriation Bill was resumed by the House. The amendment to the section authorizing a Loan, in anticipation of the funds, was further debated. Their amendment goes to vest a discretionary power in the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES to pay off the Debt due to the Bank of the United States, in instalments not exceeding fifty thousand dollars, having respect to the public exigencies and the state of the Treasury. The discretionary power hereby proposed to be invested was opposed, as not being properly limited, as the provision for paying off the debt in question was irrelative to the proper idea of an appropriation bill, and as the Legislature ought not to delegate this discretion. It was further opposed, as making an arrangement to pay a debt to a public body before it was due, in preference to paying individuals whose demands are already due. In opposition to this reasoning, it was said that the amendment contemplates a provision in a case which has been the subject of complaint to those who now oppose it; and that is, it vests a power in the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES to employ, from time to time, the revenues in the Treasury which may not be especially appropriated for other purposes, to pay off its debts; so that the revenues may not at any time lie useless. That the public moneys should lie dormant and useless in the Treasury (which it was denied has ever been the case) has been a subject of declamation; and now that an unexceptionable expedient is proposed to guard against such a contingency as a surplus revenue would present, the opposition is continued from the same quarter. After a long debate, the question on concurring with the Senate was determined in the affirmative—yeas 34, nays 25, as follows:

YEAS.—Fisher Ames, Robert Barnwell, Egbert Benson, Elias Boudinot, Shearjashub Bourne, Benjamin Bourne, Abraham Clark, Elbridge Gerry, Nicholas Gilman, Benjamin Goodhue, James Gordon, Christopher Greenup, Thomas Hartley, James Hillhouse, William Hindman, Daniel Huger, Philip Key, Aaron Kitchell, John Laurance, Amasa Learned, George Leonard, Samuel Livermore, Nathaniel Niles, Theodore Sedgwick, Peter Sylvester, Jeremiah Smith, William Smith, John Steele, Samuel Sterrett, Jonathan Sturges, George Thatcher, Jeremiah Wadsworth, Artemas Ward, and Hugh Williamson.

Proceedings.

MONDAY, February 25.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to provide for the widows and orphans of certain persons who were killed by Indians, under the sanction of flags of truce;" and, the same being read, were agreed to.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act to provide more effectually for the collection of the duties imposed by law on goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels;" and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

On motion, the said bill, together with the amendments thereto, was then read the third time and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate recede from their amendment, to a disagreement to which this House have adhered, to the fourth section of the bill, entitled "An act to regulate the claims to Invalid Pensions." The Senate also recede from their fifth amendment, disagreed to by this House, to the first section of the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three."

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act for repealing the several impost laws of the United States, so far as they may be deemed to impose a duty on useful beasts imported for breed, and for remitting the duties which have heretofore accrued on such importations, in the cases where they have only been secured to be paid," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the said amendments, and, the same being read, were agreed to.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Commissioners for purchasing the Public Debt, accompanying a report and statement of all their proceedings, not heretofore furnished, made pursuant to the resolution of the nineteenth instant; which were read, and laid on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill making an appropriation to defray the expense of a treaty with the Indians Northwest of the Ohio; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made an amendment thereto.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, do lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act for altering the places of holding the Circuit Courts in the districts of Vermont and North Carolina, and for other purposes;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The said bill was read twice and committed.

Mr. GILES, from the committee to whom was referred the Letter of the Secretary of State of the twentieth instant, communicating certain reasons for delaying his report on the nature and extent of the privileges and restrictions of the commercial intercourse of the United States with foreign nations, directed by order of the House of the twenty-third of February, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, reported that it is not expedient to call for the said report during the present session of Congress;" which report was agreed to.

On a motion made and seconded,

Resolved, That the term for receiving on loan that part of the domestic debt of the United States which may not be subscribed prior to the first day of March next, pursuant to the terms proposed in the act, entitled "An act making provision for the Debt of the United States," and also an act, entitled "An act supplementary to the act making provision for the Debt of the United States," be extended on the same terms as is, by the first recited act provided, to the — day of —; and books for receiving such farther subscriptions shall be opened at the Treasury of the United States only, and to continue open until the said — day of —, inclusively.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution, and that Mr. GOODHUE, Mr. GRIFFIN, and Mr. GREGG, do prepare and bring in the same.

TUESDAY, February 26.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to authorize a grant of land to the French inhabitants of Gallipolis; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time tomorrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have agreed to the amendments proposed by this House to the bill, entitled "An act in addition to the act, entitled 'An act to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States,' with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill to provide for the expense of supporting light-houses, not ceded to the United States, and that Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. GRIFFIN, and Mr. TREDWELL, be the said committee.

The House proceeded to consider the amendment, reported yesterday by the Committee of the Whole House, to the bill making an appropriation to defray the expense of a treaty with the Indians Northwest of the Ohio; and, the same being read, was agreed to.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, be engrossed, and read the third time tomorrow.

Proceedings.

[FEBRUARY, 1793-

On a motion made and seconded, that the House do now resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House, to take into consideration the reports of the committee appointed to inquire into the causes of the failure of the expedition under Major General St. Clair, it passed in the negative.

Ordered, That the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the consideration of the said reports.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House. The Senate have also passed the bill, entitled "An act fixing the time for the next annual meeting of Congress," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

WEDNESDAY, February 27.

An engrossed bill to authorize a grant of land to the French inhabitants of Gallipolis, was read the third time and passed.

An engrossed bill, making an appropriation to defray the expense of a treaty with the Indians Northwest of the Ohio, was read the third time and passed.

Mr. GOODHUE, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for extending the time for receiving on Loan that part of the Domestic Debt of the United States which may not be subscribed prior to the first day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three; which was received, read twice, and committed.

Mr. FITZSIMONS, from the committee appointed, presented a bill supplementary to the act for the establishment and support of light-houses, beacons, buoys, and public piers; which was received, read twice, and committed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, stating certain inaccuracies in printing the statements communicated by his first and second Letters, lately presented, on the subject of Foreign Loans, and expressing a wish that some regulation may be adopted to enable the Head of the Treasury Department to secure the fidelity and correctness of the printed copies of the reports which shall hereafter be made to the House, and shall be committed to the press by their order.

Ordered, That the said Letter be referred to Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. SEDGWICK, and Mr. DAYTON; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Mr. GILES, after some pointed animadversions on the Reports of the Secretary of the Treasury, made to the House pursuant to the resolutions which have been passed, read several resolutions relative thereto; which were handed to the Clerk, again read, and laid on the table.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes;" the same was agreed to.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act providing an annual allowance for the education of Hugh Mercer;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the amendments of this House to the bill, entitled "An act in addition to the act, entitled 'An act to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States.'" Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the said amendments proposed by the Senate to the amendments of this House to the said bill, with the following amendment, to wit: In the amendment of the Senate to the first amendment of this House, after the word "absent," insert these words, "or shall have been of counsel, or be concerned in interest in any cause then pending."

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act fixing the time for the next annual meeting of Congress." Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth disagree to the said amendments.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act for altering the places of holding the Circuit Courts in the districts of Vermont and North Carolina, and for other purposes;" and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be recommitted to Mr. LIVERMORE, Mr. SEDGWICK, and Mr. BENJAMIN BOURNE.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill to make further provision for securing and collecting the duties on foreign and domestic distilled spirits, stills, wines, and teas, and that Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. THATCHER, and Mr. TUCKER, do prepare and bring in the same.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act providing an annual allowance for the education of Hugh Mercer," was read the first time; and, opposition being made thereto, the question was put, "Shall the said bill be rejected?" and passed in the negative. Whereupon, the said bill was read the second time, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act to ascertain the fees in Admiralty proceedings in the District Courts of the United States, and for other purposes," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying a supplementary estimate of certain sums for which appropriations are necessary; which were read, and ordered to be referred to Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. MADISON, and Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, with instruction to prepare and bring in a bill or bills pursuant thereto.

Reimbursement of Loan.

[H. OF R.]

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, with a copy of an explanation of an Act of the Legislature of New York, ceding to the United States the jurisdiction of certain lands on Montauk Point, for the purposes mentioned in the said act: And a copy of a Letter from the Governor of New York to the Secretary of State, which accompanied the explanation.

The papers referred to in the said Message were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Treasurer of the United States, accompanying a copy of the official report made by the officers of the Treasury Department, upon his account of the receipts and expenditures of the public moneys, from the 1st of October to the 31st of December, 1792, inclusive; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying an abstract of goods, wares, and merchandise, exported from the United States, from the 1st of October, 1791, to the 30th of September, 1792; also, two returns of impost and tonnage, to the end of the year 1791; which were read, and ordered to be referred to Mr. WILLIAMSON, Mr. BENJAMIN BOURNE, and Mr. STERRETT; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

The House adjourned until 6 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION—6 P. M.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to ascertain the fees in Admiralty proceedings in the District Courts of the United States, and for other purposes;" and the same being read, were agreed to.

REIMBURSEMENT OF LOAN.

The House proceeded to consider the bill providing for a reimbursement of a Loan made of the Bank of the United States, which lay on the table. Whereupon, Ordered, That the said bill be recommitted to a Committee of the Whole House immediately.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the said Committee; and the bill being read, a motion was made to strike out the first section, which authorizes a loan.

Mr. BARNWELL said, as he had been in favor of making the loan of two millions, as contemplated in the section, he thought it due to himself and to the Committee to state the reason which will induce him to agree to the motion for striking out the section. It is, said he, because there is not time during the session to go into such an investigation of the subject as it merited; such an investigation, he was persuaded, would convince every unprejudiced mind that it would be for the interest of the United States to effect the loan.

Mr. MADISON was in favor of striking out the section, setting aside the consideration that the United States are not under obligation to discharge the whole sum of two millions at the present time; he very much doubted the policy of making loans at that amount, when the question Whether any saving could be made thereby? is problematical, considering the rate of interest in Europe. He thought it probable, that, before the time came round when the United States might be obliged to discharge the whole of this debt, money may be obtained on more advantageous terms than at present, if it should be found necessary to borrow.

The section was struck out, nem. con.

Several amendments were made to the next section. The Committee then rose and reported the same. The House adopted the amendments, and Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time tomorrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, on the bill directing the officers of the Treasury to pass to the credit of John Banks the sum of nine thousand seven hundred and sixty-eight dollars and ninety cents; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made an amendment thereto; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, be engrossed, and read the third time tomorrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, on the bill supplementary to the act for the establishment and support of light-houses, beacons, buoys, and public piers; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time tomorrow.

Mr. WILLIAMSON, from the committee to whom were referred the Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying an abstract of the goods, wares, and merchandise, exported from the United States, from the 1st of October, 1791, to the 30th of September, 1792; also, two returns of impost and tonnage, to the end of the year 1791, made a report. Whereupon, Ordered, That one hundred copies of the said abstract and returns be printed for the use of the members of the two Houses.

THURSDAY, February 28.

An engrossed bill directing the officers of the Treasury to pass to the credit of John Banks the sum of nine thousand seven hundred and sixty-eight dollars and ninety cents, was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill providing for the reimbursement of a Loan made of the Bank of the United States, was read the third time, and passed.

cons, buoys, and public piers, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FITZSIMONS, from the committee appointed, presented a bill making further provision for securing and collecting the duties on foreign and domestic distilled spirits, stills, wines, and teas; which was received, twice read, and committed.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill or bills to increase the salaries of the Commissioner of the Revenue, and the Auditor of Accounts, and that Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. BENJAMIN BOURNE, and Mr. MURRAY, be the said committee.

Mr. FITZSIMONS, from the committee appointed, presented a bill making certain appropriations therein mentioned; which was received, twice read, and committed.

Mr. LIVERMORE, from the committee to whom was recommended the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act for altering the places of holding the Circuit Courts in the districts of Vermont and North Carolina, and for other purposes," reported several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House, and said bill was read the third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate have agreed to the amendment proposed by this House to the amendment of the Senate to the first amendment of this House, to the bill, entitled "An act in addition to the act, entitled 'An act to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States.'" The Senate also adhere to their amendments, disagreed to by this House, to the bill, entitled "An act fixing the time for the next annual meeting of Congress."

The House proceeded to reconsider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill last mentioned. Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth insist on their disagreement to the said amendments; that a conference be desired with the Senate, on the subject-matter of the same, and that Mr. LIVERMORE, Mr. MÜHLENBERG, and Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, be appointed managers at the said conference, on the part of this House.

Mr. HILLHOUSE, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to authorize Ephraim Kimberly to locate the land warrant issued to him for services in the late American Army; which was read twice, and committed.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act making an appropriation to defray the expense of a Treaty with the Indians Northwest of the Ohio."

OFFICIAL CONDUCT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

The resolutions brought forward yesterday by Mr. GILES, were called for by that gentleman. The reading being finished, Mr. AMES moved that the resolutions should be taken up.

Mr. MURRAY suggested the necessity of giving a preference to the Judiciary Bill reported by him some days since. He was seconded by Mr. KEY.

The motion for taking up the resolutions was carried, forty members rising in favor of it. The resolutions were accordingly read by the Clerk, and are as follow, viz:

1. Resolved, That it is essential to the due administration of the Government of the United States, that laws making specific appropriations of money should be strictly observed by the administrator of the finances thereof.

2. Resolved, That a violation of a law making appropriations of money, is a violation of that section of the Constitution of the United States which requires that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law.

3. Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury has violated the law passed the 4th of August, 1790, making appropriations of certain moneys authorized to be borrowed by the same law, in the following particulars, viz: First, By applying a certain portion of the principal borrowed to the payment of interest falling due upon that principal, which was not authorized by that or any other law. Secondly, By drawing part of the same moneys into the United States, without the instructions of the President of the United States.

4. Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury has deviated from the instructions given by the President of the United States, in exceeding the authorities for making loans under the acts of the 4th and 12th of August, 1790.

5. Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury has omitted to discharge an essential duty of his office, in failing to give Congress official information in due time, of the moneys drawn by him from Europe into the United States; which drawing commenced December, 1790, and continued till January, 1793; and of the causes of making such drafts.

6. Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury has, without the instructions of the President of the United States, drawn more moneys borrowed in Holland into the United States than the President of the United States was authorized to draw, under the act of the 12th of August, 1790: which act appropriated two millions of dollars only, when borrowed, to the purchase of the Public Debt: And that he has omitted to discharge an essential duty of his office, in failing to give official information to the Commissioners for purchasing the Public Debt, of the various sums drawn from time to time, suggested by him to have been intended for the purchase of the Public Debt.

7. Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury did not consult the public interest in negotiating a Loan with the Bank of the United States, and drawing therefrom four hundred thousand dollars, at five per cent. per annum, when a greater sum of public money was deposited in various banks at the respective periods of making the respective drafts.

8. Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury has been guilty of an indecorum to this House, in undertaking to judge of its motives in calling for information which was demandable of him, from the constitution of his office; and in failing to give all the necessary information within his knowledge, relatively to the subjects of the reference made to him of the 19th January, 1792, and of the 22d November, 1792, during the present session.

9. Resolved, That a copy of the foregoing resolutions be transmitted to the President of the United States.

Mr. GILES then moved that they should be referred to a Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. W. SMITH was decidedly opposed to refer ring those resolutions to the consideration of the Committee of the Whole House, because he neither viewed a discussion of them as necessary on the present occasion nor warranted by the nature of the inquiry into the Secretary's conduct. It was trifling with the precious time of the House to lavish it on abstract propositions, when the object of the inquiry ought to be into the facts. He was satisfied that should the House once involve itself in an investigation of theoretic principles of Government the short residue of the session would be exhausted, and no opportunity remain for examining the charges themselves. Those charges being made, it became the House from a sense of duty to the public and justice to the accused to proceed immediately to consider them. If the mover intended to apply the principles of the two first resolutions to the facts contained in the subsequent ones, it was unquestionably proper first to substantiate the facts, and then establish the principles which were applicable to them; but it was surely a reversal of order to spend much time in establishing principles, when it might happen that the charges themselves would be totally unsupported. He did not like this mode of proceeding, because it might tend to mislead the House; it was sometimes a parliamentary practice to endeavor to lead the mind to vague and uncertain results, by first laying down theorems from which no one could dissent, and then proceeding by imperceptible shades to move unsettled positions, in order ultimately to entrap the House in a vote which in the first instance it would have rejected. This mode of conducting public business, he considered as inconsistent with fair inquiry. The question was, had the Secretary violated a law? If so, let it be shown; every member was competent to decide so plain a question. He could examine the proofs, read the law, and pronounce him guilty or innocent without the aid of these preliminary metaphysical discussions.

If it were urged that the propositions are so plain and obvious that no time would be lost in considering them, he then begged leave to observe that all antecedent discussions of constitutional questions had never failed to occupy a large portion of their time, and that however self-evident the resolutions might at the first glance appear, a more critical attention would satisfy a mind not much given to doubt that they were by no means so conclusive as to be free from objections.

Though the position contained in the first resolution, as a general rule, was not to be denied; yet it must be admitted, that there may be cases of a sufficient urgency to justify a departure from it, and to make it the duty of the Legislature to indemnify an officer; as if an adherence would in particular cases, and under particular circumstances, prove ruinous to the public credit, or prevent the taking measures essential to the public safety, against invasion or insurrection. In cases of that nature, and which cannot be foreseen by the Legislature nor guarded against, a discretionary authority must be deemed to reside in the PRESIDENT, or some other Executive officer, to be exercised for the public good; such exercise instead of being construed into a crime, would always meet the approbation of the National Legislature. If there be any weight in these remarks, it does not then follow as a general rule, that it is essential to the due administration of the Government, that laws making specific appropriations should in all cases whatsoever, and under every public circumstance, be strictly observed. Before the Committee could come to a vote on such a proposition, it would be proper to examine into the exceptions out of the rule, to state all the circumstances which would warrant any departure from it, to whom the exercise of the discretion should be entrusted, and to what extent. Did any member wish at this period to attempt this inquiry? He supposed not. Let every deviation from law be tested by its own merits or demerits.

The second resolution was liable to stronger objections. It might with propriety be questioned whether, as a general rule, the position was well founded. A law making appropriations may be violated in various particulars without infringing the Constitution, which only enjoins that no moneys shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of the appropriations made by law. This is only to say, that every disbursement must be authorized by some appropriation. Where a sum of money is paid out of the Treasury, the payment of which is authorized by law, the Constitution is not violated, yet there may have been a violation of the law in some collateral particulars. There may even have been a shifting of funds, and however exceptionable this may be on other accounts, it would not amount to that species of offence which is created by the Constitution. The Comptroller of the Treasurer must countersign every warrant, and is responsible that it be authorized by a legal appropriation; yet it cannot be supposed that he is to investigate the source of the fund.

One of the alleged infractions stated in the subsequent resolution, namely, the drawing part of the loans into the United States without the instructions of the PRESIDENT, evinces that the opposite construction is not a sound one. For, suppose the fact proved, and suppose it a violation of the law, it certainly would be a very different thing from drawing money out of the Treasury without an appropriation by law, for, in this case, there would be no drawing money from the Treasury at all, the money never having been in the Treasury.

Mr. S. then said, he should also object to referring the last resolution, which is in these words, "Resolved, That a copy of the foregoing resolutions be transmitted to the PRESIDENT."

The object of this resolution went clearly to direct the PRESIDENT to remove the Secretary from office; the foregoing were to determine the guilt, the last to inflict the punishment, and both the one and other without the accused being heard in his defence. When the violation of the Constitution was so uppermost in our minds, it would be indeed astonishing that we should be so hoodwinked as to commit such a palpable violation of it in this instance. The principles of that Constitution, careful of the lives and liberties of the citizens, and what is dearer to every man of honor, his reputation, secure to every individual in every class of society, the precious advantage of being heard before he is condemned.

That Constitution, peculiarly careful of the reputation of great public functionaries, directs that when accused of a breach of duty, the impeachment must be voted by a majority of the House of Representatives, and tried by the Senate, who are to be on oath, and two thirds of whom must concur before a sentence can pass, by which the officer is to be deemed guilty. The officer is to be furnished with a copy of the charge, and is heard by himself or his counsel in vindication of his conduct. Such are the solemnities and guards by which they are protected, and which precede a sentence, the only effect of which is a removal from office. But if the House proceed in the manner contemplated by this resolution; if they first vote the charges, and send a copy of them to the PRESIDENT, as an instruction to him to remove the officer, they will violate the sacred and fundamental principles of this, and every free Government. They will condemn a man unheard, nay, without his having even been furnished with the charges against him; they will condemn to infamy a high and responsible officer convicted by the Representatives of the people, of a violation of the important trusts committed to him, without affording him one opportunity of vindicating his character and justifying his conduct.

Mr. MURRAY said he was opposed to the reference of the resolutions to the Committee of the Whole. He had, as far as the time permitted, examined the several reports on which the examination depended, and was then ready to vote on them, though he confessed, from the intricacy which was inherent in such a subject, as well as from the vast variety of the detail involved, he had not had sufficient time for a complete investigation. Nor did he imagine that any man who had not previously meditated on the subject for a length of time, and made choice of his ground of attack, could say he was completely master of the subject. Some vote, however, was now rendered essential to the character, not only of Government, but of the gentleman who presided over the finances of the country. But three days were left for this inquiry, and to finish a great deal of other business; and he thought that despatch which was usual in the House ought to be used in preference to the indulgence which a Committee afforded. As to the abstract propositions, if it were necessary now to go into them, he thought it would be proper to decide on them first. He thought it most logical to lay down principles of reasoning before facts were developed. Were they agreed to by the House, it would be under provisions and restrictions. They could not have the implicit force of axioms, but at most must be yielded to as wholesome maxims, the application of which must be frequently modified by a certain degree of discretion. With respect to all the other resolutions, he imagined they would, on examination, be found to be unwarranted by facts. He hoped the movers and supporters of the resolutions would not be gratified at so late a season by the House in resolving itself into a Committee of the Whole. The mode in which they were brought forward did not entitle them to much confidence. He said a more unhandsome proceeding he had never seen in Congress. It had been a practice, derived from the lights of common liberty, common right, and the first principles of justice, that whoever was charged with a violation of law on which a punishment ensued, should have some mode of answering to the charge. It had, in a recent instance, been the practice of Congress, when an officer's conduct was even in the first instance inquired into, to afford the officer an opportunity of attending upon the examination on which his offence or his freedom from blame was to appear. He alluded to the conduct of the House when an examination took place relatively to the failure of General St. Clair's expedition. Suspicions were entertained that blame lay somewhere. A committee was appointed to examine. The three officers particularly concerned were, he understood, invited, as it were, to come before the committee, to explain, to interrogate, and to give information. Though the Secretary of War was not permitted to explain on this floor, justice and delicacy, and the most common principles of jurisprudence, to which we attempted to hold some analogy, demanded that he should be heard somewhere, and the committee was renewed for this purpose. The Quartermaster General asked to be heard on this floor. Though refused, he was permitted to attend that committee, on whose examination his character as a Quartermaster depended. Were any man responsible as an officer to this House to fall under the suspicion of its members, a regard to decency and to the established rights of citizenship, would teach gentlemen to inquire formally before they hastily laid a charge on the table, to which they might move the assent of the House. But in this proceeding a Legislative charge was gone into before inquiry had been instituted. Every rule of justice, and all that delicacy which ought ever to attend her progress, had been disregarded, and in the very first instance, a number of charges are brought forward, not for inquiry, but conviction, which, if sanctioned by a majority of the House, are to be followed by the dismissal of one of the highest officers in the Government. This mode was as tyrannical as it was new, and, if any thing could throw a bias against the resolutions, independent of inquiry, it was the partial and unjust form in which the proceeding had commenced. Resolutions of conviction might rise out of the report of a committee of inquiry, who would act as a Grand Jury to the House, but could never precede it. He hoped the House would not refer to a Committee of the Whole what might be decided in the House with more despatch.

Mr. Chairman: The more precious our time, the more readily shall I vote for a consideration of the first resolution; for I think it of more consequence that we should decide on it, than on any other before us. We find, from the inquiry which has been set on foot, into the conduct of the Secretary of the Treasury, that he differs from the mover of the resolution in opinion respecting his powers, and the constitutional obligation he may be under of regarding acts of appropriation; it, therefore, must be the wish of the Secretary himself, whether we agree with him or not; and it is our duty, as soon as possible, I conceive, to let our constituents know whether we approve, or not, of his opinion. The Secretary himself, I think, confesses "that a strict adherence to appropriations, in certain cases, would be pusillanimity." He preferred, no doubt, the public good, which he thought he had in view, to a strict compliance with an act of appropriation. It becomes us, then, to determine whether we wish that the Secretary shall hereafter be bound by our acts of appropriation or not.

I cannot conceive that the rejection of the first resolution can alter the nature of the case before us, or in any manner confirm or invalidate the truth of facts which some gentlemen seem so apprehensive may lead to an impeachment. For my part, I keep in view the first resolution, without thinking a moment of the last, or the intermediate propositions. When they shall come under consideration, I shall be ready to show a proper attention to them. How the first resolution can be called an abstract proposition, I know not—when the nature of the last before us requires a decision on it. The Secretary himself should desire it, and our constituents must expect it. If the Committee of the Whole shall be of opinion that appropriations ought to be sacredly regarded, they will agree to the resolution; if they think they may be dispensed with "in certain cases," they may amend the resolution, and qualify it so as to justify the conduct of the Secretary. To call the resolution a preamble, and to object to it as such, appears to me as extraordinary as to call it an abstract proposition; for I have always thought it inconsistent with Republican principles to object to preambles. I have remarked, sir, when they have been objected to, it became the Representatives of a free people to show on what principles and with what views their laws are enacted, and, not in a dictatorial manner enact that it shall be so and so. The framers of our Constitution have set us an example of an excellent preamble; and, as it has been remarked by several members, this House has occasionally used them; I think, therefore, that none of the objections to the commitment of the first resolution are of sufficient weight to induce the House to agree to the motion for striking out the two first resolutions.

The question was now taken on committing the two first resolutions, and negatived—25 to 32. On the question of referring the last, only fourteen members voted in the affirmative.

Ordered, That the third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth resolutions contained in the said motion be committed to a Committee of the Whole House immediately.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the said Committee; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and had leave to sit again.

The House then adjourned until six o'clock post meridian.

EVENING SESSION—6 P. M.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate agree to the conference desired by this House on the subject-matter of the amendments depending between the two Houses to the bill entitled "An act fixing the time for the next annual meeting of Congress," and have appointed managers at the said conference on their part.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill for extending the time for receiving on loan that part of the Domestic Debt of the United States which may not be subscribed prior to the first day of March, 1793; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported the bill without amendment.

Ordered, That the said bill be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill making certain appropriations therein mentioned; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, do lie on the table.

FRIDAY, March 1.

An engrossed bill for extending the time for receiving on loan that part of the Domestic Debt of the United States which may not be subscribed prior to the first day of March, 1793, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FITZSIMONS, from the committee appointed, presented a bill making addition to the compensation of the Auditor of the Treasury and the Commissioner of the Revenue; which was twice read, and committed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have agreed to the amendments proposed by this House to the bill entitled "An act supplementary to the act entitled 'An act to provide more effectually for the collection of the duties imposed by law on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels,'" with an amendment to the second amendment; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the said amendment to the amendment, and the same being read, was agreed to.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill sent from the Senate entitled "An act providing an annual allowance for the education of Hugh Mercer;" and, after some time spent therein, the bill was reported to the House, read the third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the VICE PRESIDENT having obtained leave of absence, the Senate have proceeded to the choice of a PRESIDENT pro tempore, and JOHN LANGDON has been duly elected.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill entitled "An act providing for the compensation of Ebenezer Storer;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

Mr. FITZSIMONS, from the committee to whom was referred the memorial of Arthur St. Clair, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments reported yesterday by the Committee of the Whole House to the bill making certain appropriations therein mentioned; and the same being read, were agreed to.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time to-day.

OFFICIAL CONDUCT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth resolutions contained in the motion of yesterday, respecting the official conduct of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The third resolution being under consideration, in the words following, viz:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury has violated the law, passed the fourth of August, one thousand seven hundred and ninety, making appropriations of certain moneys authorized to be borrowed by the same law, in the following particulars, to wit:

"1. By applying a certain portion of the principal borrowed to the payment of the interest falling due upon that principal, which was not authorized by that or any other law.

"2. By drawing part of the same moneys into the United States without the instructions of the President of the United States."

Mr. SEDGWICK opened the debate, by calling for the reading of a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury to Mr. Short, of the 1st of September, 1790, showing the objects and general views of the Secretary, relative to the negotiation of the loans under the two acts authorizing them.

Mr. BARNWELL.—Mr. Chairman, before I proceed to discuss the observations which yesterday fell from the gentleman who introduced the resolutions now before us, I cannot refrain from saying that I am extremely happy that, in passing through the medium of that gentleman's examination, this subject has changed its hue from the foul stain of speculation to the milder coloring of an illegal exercise of discretion, and a want of politeness in the Secretary of the Treasury. I feel happy, because I always am so when any man charged with guilt can acquit himself; and the more so now, when a man in a high responsible office, and high in the estimation of his countrymen, can reduce a charge from a quality calculated to have excited an alarm, even in Pandemonium, to such a shape as I fancy will scarce serve to satisfy the uncommon curiosity which it appears to have excited. As I have never been in the habit of taking notes, I shall depend upon memory in answering the gentleman from Virginia; although I imagine, as that gentleman usually sticks very close to his point, whatever it may be, that, in pursuing his charges, I shall substantially answer his arguments. In commenting upon the two first resolutions, to which I am by order confined, I shall consider, in the first instance, what regards the right of drawing money into this country. The gentleman appears not to have considered the law properly, for there cannot be a doubt that the PRESIDENT had a right to make what arrangements he pleased, in order to attain what he might consider a proper modification of the Debt due by the United States abroad. He might have borrowed the money here, or have paid it here; he might have borrowed the money in England, or wherever he thought fit. I will ask the gentleman by what precise authority he borrowed the money in Amsterdam and Antwerp, and paid it in Paris? Certainly by none but that discretion which has been depended upon to modify the Debt in the manner most conducive to the interest of the United States. I take it, then, for granted, Mr. Chairman, that the right of the PRESIDENT to draw the money borrowed here, or to send it anywhere, must be conceded. The question will then arise, whether the Secretary of the Treasury had a right to do this or not, and whether this has not been done without, nay, against the instructions of the PRESIDENT? I really consider this as one of the most extraordinary cases that I have ever known exhibited. Let us consider its form. A highly important trust, of no less import than the discretionary use of fourteen millions of dollars, is placed in the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES; he, by a general commission, and by special instruction, deposes this power to the Secretary of the Treasury, stating that he is to conform to these, and whatever instructions he might from time to time give him. Let any man seriously examine these powers, and I am of opinion that the Secretary, under these, had a right to draw, if he thought proper, unless instructed to the contrary; for the PRESIDENT conveys a complete power to modify the Debt, provided that it should be, with all convenient despatch, applied to pay the principal and interest due to France; for where the payments are to be made are certainly left to the Secretary. If this has not been exercised advantageously, this is another circumstance which the gentleman himself has not questioned. But, says the gentleman, the Secretary, under these instructions, had no special authority to draw; notwithstanding which, he began to draw in 1790, and has continued to draw, at different times, into this country the enormous sum of three millions of dollars, and therefore he must have done this without, nay, against the instructions of the PRESIDENT, who, it is presumed, having delegated this great trust, has never, for three years, inquired into the performance of it. Can this be the inference of common sense? Can this be the inference of the experience which we have had of the PRESIDENT, one of the prominent features of whose character always has been an industry to investigate particulars, as remarkable as his sagacity to frame Generals? If, then, instructions have not been given, or have been exceeded, was it necessary for us to come in aid of the PRESIDENT, he who by our law has the power, which we ourselves cannot exercise, of removing any of the Executive officers at pleasure? It certainly cannot be necessary; for, as this officer continues to act, we must conclude that he has either acted by instructions, or in such manner as to have given satisfaction to his principal without them. Really, Mr. Chairman, I cannot but believe that if suspicion had not led the gentleman from Virginia astray, the usual correctness of his understanding would have prevented him from pursuing such an ignis fatuus as this. Thus, sir, I think I have shown that the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES certainly had the authority to draw the sums borrowed here, and that, both under his commission and his instructions given, and inevitably implied, the Secretary had also the power to do this. I shall therefore now proceed to a more special consideration of the first charge, that the Secretary has violated the law in applying a portion of the principal borrowed to the payment of the interest falling due upon that principal, which was not authorized by law. Before I proceed, Mr. Chairman, I would wish to remark that, whilst I consider no principle in legislation more correct than that money shall be drawn from the Treasury only under appropriations by law, yet I consider both as impracticable and mischievous the doctrine that the money arising from a special tax shall, in no instance, be used for any other than that special purpose for which the tax was imposed, but an opinion that the sums raised ought rather to be considered as an aggregate fund, applicable to aggregate purposes; and, indeed, if a rigid adherence to the precise letter of the law is necessary, there has been no occasion to go abroad to search for violations; for our Government at home has been able to act only by this violation. It is well known that the duties of impost and tonnage are appropriated, first, to produce the sum of six hundred thousand dollars for the civil list, then to pay the interest of the Foreign Debt, and so on; so that, by a rigid observance of this law, the Secretary must have first collected the six hundred thousand dollars into the public coffers, and then a sum sufficient to pay the interest of the Foreign Debt—a process which only requires stating to show its absurdity, and which must nevertheless have been connected with a minute construction of the law. Indeed, Mr. Chairman, if the acts of common life bear any analogy with public management, which I believe, what could be considered as being more extraordinary than that an individual should appropriate the proceeds of one farm to purchase bread, of another drink, and to declare, in the face of contingencies, that, happen what may, he would starve, should the bread crop fail, rather than use the surplus of that appropriated to purchase drink for its purchase. But to return. What is this charge? A sum of money was due abroad for the interest of 1791 and 1792, to be paid out of the domestic revenues of 1791 and 1792; the United States had an offer to make a payment in part of what was due to France, for which money had been borrowed, and was already on hand abroad, in a supply of provisions from here to the Island of St. Domingo. The Secretary, therefore, and doubtless with the consent of the PRESIDENT, instead of transmitting either bills or money from this country to France, in order to pay the interest due there, and bringing the money borrowed to pay the French Debt into this country, in order to furnish supplies for St. Domingo, has committed the great crime of directing the money borrowed, and already upon the spot, to be applied to the payment of the interest due, and has taken the sums applicable to the payments of that interest, which was already here, and made use of it to pay the Debt due to France in the produce of the United States; so that, although, apparently, a portion of the principal borrowed has been applied to pay an interest due, yet in reality its capacity to be thus used arose from its constituting in this country an equivalent sum applicable, and which has been applied to pay off the principal of the French Debt, the object for which the money was borrowed. Let candor investigate this transaction, and sure I am its deductions will be directly the contrary of a charge of criminality. I shall conclude with observing that I should have proceeded to examine the other resolutions, which I consider as weak as those I have made short comments upon, were I not restrained by the Rules of the House. But this I will venture to say, that they will be proved unfounded in their investigation, and will merit the witty observation of a celebrated writer, that "though they rose like a rocket, they will fall like the stick."

Mr. W. SMITH regretted that so important an inquiry had been instituted at the very close of the session, when the members were thronged with business of an indispensable nature, and it was scarcely possible for them to bestow that attention and deliberation which the nature of the subject called for. But, while he expressed this regret, he assured the Committee that it was mingled with much satisfaction, in finding that the vague charges of mismanagement, with which the public had long been alarmed, were at length cast into a shape susceptible of investigation and decision. Previous to an examination of the specific charge then under consideration, he claimed the indulgence of the Committee in offering a few preliminary remarks, which, though they did not bear precisely upon the charge itself, yet were intimately connected with the subject-matter of the inquiry, and were justified by the general remarks of gentlemen who had preceded him.

In recurring back to the origin and progress of this examination, it must appear somewhat surprising that that which, in the commencement of the session, was sounded forth as gross peculation, now turned out to be nothing more than a mere substitution of funds, and that that which was announced as abominable corruption, was dwindled away into a mere drawing of money from Europe into this country, to be applied here according to law.

Whatever credit might be due to the motives which had originated this inquiry, every member would concur in the sentiment, that in a Government constituted like that of the United States, which had nothing but the public confidence for its basis, premature alarms and groundless suspicions respecting the conduct of public officers were pregnant with the most injurious consequences. This opinion was more peculiarly applicable to the important station of Secretary of the Treasury. Intrusted with the management of a large revenue, and necessarily clothed with some latitude of discretion, it was to be expected that he would excite the jealousy of the public vigilance; but as long as he kept in view the injunctions of law, and the public good, his reputation was entitled to that security which is due to every citizen.

An officer, intrusted with the care and distribution of public moneys, is generally looked at with a watchful eye; mankind are too prone to suspect the purity of his conduct; slight insinuations are but too often sufficient to injure him in the public estimation. Such being the natural propensity of things, it doubtless behoved those who wished for tranquility in the country to withhold charges not clearly warranted by proof—to suspend animadversions which were not likely to terminate in conviction. A contrary proceeding had an inevitable tendency unnecessarily to alarm the public mind, to instil into it suspicions against the integrity of men in high stations, to weaken their public confidence in the Government, and to enervate its operations.

There was something remarkable in the nature of the present allegations against the Secretary. Taking them all into view, they presented nothing which involved self-interested, pecuniary considerations; and in this, they essentially differed from accusations against financiers in other countries, to whom motives of interest were generally ascribed as the source of their speculations. To the Secretary, no such motive was imputed; notwithstanding former insinuations against his integrity, the sum of all the charges now amounted to nothing more than arrogance, or an assumption of power, or an exercise of unauthorized discretion.

With respect to discretion, Mr. S. observed that, though in the present inquiry it was not necessary to say much on that topic, being firmly persuaded the Secretary had strictly pursued the injunctions of law, yet, while on the subject, he took occasion to insist that in all Governments a discretionary latitude was implied in Executive officers, where that discretion resulted from the nature of the office, or was in pursuance of general authority delegated by law. This principle was so obvious that it required no illustration; were it contradicted, he would appeal to the conduct of the Secretary of State, who, though directed to report to the House on the commercial intercourse with foreign nations, had, in the exercise of a warrantable discretion, judiciously withheld his Report. He would appeal to the Report of the Committee on the failure of St. Clair's expedition, wherein that failure was in part attributed to the Commanding General's not being invested with a discretion to act according to circumstances.

There was one more observation which he thought proper to premise, before he entered into a discussion of the charges; and that was the disadvantageous situation in which the financier of this country was placed, when compared with that of similar officers in other nations. The Minister of Finance in Great Britain being always a member of the Legislature, and on a footing with other members, was prepared to defend himself when attacked. No charge could be made against his administration which he had not an immediate opportunity of repelling; and the charge and the refutation went out to the world together. The Secretary of the Treasury was, on the contrary, not even permitted to come to the bar and to vindicate himself. Through the imperfect medium of written reports he was compelled, when called upon for information, to answer, as it were by anticipation, charges which were not specific, without knowing precisely against what part of his administration subsequent specific charges would be brought to bear.

If in his reports he was concise, he was censured for suppressing information; if he entered into a vindication of the motives which influenced his conduct, he was then criminated for stuffing his reports with metaphysical reasonings. A gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FINDLEY] had said that the Secretary's reports were so voluminous that he was quite bewildered by them, and that instead of their throwing any light on the subject, he was more in the dark than ever. It was true, the reports were voluminous, but not more so than the imputations on the Secretary's conduct and the orders of the House justified. He did not think that any member, who had attentively perused them, could justly complain of want of information, or of being more in the dark than before; he, on the contrary, believed that so much light had been thrown on the whole of the Secretary's fiscal operations, that if any member could not see, it must be owing to the glare of light being too strong for his eyes. Having made these observations, Mr. S. said he should proceed to examine the first charge, which, after much reflection bestowed on it, appeared to him to contain nothing that was not perfectly authorized by the strict letter of the law.

Mr. S. proceeded next to examine the charge under consideration. It consisted of two items: the first, the application of a certain portion of the principal sum borrowed in Europe to the payment of interest falling due upon that principal, which it was contended was not authorized by any law; the second, the drawing part of the same moneys into the United States, without the instructions of the PRESIDENT.

The first item of this supposed violation of law appeared of so frivolous a nature that it did not merit much discussion; at any rate, it was more an objection of form than of substance. If he comprehended well the purport of the charge, it was nothing more than this—that the Secretary having moneys at his disposal in Europe applicable to the purchase of stock in this country, and having at the same time moneys in this country applicable to the payment of the interest abroad, had substituted the one for the other. He had paid the foreign interest out of the foreign funds and he had purchased stock with the domestic funds. This was the heinous offence with which he was charged, and which was thought sufficient to remove him from office. If the moneys in Europe might have been drawn to this country by bills, for the purchase of the Debt, it might have equally been drawn here, by ordering the application of a sum in Europe, for a purpose which would be represented by an equal sum here, to be applied to the purchase. The substance, not the form, is to decide whether this mode of negotiating the matter was proper. Suppose bills had been ordered to be drawn on the Commissioners, and remitted to them, on account of the foreign interest, would not this have been as regular as to draw them for sale? Did the execution of the law require that the Secretary, having funds in Europe with which the foreign interest might be discharged, should nevertheless remit moneys abroad for that purpose, and then, having funds in this country with which the purchases of the Debt might be made, should draw bills to bring the foreign funds here? Was there any necessity for this complex operation, for the expense of remittance, the probable loss on the sale of bills, the loss of interest while the money was in transitu when the whole matter could be negotiated by the simple and economical mode pursued? So far from this arrangement being a ground of censure, Mr. S. asserted that, had the Secretary pursued the other mode, he would have been animadverted upon with great severity for such an extraordinary course. He would have been accused of ignorance of his duty, and every loss incidental to the transaction would have been charged to his account.

The second division of the charge, being of more magnitude, required a more lengthy discussion. This instance of violation consisted in a supposed deviation from the instructions of the PRESIDENT, or a supposed acting without any instruction whatever. It was, however, begging the question; it was taking for granted that which did not appear, and which ought not to be presumed. And here, Mr. S. observed, the gentlemen on the other side had entirely reversed one of the fundamental maxims of criminal jurisprudence, which declared that innocence should be presumed and guilt proved; whereas they had presumed guilt, and called upon the accused to prove his innocence.

And what was the slender basis on which the presumption was built? Why, say the gentlemen, the instructions from the PRESIDENT to the Secretary, which have been laid before the House, relate only to the payment of the French debt, and convey no authority to draw any of the foreign loan into this country for the purchase of stock; and hence they infer, he had no authority for this latter purpose.

To comprehend the fallacy of the inference, it was only necessary to recur to the laws, and to the PRESIDENT's commission to the Secretary to negotiate the loans. Two acts of Congress had passed; one on the 4th of August, the other on the 12th of August, 1790. The first authorized a loan of twelve millions of dollars, applicable to the payment of the French debt; the other a loan of two millions, applicable to the purchase of the Domestic debt. The PRESIDENT's commission to the Secretary embraced both acts and both objects, and under that commission one loan was negotiated applicable to both objects. True it is, that the PRESIDENT's first instructions were confined to one object, namely, the French debt; but the inference is not that no other instructions were given, and that the Secretary acted without authority; but the very reverse, that the PRESIDENT either left the other object to the general discretion of the Secretary, who was, ex officio, the proper agent and his representative; or that he reserved it for subsequent and occasional instructions.

This inference must be the true one; first, because a contrary supposition would impute to the PRESIDENT an illegal intention, that of applying all the moneys borrowed under both acts to the object of one only; secondly, because the commission extending to the borrowing fourteen millions of dollars, and embracing both objects, and the instructions being confined to twelve millions of dollars, and to only one object, it followed that the other either was left to discretionary management, or to after regulation, for the law enjoined the execution of both.

If presumption, then, was to govern, the more natural presumption was, that the officer acted according to some general discretion reposed in him, or according to instructions from time to time given. These instructions may have been verbal, as well as written. The written instructions given in the first instance were evidently confined to the object of the first act. The necessary conclusion is, that the application of the moneys borrowed under the second act was not meant to be included in that instruction, but was left to be regulated by a general discretion, or by occasional directions, verbal or otherwise.

To presume that the Secretary acted without the sanction of the PRESIDENT was to suppose that the PRESIDENT was totally ignorant of the application of any part of the loan to the purchase of the debt. But there is in the possession of the House abundant testimony of the PRESIDENT's privity and co-operation—

1st. In his Speech to both Houses, in December, 1790, in announcing the loan, he expressly refers to its being made by virtue of both acts, thereby implying clearly that it had reference to the objects of both. He therein likewise refers the House to a further communication from the Secretary on that subject.

2dly. The Secretary, pursuant to that reference, informed the House, in the name and by order of the PRESIDENT, that a part of the loan, to wit: 150,000 florins, was applied in payment to France; another part, to wit: 160,000 florins, to the Dutch debt; and that it was deemed highly advisable to apply the residue to the purchase of the debt, if Congress would remove a doubt as to the terms on which the loan had been negotiated. Congress did remove that doubt by their act of March, 1791. It followed, then, of course, that the residue would be applied according to the intimation given. It was so understood on all hands, and the money being to be invested in this country, it likewise followed of course that it must be drawn here. A contrary conduct would have been censurable. And yet, notwithstanding these facts, though the PRESIDENT had informed the House, as far back as December, 1790, that the loan had been a conjunct loan, under the authority of both acts, and consequently for both objects, though, at the same time, he had referred the House to the Secretary for further information in relation to that loan and its applicability, though the Secretary had, in the name and by order of the PRESIDENT, informed the House, by his Report in February, 1791, that only a part of the money borrowed had been applied to the French and Dutch debt, and that the residue would be applied to the purchase of stock, as soon as Congress removed the doubt; though Congress passed a law expressly to remove that doubt, yet it had been gravely and earnestly contended that the Secretary was not authorized to apply any part of that money to the purchase of stock; that it was done without the sanction of the PRESIDENT; and that Congress, until the late call for information, were totally ignorant of the application of any part of it to that object.

There was, then, the fullest and most satisfactory evidence of the privity and concurrence of the PRESIDENT in confirmation of the evidence resulting from official relation. Between the Chief Magistrate and his immediate agents either a general discretion or instruction must be presumed, because it is presumable he will do his duty, and punish where either a discretion has not been allowed, or instructions have not been given, or where those instructions have been contravened.

The argument on the other side implies in the Chief Magistrate either ignorance or neglect of duty. On the one hand, that he was unacquainted with the transaction; or, on the other, that, being acquainted, he acquiesced in a violation of law, without removing the transgressor. Could it be seriously said—would it not be absurdity to suppose—that an operation of such extent, provided for by law, communicated to both Houses, notorious to all the merchants of Philadelphia and New York, as that of drawing and selling the bills on Europe, was unknown to the PRESIDENT? Must he not have been well acquainted with these transactions, and that without daily frequenting the coffee-house, as some of his friends lately advised him? If the instructions or the intentions of the PRESIDENT had been contravened, would he not have vindicated his own authority by removing the officer? But it had been objected that the bills were drawn previous to the sanction of the Legislature by the confirmatory act of March, 1791. Admit the fact, and there was nothing reprehensible in it. It appears, from the first general instructions to Mr. Short, in August 1790, that the Secretary considered ordinary charges and five per cent. interest as within the meaning of the law. Pursuing this construction, and believing it to be very important to the general operations of the Treasury, he drew for the money, reserving himself as to the final application for an act of the House removing the doubt. The drawing for the money was a mere intermediate step, which amounted neither to a breach, nor to a fulfilment of the law, which was wholly silent on that point. The application was the criterion whether the law had been fulfilled or not. If the Legislature had not removed the doubt, the money would have been remitted back for the foreign object, and, from the relative price of public and private bills, without loss, probably with advantage. It was prudent, in the mean time, to place it where it was likely to be most useful. This was done. It was indeed remarkable that all the points now raised as objections were made known in the report, before alluded to, of February, 1791, as things done or intended. No objection was then made or dreamed of.

It has been asked, Why have the instructions not been produced, if any existed? The call had been only for copies of authorities; the instructions may have been verbal. The Secretary, in his Report on Loans, informed the House "that, besides the first general instructions, the trust reposed in him was to be regulated by subsequent and occasional directions." A motive very honorable to him might be assigned for his not bringing forward the PRESIDENT's instructions as a cover. Relying that the province of the House was to examine into the effects of measures, their conformity to law and the public good, and that the necessary Executive instructions were to be presumed, the Secretary had evidently chosen to implicate the PRESIDENT as little as possible.

The order requested the PRESIDENT to lay before the House copies of the authorities directing the application of the moneys borrowed. It was evident that the PRESIDENT construed this order into a call, not for the instructions from him to the Secretary, but for the instructions from the Secretary to his agents; because, in the report made in pursuance of that order, the Secretary presents, by order of the PRESIDENT, his own letters to Messrs. Short, Willink, and Van Staphorst, as the authorities to apply the proceeds of the loans. It followed, therefore, that the paper relied on was not intended to be given as the only instruction respecting the application of the loan. The inference from it was consequently erroneous. The PRESIDENT could never conceive that the House meant to call for his private instructions from time to time imparted to his immediate agent under the words of the resolution. That link must have been presumed. He therefore directed a transmission of the authorities from the Secretary to his agents.

But what has the want or breach of instructions to do with the breach of the law? Suppose no instructions given, or the instructions not pursued, and yet suppose the law to have been completely

MARCH, 1793.]

Debate on Mr. Giles's Resolutions.

pursued, could it be said there was any breach of law? Or suppose instructions given and strictly pursued, and the law to have been departed from, would the adherence to instructions have justified that departure? Either what was done was nugatory, or it would have been agreeable to law. To affirm the contrary, would be to confound two things perfectly distinct—instructions and laws.

The resolution imports that the Secretary has violated the law of the 4th of August, 1790, by not pursuing the instructions of the PRESIDENT. That law is silent as to instructions. It does not require that the PRESIDENT shall give instructions to the Secretary; nor does it require that the Secretary shall be alone guided by the instructions of the PRESIDENT. It only directs the PRESIDENT to cause a certain sum to be borrowed, and leaves it to him to cause a proper application to be made of the proceeds. The drawing money into this country, with or without authority, to apply it to the purchase of the debt, cannot be deemed a violation of the law of the 4th of August, for it was not loaned under the authority of that act alone, but under the joint authority of the two acts. If any thing is meant by the resolution, it ought to mention both the acts.

To go further, Mr. S. insisted that the Secretary had, virtute officii, a legal authority to apply the moneys when borrowed, according to law, without instructions. The loans might have been made in the United States as well as abroad. Suppose them obtained of the Bank of Boston, would it have been criminal for the Secretary, without instructions, to have drawn the money to the places where it would be most advantageously invested? Suppose the loan obtained of the Bank of the United States, would it have been deemed irregular to have, without instructions, issued a warrant to place them in the Treasury? Why was it more irregular or more criminal to draw them from abroad as a preliminary step?

The moment the foreign loans were negotiated, and the moneys paid into the hands of the Secretary's agents abroad, from that moment they became as much under his control and superintendence, subject to legal appropriation, as any moneys in the Treasury. It was not necessary, to establish this position, that the subject of foreign loans should have been specially mentioned in the constitution of the Treasury Department. Many things resulted collaterally from the general structure of an institution which were not expressed in it.

He did not, however, intend that the doctrine here advanced should touch the question as to what official propriety might have required between the Chief Magistrate and the Secretary. It was the point of legality only which he meant to examine. In all Executive functions relating to the finances, the Secretary must be considered as the agent of the PRESIDENT, and the Legislature must take it for granted, where the contrary is not manifest, that the relation has been properly attended to. Justice to both characters dictated the presumption.

It clearly resulted from these remarks—

1st. That there was no ground to infer either want of instruction, or breach of instruction; but directly the reverse.

2dly. It as clearly resulted, that, if there was, it would not follow that there had been a violation of law.

Having gone through this resolution, Mr. S. observed, that, if there was as little of criminality in the subsequent charges as in that which he had just discussed—and from an attentive examination he sincerely believed it—he was satisfied that, notwithstanding all the severe animadversions within, and all the virulent calumny without, the walls of Congress, the conduct of the Secretary would come forth chaste and unblemished. Instead of anything being detected which would disgrace Pandemonium, nothing could be chargeable to him which would sully the purest angel in Heaven. Whatever difference of opinion might exist as to the wisdom and benefit of his measures, he was confident in saying, that in every thing the Secretary had done, he had been guided by principles honorable and patriotic, and he trusted that a very great majority of the Committee would, by their votes, evince the same sentiment. The sword of justice, it was said, ought at times to be taken from its scabbard to keep great public functionaries within the pale of the law; but it should be remembered that if Justice had its sword to punish the guilty, it had likewise its shield to protect the innocent. If the Secretary had committed a wanton violation of law, let the sword be drawn forth for his punishment; but if he has pursued the dictates of an enlightened patriotism, the Committee were called upon to raise the shield for the defence of a faithful officer.

Mr. FINDLEY addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Chairman: Being strongly impressed with the importance of our time, which is now so near an end, though I had the honor of seconding the resolutions, I took no part in the debates of yesterday; nor will I now detain you with replies to many of the arguments which have been offered against the resolution now under discussion.

Upon one argument frequently introduced by the gentleman last up, viz: the greatness of the Secretary's character, &c., I will only make a single remark. There is no character officially known in Executive Departments of this Government, who merits pre-eminence, or to whom a degree of greatness can be ascribed, but in proportion to his prompt execution of the laws, and the attention with which he discharges the duties of his office. From this rule, the PRESIDENT himself is not exempted, much less a subordinate Secretary, whose appointment is during pleasure, and the duties assigned him of a changeable and temporary nature. But to come to the resolution before us. The first questions that offer themselves, are: Was the money in question appropriated to special and distinct purposes? Did the Secretary of the Treasury apply the money to other uses than the law directed?

In answer to the first, it is only necessary to advert to the law authorizing the loans. The law authorizing the twelve million loan, appropriates whatever amount may be borrowed solely to the payment of debts then due to France and Holland. The law authorizing the two million loan directs the application thereof to the redemption of the Domestic Debt, in aid of about — dollars, arising from the revenues previous to the 1st of January, —. These appropriations are precise, distinct, and unconditional. With respect to the uses, no room was left for the exercise of discretion. The will of the Legislature was express and clearly defined; it left no room for evasion, nor any excuse for mistake; nor did the PRESIDENT transfer to the Secretary any other authority or instructions than what the law expressed.

Official conduct of the Secretary of the Treasury.

But the gentleman from South Carolina says, that the presumption is, that the PRESIDENT did give other instructions than he has communicated; that, in this case, presumption should be admitted as conclusive testimony, and that neither the Secretary nor the PRESIDENT is obliged to communicate the instructions or authority to us. The gentleman is a lawyer: I will appeal to himself; I will appeal to all the professional members on the floor, whether presumptions can be admitted as proof, where, in the nature of the case, positive testimony can be procured. Surely, in Courts of Justice, positive testimony is always required, and presumptive is rarely admitted; but in this case, the presumptive is by the gentleman set in opposition to the positive. However, this is not the case in fact. The PRESIDENT did give commission and instructions, and those are fully communicated to us. If he conceived we had no right to demand them, he would have told us so; if he had kept any part of them back, he would have informed us, and assigned his reasons for doing so. I presume that the PRESIDENT has acted the part of a candid, honest man; the gentleman presumes the reverse. The suggestion that this House, which has the exclusive right of originating the appropriation of money, has no right to be informed of the application of it, is so novel and extraordinary, so inconsistent with every idea of propriety and good Government, that it requires no reply.

Did the Secretary apply the money borrowed in Europe agreeably to the legal appropriations and the instructions of the PRESIDENT? No, he did not; though some of the gentlemen do not acknowledge this, yet the Secretary has clearly acknowledged it himself, and has filled his Reports with labored and ingenious apologies for so doing. He has suggested a variety of motives, and taken infinite pains to charm us with the mighty public advantages resulting from his doing so. He acknowledges combining the loans, and directing the application of them, in the very offset, in a way contrary to law; he acknowledges having drawn to this country, and applied in Europe, to uses for which other moneys were appropriated, near $3,000,000. Out of this he has paid upwards of $400,000 of the French debt, to St. Domingo. I do not complain of paying the interest due in Europe out of the money drawn here. The gentlemen apply the force of their arguments, with great attention, to support or apologize for this part of the Secretary's conduct, as if against this only the charge in the resolution lay. But we do not object to applying that money in Holland, which ought to have been brought here, if the money which, according to the appropriation, should have gone to Holland, had been put to the use here for which the other was intended. A simple exchange of money for the purposes of conveniency or economy, is properly one of those cases to which Ministerial discretion may safely be extended; but the question before us is, the money has not been replaced. The amount of money has not been applied to the uses intended; consequently, the appropriation has been disregarded. It is acknowledged that though there were upwards of $1,300,000 of the Domestic Sinking Fund, and upwards of $2,800,000 drawn from Europe, besides the moneys applied to the relief of St. Domingo; and yet, when these inquiries began, there was not $1,000,000 applied to the redemption of the Public Debt, and even yet the whole of the domestic appropriation has not been applied to the Sinking Fund, notwithstanding that the Public Debt is now, and has for some time been under par. We have it on record that the Secretary never informed the Commissioners of the drafts he made on Europe, although the fund was exclusively to be at their disposal.

However, I will not detain the Committee with minute calculations. They are not necessary; the Secretary has acknowledged that he drew more money from Europe than the law authorized him to do; that he was influenced to do so by motives not contemplated in the law, and had either applied it, or drew it from Europe with the design of applying it to uses not authorized, and that he has broken in upon the fund appropriated to the discharge of the French debt.

Indeed, the delay of information, the receiving it by piecemeal, the abundance of reasoning and apologies, when only simple and plain statements were required, renders a scrutiny of all his calculations a work of time and labor. Therefore, I have contented myself with the facts which the Secretary acknowledges and vindicates on the questionable ground of policy. It remains to be inquired, had the Secretary a right to depart from the directions of the law in the execution of it? Could he, without a violation of the law, divert the money from its appropriate uses, to purposes foreign to the intention of the Legislature? He certainly could not.

The application of appropriations is the most sacred and important trust the Legislature can confer. If they may be made to bend to the will or projecting policy of a Financier, there is an end of all security and confidence. When the Legislature makes an appropriation of a general fund to a variety of uses, as has been done with respect to the impost, tonnage, excise, &c., there is necessarily a considerable degree of discretion left with the Executive, as far as respects preference to one or the other of the appropriate uses. But where the money is appropriated solely to a special purpose, as in the case of the loans, he who executes the law has no degree of power over the appropriation. There is ample room for discretion in many material circumstances respecting them, such as the terms of contract, the time of drawing, the agents employed, &c., but to assume or exercise the power of changing the appropriation is assuming a power to repeal the law itself in its most essential authority; it is assuming that power of dispensing with the laws which produced the late revolution in Britain. If the will of the Minister may control and give another direction to the will of the Legislature, the Sovereign Legislative authority is transferred from the Representative of the people to the temporary Minister. If we admit that the Ministerial agent is not responsible for his conduct, nor subject to censure, because he is appointed, and in this instance authorized by the PRESIDENT we will introduce the long-exploded doctrine of Charles I. of Britain, which brought ruin on the King and the Government. However, there is an essential difference, for in the case before us, the authority and instructions given by the PRESIDENT were agreeably to the law, but the conduct of the Minister was contrary to both. If, as I have said, the application of money to its appropriated uses, is the most sacred and important trust which the Legislature can confer; if the person who can apply the money to what use he pleases, may, by that means, command all the influence and all the force of the Government, I conclude that betraying the important trust partakes of the nature of treason.

Debate on Mr. Giles's Resolutions.

The question before us is, not whether the Secretary has applied the money to a good or to a bad use? Whether he has, by departing from the legal appropriation, supported public credit better, or made a more convenient accommodation to what he or his friend may suppose to be the national interests. Neither the Constitution nor the laws have constituted him the judge of the national interests, nor submitted it to his wisdom to prescribe the degree of public credit which the nation ought to possess. The public credit and other national interests ought to be no other than the Legislature wills them to be, and ought only to be supported by the means, and in the manner thereby prescribed. This is the voice of the Constitution, the voice of the law, and the voice of reason. The PRESIDENT and both branches of the Legislature being the real, as well as the legal Representatives of the people, it is reasonable that they should be the sole judges of their interests. When this House repeatedly called for information from the Secretary, they did not call for political essays nor labored apologies; they did not constitute him the judge for, nor the instructor of the Legislature; they cared nothing about his variety of motives, nor his extensive and self-important plans. These he might have referred to embellish a system of finance, when he would again be called upon to report one to the House. They only required an account of his stewardship. It was time enough to make apologies when he was blamed; prefacing his statements with apologies, and being irritated at inquiries, and artfully evading so many calls for information, discovered a consciousness of blame.

However, I will admit that an Executive officer, pressed by some urgent and unexpected necessity, may be induced to depart from the authorized path of duty, and have great merit in so doing. This may be the case with the General of an army or the Admiral of a fleet, and, though more rarely, even with a Financier. But in such emergency, the officer so acting will embrace the earliest opportunity to explain the matter and obtain a justification, whilst the recent feelings arising from the occasion advocates his cause in the public mind.

Has the Secretary done so in the present instance? No: his conduct has been the very reverse. Notwithstanding repeated and explicit calls, both at the last session and the present, the extent of these transactions was concealed. A bill passed this House authorizing another loan of $800,000; a second bill was urged in an unprecedented manner, for a loan of $2,000,000; and, though this was a favorite bill with the Minister, the very inquiry after this information induced his friends to shrink from the matter, and desert the object about which they had discovered so much solicitude. But when the disclosure is made, does there appear any urgent necessity to justify this measure? No; there was none except what existed to the unauthorized plans of the Financier. He informs us that he thought it necessary to have always $500,000 or $600,000 at his command. I ask what law authorized him to think so? Did the Legislature judge this necessary? No. Did he ever state the necessity to the Legislature, and recommend such a provision? No, he did not; and we know he has never been backward in recommending Revenue Systems, nor in contriving uses for revenue. Supposing a sudden necessity for money, arising from a disappointment of some remittance, where was the boasted aid of the Bank, which was to have administered aid in all sudden emergencies? Could not bills have been sold for cash when the necessity pressed? Or could not a temporary loan have been procured from any of the banks? Certainly they could. Loans were obtained at the Bank when no necessity required such aid, and when the public money, to a much greater amount, was deposited with the Bank. In short, no necessity of State, for purposes authorized by the Legislature, existed. If there was a necessity at all, it must have arisen from another quarter—most probably from the Bank itself and its branches. A key to this suggestion may be discovered from a comparison of drawing at the times, and the situation of the Bank at such times? [Here Mr. FINDLEY was called to order, upon the ground of his arguments not being confined to the resolution before the Committee.] He alleged his arguments applied strictly to the charge of violating the law contained in the resolution; but as a further opportunity of applying the arguments arising from necessity and discretion would be given when a subsequent resolution was brought before the Committee, he would pass it now, and conclude with a very few remarks. He said the exercise of the power assumed by the Secretary, was inconsistent with that public confidence upon which the Government alone was founded; that it was inconsistent with public safety and a Government of laws; that the Secretary seemed to take the whole Government upon his shoulders, and to consider all the great interests thereof to be committed to his providence. His reports spoke the language of a Frederick of Prussia, or some other despotic Prince, who had all the political powers vested in himself—not the language of a dependent Secretary, under a free and well-ordered Government.

Mr. GILES rose.—He was sensible that he stood in a peculiarly delicate situation, in which nothing short of the public good could have induced him to place himself. If a public and highly responsible officer had violated the laws, it was necessary that he should be called to an account for it; and to determine whether in the instances before the House, he had been guilty of that violation, it is necessary to compare the testimony with the facts alleged in the resolutions before the Committee. He first adverted to the law authorizing the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES to borrow twelve millions of dollars for the purpose of paying the foreign debt. On this, he remarked that the authority of borrowing was expressly given to the PRESIDENT, no doubt, with an eye to the personal virtues of the character who fills that office; the loan is also directed to be made solely for the purpose of paying the Public Debt. Here he remarked, that in every appropriation law, the appropriation is always emphatically mentioned, which is an evidence that the Legislature intend to remain the sole judges of the applications of money. He read a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, who was employed by the PRESIDENT to negotiate this loan, to Mr. Short, the Secretary's Foreign agent for this purpose, dated the 9th of May, 1791, in which the Secretary informs Mr. Short, that one million and a half of the money he had obtained on loan, was destined for France; of which sum he was authorized to apply immediately one million, but to reserve eight hundred thousand florins to answer such subsequent directions as he should receive from the PRESIDENT. He cited this passage to show that the million and a half which had been obtained on loan, was destined for France.

To remove any doubt that might remain upon this head, he referred to a preceding letter from the Secretary to Mr. Short, dated the 13th of April, in which it is also expressly said, that of the two millions borrowed, one million and a half is intended for France, the remaining half million to wait for further directions. Having established this point, he adverted to the resolution before the Committee, which says, that he applied a portion of the principal borrowed to the payment of the interest falling due upon that principal, without being authorized so to do by any law. To show this, he referred to a report of the 3d of January, containing sundry statements respecting foreign loans. That part of the Report to which he alluded in proof of the fact, stated in general terms, a sum paid on account of foreign loans, and this sum was taken from the principal borrowed, and amounted to 1,833,189 florins. If his statement was accurate, the fact he wished to establish was proved. He wanted more light, he confessed, than he could collect from the Secretary's official communications. He should not go into the examination of what circumstances might have induced the Secretary to deviate from the positive injunctions of the law, or to make any remarks upon his conduct, until he had heard what gentlemen would say to controvert the fact he wished to establish.

Another fact of consequence he wished to prove, viz: that part of the money obtained on loan in Europe had been drawn over, though not wanted here for any public purpose. This appeared from other papers. He turned to the instructions from the PRESIDENT to the Secretary of the Treasury, authorizing him to borrow $14,000,000, in which the Secretary is cautioned to keep in view the two several acts authorizing the loans, and the distinct conditions they contemplate. By the instructions of the PRESIDENT, the Secretary is authorized to apply the moneys. In the execution of the trust confided to him, the PRESIDENT generally directs him to employ Mr. Short to negotiate the loans, to borrow in the manner prescribed by the acts, and to discharge immediately the arrears of interest due to the French, to which purpose and to the complete payment of that debt the twelve million loan was altogether appropriated. If this money, then, was shown to have been drawn here, it was neither warranted by law nor by the PRESIDENT's instructions. The Secretary did begin to draw as early as 1790, and had continued to draw from time to time, till 1793, without giving notice of this to the Legislature. Having shown that the Secretary had drawn without authority to draw, he next proceeded to consider the purpose of those drafts.

The money thus drawn for was not, he stated, applied to the purchase of the Public Debt. No money obtained from foreign loans was thus applied until this year; the domestic resources appropriated to this object were never exhausted. These were the facts involved in the first resolution, which he wished to establish. Before he proceeded further into the discussion, he wished to hear what gentlemen had to say to controvert them. He wished to see justice done in the matter before the House; he wished justice, also, to be tempered with moderation and mercy; and if gentlemen could show the necessity for deviations from positive law, which he had endeavored to point out, it would exonerate the Secretary from a very great share of blame.

Mr. BARNWELL called for the reading of certain parts of the two acts authorizing the loans. One, of the 4th of August, authorizes a loan of $12,000,000, to be obtained without limitation as to the interest, for the purpose of paying the Foreign debt; the other is of the 12th of August, for $2,000,000, the interest to be not more than five per cent, and for the purpose of reducing the Domestic debt.

Mr. SEDGWICK, to disprove that the drafts alluded to had been made without the knowledge of the Legislature, called for the reading of the

MARCH, 1793.]

Debate on Mr. Giles's Resolutions.

[H. OF R.]

PRESIDENT'S Speech to both Houses on the 8th of December, 1790, and a subsequent report of the Secretary of the Treasury to the same point. By this, it appeared that the power of borrowing having been exercised under the joint authority of the two acts, the Secretary states a difficulty that had occurred to him on the subject of the drafts alluded to. The money having been obtained on an interest of five per cent., exclusive of douceurs, he wished the Legislature to determine whether it might strictly be considered as borrowed under the second act, which limited the interest at five per cent. This was sufficient, he conceived, to show that the Legislature were not ignorant of those drafts, and an act was passed solving the Secretary's doubt, and sanctioning his construction of the law.

Mr. GILES remarked, that he had drawn before that sanction was obtained.

Mr. FITZSIMONS observed, on the first charge in the resolution, that, as the interest of the money borrowed in Europe is payable where borrowed, it was economical in the Secretary to pay that interest with moneys there, which were to be drawn here, and replace the sum by taking the amount from the funds here destined for that payment. A financial operation of this nature is simple, and saves the trouble of drawing with one hand and remitting with the other. He conceived there was no just foundation for the first charge.

Mr. LAURANCE said, that when the resolutions calling for information from the Treasury Department were first brought forward, the public mind was impressed with an idea that there were moneys unaccounted for. This charge is now dropped, and it is honorable to the officer concerned that, after much probing, nothing is found to support it. The inquiry now is, whether a debt was paid out of this or that fund. He did not admit the fact, that it was paid out of any other moneys than what law strictly warranted. He went into a history of the subject from its origin. He stated the nature and purposes of the loans. There was nothing to prevent the PRESIDENT from consolidating the two loans, provided such an arrangement did not interfere with the purposes intended by them. The PRESIDENT employed the Secretary to obtain the loans under the joint authority of both acts, as it was found that the object could best be carried into effect by such an arrangement. The money thus borrowed became subject to the appropriations of both acts, and not exclusively for the payment of the Foreign debt. Then, as part of that money was subject to be drawn here for the redemption of the Domestic debt, and the interest of the loan was to be paid with Domestic funds, it was perfectly reasonable to avoid further drafts and remittances to pay the debt there with money there, and replace it here with money already here. The fact stated in the first part of the resolution is, by this plain statement of the case, substantially refuted, and appears altogether unfounded; but if the fact is proved, what is implied? No injury to the interests of the community; the intention of the Legislature has been in every point fulfilled. If the Secretary had acted differently, he would have been guilty of an absurdity, and to blame for sacrificing the public interest and neglecting the spirit of a law for a strict and unprofitable observance of its letter.

Mr. SEDGWICK, by adverting to the Speech of the PRESIDENT and Report of the Secretary, had shown that the Legislature had been made acquainted with the drafts, and sanctioned future ones on the same principles. The latter part of the first resolution criminate the Secretary for making them without instructions from the PRESIDENT. Even if this was the case, he did not know whether this was really reprehensible. He defended it on the ground, that the Secretary is the officer appointed by law to superintend the finances and apply all moneys agreeably to appropriations. He took a view of the subject, as stated by Mr. LAURANCE, and concluded by asking, whether, if the Secretary was found, on a critical examination, to have deviated in a trifle from the letter of the law, such a deviation was sufficient to warrant the alarm's being sounded from St. Croix to St. Mary's, and whether the precious time of the House, at the close of the session, with a vast variety of business on their hands, should be taken up in so unprofitable and frivolous an investigation?

Mr. GILES said, the transaction alluded to by the gentlemen to controvert the fact laid down in the first part of the resolution before the Committee was not immaterial, as they had endeavored to show it. It was not merely a financial operation to avoid the necessity of drawing and remitting. The truth was, that the Secretary had drawn over nearly $3,000,000. The PRESIDENT's authority was limited to $2,000,000.

Mr. LAURANCE was of opinion, that if the PRESIDENT, or his agent, had drawn the whole amount of the money obtained under both loans, he could not be said to have gone beyond his authority. He was authorized to borrow $12,000,000 to pay the arrears on the Foreign debt, and to modify the whole. In the execution of this trust, he might have found it advisable to draw to the country the whole of that sum. It had been found advisable to draw for part, and to pay the French by shipping produce to St. Domingo. If the money expended for supplies to St. Domingo is deducted, the balance will be found less than $2,000,000.

Mr. L. contended, that the interest of the moneys borrowed was not paid out of the principal of the loan, as set forth in the first charge of the resolution before the Committee. If gentlemen would attend to the history of the transaction, they would find this strictly true. This interest was paid out of the moneys borrowed for the reduction of the Public Debt, and not out of those intended to pay the French, and the funds appropriated for the payment of that interest were here to replace the former and be applied as those were appropriated. He referred to the PRESIDENT'S Speeches at the commencement of the two last sessions, to show that the loan was obtained under the joint authority of both acts; and adverted to the act of Congress, in consequence of a doubt suggested by the Secretary, explaining that the moneys first obtained might be considered as borrowed under the act authorizing the two million loan. Having shown the first charge in the resolution to be unfounded, he turned to the second.

The Secretary is accused of drawing moneys to this country without instructions. In this transaction, the PRESIDENT must be considered as the principal, and the Secretary the agent, or the Secretary must be looked upon as the principal. If the PRESIDENT is the principal, and he be authorized to obtain the loans, as soon as the money is obtained it naturally falls under the direction of the financier; but if it be contended that the PRESIDENT was to have applied the moneys as well as to borrow them, then we have nothing to do with the agent; that agent is accountable to his principal, and as this principal is not called to an account by the Legislature for any improper exercise of discretion, he must be considered as having acted strictly within the law. If the Secretary is considered as the principal (and by a strict attention to the law, he believed, it would be found so, for the PRESIDENT is by it authorized to borrow, and it is not expressed who shall apply the money) then it was not one of the duties of the Secretary to procure the instructions of the PRESIDENT, being the principal, and consequently having the direction of the money borrowed, he is made the judge of the time of drawing, to fulfil the intention of the law. Was the money, he asked, to have remained in the hands of the banker in Europe? Since it was borrowed for the purchase of the Public Debt, the sooner it was drawn over the better, and the Secretary having the direction of those moneys, could do it without consulting the PRESIDENT. He proceeded to show, however, that the Secretary had by no means acted entirely without regard to the PRESIDENT's instructions. His letter to Mr. Short, which had been read, expressly says, that he is waiting for instructions from the PRESIDENT, and the only instructions brought forward clearly shows, that he did not act without them. On this occasion it was not necessary, he conceived, that all the private communications between those two officers should be brought forward; indeed many of the instructions might have been verbal, and of a private nature. Another proof lies before the Committee, to show that the Secretary did not act independent of instructions. A Report of the Secretary mentions that some matters relative to the loans were under consideration of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES. This document, the gentlemen were in possession of when they framed the resolutions; and it, in his opinion, left very little ground indeed to suppose that the Secretary had acted without instructions.

That officer, he contended, had strictly obeyed the Appropriation law; he had not drawn one dollar that the act did not warrant. On the authority of one act, the Secretary drew two millions (by the by he wished to remark, that the Secretary is not the officer who actually draws, who sells the bills, or who receives the money; this falls within the province of the Treasurer, the Secretary does not touch a penny of those moneys) to apply to the reduction of the Public Debt. The other act gave the PRESIDENT power to draw every dollar of the loan it established, if he thought fit, if those who were to receive the money wished to be paid here. Will the remittance which afforded so seasonable a relief to St. Domingo be found fault with? If this mode of paying was within the authority vested in the PRESIDENT, surely the power of drawing must have accompanied it. He concluded by observing, that he had stated his ideas on the subject in a hasty manner, for the want of time to go more fully into the discussion.

Mr. MERCER next rose. None of the communications from the Secretary of the Treasury had removed his suspicions relative to the transactions of that Department. What had fallen in the course of the discussion, had not removed his doubts. He confessed himself more at a loss than ever to account for the conduct of that officer. To judge of the propriety of his conduct, it was necessary to consider what his duties are, and investigate whether a necessity existed to justify the drawing complained of. Gentlemen, in their arguments, had alluded to some observations that had fallen from him on other occasions expressive of his opinion, that there had been corruption in that Department. This opinion he still entertained. He suggested that some irregularities had taken place as to the money appropriated to the Sinking Fund. This might be the fact, and his suspicions were sufficiently urgent to warrant him in suggesting that it might be possible. At the close of 1792, he stated there was a balance of cash in the Treasury of $2,331,182, and the bonds due in the course of the present year would produce a sum of about $2,269,000. Yet a proposition was made in the House, predicated on a total want of money in the Treasury, to borrow $800,000 in addition to the $400,000 already borrowed of the Bank.

[Here Mr. BOUDINOT interrupted the member, as being out of order. The Chairman, conceiving Mr. MERCER's remarks to be introductory to, and connected with the observations he intended to make on the resolution, declared him in order.]

Mr. MERCER proceeded to show, by sundry statements and calculations, that there was no necessity for this loan of $800,000. The House, he said, to discharge their duty, should be satisfied how the money appropriated was applied, before they consented to repeated additional appropriations. When calls for information had been made by the House, with a view to comply with this their indispensable duty, the Secretary had thought it sufficient to balance money actually received, by calculations of sums that would probably be wanted agreeably to appropriations. Were dollars, he asked, to be balanced by absolute appropriations? Can things certain be balanced by things uncertain? Actual expenditure would alone balance actual receipt. Appropriations founded only on uncertain calculations could not show the money actually laid out. He adverted to some calculations made to ascertain the probable expenses of the War Department.

Debate on Mr. Giles's Resolutions.

[H. OF R.]

[Here the member was again called to order, and was declared out of order by the Chairman.]

Mr. M. confined his observation more immediately to the resolution before the Committee. It had been said, that the interest paid was paid out of moneys that were to be drawn to this country, and were replaced here by funds from the domestic resources originally appropriated for that object, and that the dead letter of the law, if any part of it, had alone been violated. He contended there had been an essential violation.

The sums drawn for and appropriated to reduce the Public Debt, were not applied to that purpose; the domestic resources appropriated to that object, never were exhausted. If this is the case, conclusions surely unfavorable to that officer must naturally follow.

He proceeded to make some remarks on the question, whether the Secretary had acted under instructions from the PRESIDENT. It was disagreeable, he premised, to criminate the character of any officer. He bore a great respect for the PRESIDENT, for his virtues, talents, and services, but however grating to his feelings it might be to find fault with any part of his conduct in this matter, he was unable to discharge his duty under his present impressions, unless he avowed that he conceived that officer had violated the law, though he allowed, without intention, by not inquiring into the subject, while transacting, as it was his duty to do. He must declare that he saw no proof that the Secretary had acted under the PRESIDENT's instructions. On the contrary, he saw the reverse, there was even no presumptive proof of the fact. The House had called for information as to the extent of the authority delegated by the PRESIDENT to the Secretary. Either the Secretary has produced the proof of this authority, or he has not complied with the order of the House; it does appear that he has gone beyond it in making the drafts complained of. The PRESIDENT directed that the proceeds of the loan be immediately applied to pay the French; yet a great portion of that money was brought over here. It was said, that he might have brought the whole here if he chose, and paid it to the French here. This argument goes on the presumption that the PRESIDENT might do wrong without incurring blame. But the PRESIDENT expressly directed it to be paid immediately to France; and the House had no right to presume that he did direct the money to be drawn here, when proof to the contrary appears. Upon the whole, he concluded that the law had been broken in letter and substance, and that the Secretary had acted without proper instructions from the PRESIDENT.

Mr. LIVERMORE observed, that the charge against the Treasury Department was at first well calculated to beget serious alarm. When misapplications of the public money are sounded in the public ear, all feel interested, knowing, that what affects the public purse, must in a degree affect the purses of each private individual. In the present stage of the subject, he was happy in being able to felicitate himself and his fellow-citizens, that even should the whole of the charges contained in the resolutions be proved, it would not appear that they had lost a farthing by the conduct so loudly complained of. What is the charge? That the Secretary has paid an interest that was justly due; why then, he presumed, we should not have it again to pay. If the Secretary has paid what was due, what then is the complaint? It was surely not intended, that it should not have been paid. This was not the intention of Congress; for they passed an act providing funds for its payment. The Secretary was then right to pay it. But it is said, he paid with the wrong money. He saw no harm in not paying it with the very dollars appropriated, and approved of the operation, which saved drawing with the one hand and remitting with the other; in this there was no crime committed, no loss incurred. It appears, on the contrary, that something was gained by it. So far, then, he was clear, no law had been violated, nor was any rule of propriety departed from. He then touched upon the Secretary's disputed right to draw. He contended, that he had that right. The loans were obtained under the joint authority of the two acts. It was said that more than two millions, the amount appropriated for the Sinking Fund, were drawn over; but, he insisted, he might have drawn the other twelve millions, if it had been for the public interest so to do. The French wished to be paid here, and it being no loss but rather a profit to comply with their wish, where was the harm in so doing? If any public loss had been incurred owing to these drafts, then blame would lie. He concluded, by expressing his hearty approbation of the conduct of the officer who is criminated by the resolutions, and declared it as his firm intention to give them his negative.

Mr. HILLHOUSE argued, that the interest paid, was not paid out of the $2,000,000 loan, and that the drafts were made agreeably to the directions of the PRESIDENT. He showed this by the documents which had been already referred to. He put in a clear point of view the propriety of avoiding the expense and risk of drafts and correspondent remittances, and concluded by giving his approbation to the conduct of the Secretary in the transactions complained of, and by expressing it, as his firm belief that a majority of the Committee, from the evidence before them, would undoubtedly be of opinion, that the charges brought forward are unfounded.

Mr. SEDGWICK rose to correct a mistake of Mr. MERCER'S. That gentleman had asserted, that the Secretary had drawn on Europe, before the loan, obtained by the Commissioners under the old Government, was ratified. This was not the case. The loan had been ratified in pursuance of the provisions of the act authorizing it. The PRESIDENT in his Speech, December, 8, 1790, says, "that agreeably to the power vested in him at the last session, the loans in Holland had been completed."

By existing acts of the Legislature, and from express communications from the Secretary of the Treasury, it appears, that all the moneys borrowed were deemed borrowed under the joint authority of both acts, and not to be solely appropriated for the payment of the Foreign Debt.

Mr. MERCER explained, that he had said, that the Secretary had drawn from the loan obtained under the authority of the old Government, before said loan was legalized by law. If the Legislature had the right to legalize it, they had the right to reject it.

Mr. LEE next rose. He observed that as he found himself under the necessity of differing from his friend who had moved the resolution, with whom he generally agreed in opinion, and was accustomed to act, he begged the attention of the Committee for a few minutes. To determine whether the Secretary of the Treasury had acted legally, it was necessary to examine whether the authority from the PRESIDENT and his subsequent instructions authorized him to consolidate the loans under the acts of the 4th and 12th August, 1790.

On this question Mr. L. observed, that there seemed to be no objection to such a construction, except that which arose from the difference of interest allowed by those acts. That the first loan was commenced without any regular authority by a company in Amsterdam, that it received its authenticity from the acceptance of the Secretary of the Treasury. The interest and douceurs on this loan amounted to more than an interest of five per cent., which was the only premium contemplated by the act of the 12th of August. It could consequently be accepted only under the act of the 4th of August, which gave no limitation to the interest which was to be allowed. This money seemed therefore solely applicable to the payment of the Foreign Debt. From his report of the 24th of February, 1791, the Secretary himself seemed to have had this impression. Congress seemed also to have had this impression, as on the 3d of March following they passed an act authorizing the application of this loan to the object of the act of the 12th of August, 1790. After the 3d of March, 1791, therefore, the Secretary of the Treasury had a right to bring this money to America for the purposes of the Sinking Fund. The interest of the Foreign Debt becoming due, for which domestic revenues were pledged, he thought it prudent to pay that interest out of this loan, relying on the domestic revenues to replace it for the purposes of the Sinking Fund. This was a mode of bringing the money here, and he was not limited in his discretion as to the mode; and therefore had a right to follow that which appeared to him most advantageous. The paying of the foreign interest out of this loan was made after the 3d of March, 1791.

Mr. L. had no doubt as to the legality of all the proceedings relative to moneys drawn to this country subsequent to the third of March, 1791; even the moneys borrowed for the Foreign Debt, because an higher interest than five per cent. was stipulated for, on any of the subsequent loans, and because the PRESIDENT, in his instructions to the Secretary, leaves the mode of paying the Foreign Debt to his discretion. If he judged it for the advantage of the United States to bring this money, in the first place, to America, the legality of such a measure cannot be questioned, though the economy and wisdom of it may not be admitted.

On this point, Mr. L. acknowledged, that he had not time to examine minutely all the statements and reports of the Secretary to judge of those exigencies which induced the drawing of all the money which had been drawn to America.

Whether it had been consistent or not with the interest of the United States, Mr. L. was of opinion, that the Secretary had legally a right to bring all the money he had drawn for to America, except what was drawn prior to the third of March, 1791. This money was drawn out of the first loan; it was drawn as declared, for the Sinking Fund; the first loan, for the reasons before stated, could not be applied, and consequently till the act of the 3d of March, 1791, this money could not be legally drawn for the Sinking Fund. Perhaps this act caused the irregularity of this proceeding.

But is not the Secretary of the Treasury subject to blame? Mr. L. observed, he thought he was not altogether free from it. At the meeting of Congress on the 8th day of December, 1790, the PRESIDENT in his Speech informed both Houses, that the first loan had been accepted, and that the Secretary of the Treasury had directions to lay the particulars before them. But what did he do? On the 15th of December following, he began to draw money on account of this loan to America, for the Sinking Fund; though from his Report on the 24th of February, 1791, he appears to have had a doubt as to the legality of this proceeding. He delayed giving information, in conformity to the PRESIDENT'S Speech, till a few days before the dissolution of Congress. This conduct, Mr. L. said, seemed to argue a distrust of the Legislative Councils. Mr. L. dilated on the necessity of the purest and most confidential communication between the Secretary of the Treasury and the Legislature, and said, though he could not agree to the resolution then under consideration, there was one, subsequent to it, relating to this point, which he was sorry to find himself under the necessity of voting for.

Mr. BOUDINOT considered it as the duty of the Committee in the discussion of the charges brought forward to confine themselves strictly to the points in question. The present examination differed from ordinary Legislative business. Specific charges are brought forward against a highly responsible officer; the facts brought forward to support those charges should be understood and considered, to form a right judgment on them. The Secretary is charged with having violated a law, by paying the interest due on a loan out of the principal of that loan. He went into some statements and calculations to show that the money paid on account of foreign loans, as stated in official documents, could not have been paid on account of interest of the late loans, from the disproportion of the sums.

He need say nothing more, he conceived, to show that the first charge in the resolution immediately before the Committee is unfounded. If what he said was not sufficient to disprove it, he asked where is the evidence to support it?

He next turned to the second charge in the resolution, viz: that the Secretary had made the drafts

MARCH, 1793.]

Debate on Mr. Giles's Resolutions.

complained of without the PRESIDENT's instructions. Here he noticed a mistake some gentlemen had fallen into, when speaking of the call of the House for information. This was a request to the PRESIDENT, and not an order to the Secretary. From the information communicated in consequence of this call, it did not appear that the Secretary had acted without, or contrary to instructions, and he insisted, that he ought to be presumed innocent till he was proved guilty.

He argued, that the authority given to the PRESIDENT in the subject put it in his power to draw the whole fourteen millions to this country, if he thought fit; it could not, therefore, he contended, be insisted, that the amount of the drafts had passed the limits of the authority given. It is not denied, he proceeded, that there was a right to draw for the two millions appropriated for the reduction of the Public Debt. Well, it has appeared, on a certain occasion to the House, that our Minister in France negotiated a contract with the National Assembly, or their officers, for the payment of $800,000 of the debt due them, here; then certainly, the exigency of the case required that this sum should be drawn here for the purchase of provisions for St. Domingo, in which this payment was to be made. Here then was a positive necessity of drawing for $2,800,000, and as a discretionary power in the subject had been left to the Executive, they might have found it advisable, perhaps, under an expectation of additional payments in the same manner, to have drawn over as much more as they might have thought prudent.

He adverted to the application of the Secretary to the Legislature to declare whether the loan obtained, for an interest of five per cent., exclusive of douceurs, might be considered as borrowed under authority of the $2,000,000 act. It was his (Mr. BOURNOR's) opinion at the time, that no explanatory law was necessary; and that the Executive had power to construe the act in that sense. This was also the Secretary's opinion, and in consequence of that opinion he had drawn bills. He thought it however right to apply to the House and have every doubt removed, and the Legislature sanctioned his construction of the law.

It had been said, that if the Legislature had a right to confirm, they also had a right to reject the construction put upon the law by the Executive. This, he conceived, they would not have been warranted in doing, after a contract agreeably to that construction had been made; such a proceeding must have involved a breach of contract.

It had been repeatedly asserted and strenuously insisted on, that the Legislature were totally in the dark, as to the drafts from Europe. To disprove this assertion, he read several items from sundry Reports of the Secretary, where sums received on account of loans are specified. It had also been said, that there was no evidence that any part of the loan was applied to or intended for the purchase of the Public Debt.

This also appears unfounded, from a note dated 25th of August, 1790, laid before the Trustees for purchasing the Public Debt, which expressly mentions, that a loan had been negotiated, part of which was destined for the purchase of the Public Debt, and that some points relative thereto were before the PRESIDENT for his approbation. This also showed that the PRESIDENT had knowledge of such intentions. His Speech, and the Report of the Secretary, in consequence of part of that Speech, which had been so repeatedly referred to, also unequivocally prove this point.

He recapitulated the heads of his arguments, and concluded, that if nothing further could be brought in support of the charges now before the Committee, they should have his decided negative.

MR. MADISON.—He wished not, he said, to waste a moment of the small portion of time left, by regretting its insufficiency for a full discussion of the subject before the Committee. But he thought it due to truth, and to the honorable and independent motives of his colleague [Mr. GILES] in proposing the resolutions, to remark, that the lateness of the day to which they had been postponed did not justify the strictures which had been made on it. If the delay was not to be considered as unavoidable, some blame, at least, would fall elsewhere. The inquiries in which the whole matter originated, had been moved by his colleague, and passed the House some weeks ago. The Reports in answer to these inquiries had not been finally made and printed a single day before the present resolutions were submitted to the House. He admitted that it might have been impracticable to report the information called for, as early as was desired by the House. He was sensible of the anxiety that would be naturally felt by the Officer called upon, to present every consideration that might place his conduct in the most favorable point of view; yet, with all these allowances, it was impossible to deny that the Reports contained things which did not belong to them, and therefore consumed time which belonged to the period for discussion. He would mention one instance on which there could not possibly be a difference of opinion, viz: the vindication, formally undertaken by the Secretary, of the policy of borrowing money abroad. Whether this policy was right or wrong, the Legislature had themselves decided in favor of it; and it was the duty of the Secretary, in complying with the orders of the House, to inform the House how the law had been executed—not why it had been made; to explain his own conduct, not to justify that of the Legislature.

It had been asked why the call for information had not been sooner made? The answer was obvious and simple. It was not sooner perceived by the House, that there was such a necessity for it. The want of information was first suggested by the bill for paying $2,000,000 to the Bank, although $200,000 only were immediately due, and for authorizing another foreign loan to the amount of $2,000,000. From the dawn of light thrown by some circumstances incident to the occasion, on the darkness in which the House had remained, proceeded those doubts and inquiries which had led to the information now possessed. His colleague had great merit in having brought about this development. He had rendered a service highly valuable to the Legislature, and no less important and acceptable to the public. One good effect of the information had been, that it prevented the passage of the bill for borrowing $2,000,000 as an anticipated payment to the Bank. The bill had dropped from the hand of its patron with the first light that broke in upon the House. What other measures would have been prevented or varied, if a like knowledge of our funds and finances had been sooner obtained, was matter of serious consideration.

Official conduct of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Another consequence of the Reports, taken together, was, that the face of them presented to his colleague an evidence of the charges contained in the resolutions. Whether, at so late a day, it was best to leave the subject as exhibited by the various documents in print, for the examination and opinion of the public, or to press it on the consideration of the House, was a point which every member had a right to decide for himself. His colleague had viewed the positions stated in his motion as too important to be suspended, and as supported by such clear and authentic proofs, that a small portion of time would suffice for the subject. Under this impression, what was his right became his duty; and he had discharged it by offering his resolutions to the House.

As the House had refused to commit the two introductory resolutions, which established the rule of judgment to be applied to the case, and the last also, which declared the inference to be drawn, the task of the Committee was limited to a simple inquiry into the facts stated. They were to make out and report a special verdict of these, and leave it to the House to pronounce the proper judgment arising from them.

The resolution immediately before the Committee imported, "that the Secretary of the Treasury had violated the law passed on the 4th of August, 1790, making appropriations of certain moneys," first, "by applying a certain portion of the principal borrowed to the payment of interest on that principal;" secondly, "by drawing part of the same moneys into the United States, without the instruction of the PRESIDENT."

The questions here are questions of fact; and whatever quality may be attached by different gentlemen to the several facts, it would seem as if the facts themselves are too clearly supported by the Reports of the Secretary, and the documents attending them, to be denied or controverted.

The law of August 4, 1790, authorized the PRESIDENT to cause to be borrowed $12,000,000, to be applied to the Foreign Debt of the United States. A subsequent law of August 12, 1790, authorized another loan of $2,000,000, to be applied to the Domestic Debt of the United States. A power to make these loans was delegated, on the 28th of August, 1790, to the Secretary, by a general commission, in the usual form, referring to the several acts above mentioned, but without any further discrimination of the loans to be made. As the law, however, for applying loans to the foreign object was prior in date, the presumption would rather be, that it was to have a priority of execution; that the first money borrowed was to belong to the first object provided for. It was unnecessary, however, to dwell on this consideration, because the PRESIDENT had removed all uncertainty by the precise explanations and instructions which accompanied the power to the Secretary, and which ought, in truth, to be deemed a part of the commission. The instruction having been more than once read to the Committee, he would content himself with referring to it.

The part referred to is in the following words:

"I do hereby make known to you that, in the execution of the said trust, you are to observe and follow the orders and directions following, viz: Except where otherwise especially directed by me, you shall employ in the negotiation of any loan or loans which may be made in any foreign country, William Short, Esq.; you shall borrow, or cause to be borrowed, on the best terms which shall be found practicable, and within the limitations prescribed by law as to time of repayment and rate of interest, such sum or sums as shall be sufficient to discharge, as well all instalments or parts of the principal of the Foreign Debt, which are now due, or shall become payable to the end of the year 1791, as all interest and arrears of interest which now are, or shall become due, in respect to the said Debt, to the same end of the year 1791. And you shall apply, or cause to be applied, the moneys which shall be so borrowed, with all convenient despatch, to the payment of the said instalments, and parts of the principal and interest, and arrears of interest of the said Debt. You shall not extend the amount of the loan which you shall make, or cause to be made, beyond the sum which shall be necessary for completing such payment, unless it can be done upon terms more advantageous to the United States, than those upon which the residue of the said Debt shall stand or be. But if the said residue, or any part of the same, can be paid off by new loans, upon terms of advantage to the United States, you shall cause such further loans as may be requisite to be made, and the proceeds thereof to be applied accordingly. And for carrying into effect the objects and purposes aforesaid, I do hereby further empower you to make, or cause to be made, with whomsoever it may concern, such contract or contracts, being of a nature relative thereto, as shall be found needful and conducive to the interest of the United States."

By this formal act, issued along with the commission to the Secretary, the PRESIDENT designated the object to which the loans to be made were to be applied; and by declaring the object to be that provided for by the act of August 4, 1790, he expressly placed the loan under the authority and provision of that act; so that the moment the money should be borrowed, it was to stand legally appropriated to its specified object—as much as if another law authorizing another loan for another purpose, had not existed.

This arrangement of the PRESIDENT was the more proper, not only because provision for the payment of the Foreign Debt had been the primary object of the Legislature, and the payment of the French debt, the anxious wish of their constituents, but because payments to France were no longer matter of option, but of strict and positive obligation on the United States. In proof of this, he stated that the debt to France, calculated to the end of 1791, and computing the livre at 5 4-10 to a dollar, amounted to $4,814,814, whilst the payments actually made, computing the florin at 2½ to a dollar, amounted to more than $3,372,717, leaving, as a balance, at the end of 1791, $1,442,097. Adding to this balance the instalments due for 1792, amounting to $638,888, there were to be paid within that year $2,080,985. The entire payments, however, composed of $656,500 in Europe, and $726,000 put to the account of St. Domingo, (although $444,263 83 were actually paid,) amounted to $1,382,500, leaving due at the end of 1792, a balance of $698,485.

Here Mr. M. adverted to and read a paragraph in the Report of the Secretary, page 16, where in allusion to the measure of drawing bills in the latter part of 1792, he says: "I feel myself the more at liberty to do it, because it did not interfere with a complete fulfilment of the public engagements in regard to the Foreign Debt. It could be done consistently with a full reimbursement of all arrears and instalments which had accrued on account of that Debt."

Mr. M. observed, that, as he could not reconcile this paragraph with the calculations which he had stated, and which were drawn from official documents, he must regard it as an unquestionable error, produced by some hasty view of the subject.

Returning to the Commission, Mr. M. repeated that all the money which that instrument, defined and qualified by the instruction annexed to it, authorized the Secretary to borrow, was actually and specifically appropriated to the payment of the Foreign Debt, and under circumstances particularly urgent, in relation to a part of it.

In what manner had this trust been carried into execution? It was to be observed, with regret, that, on the very day on which the commission and instruction issued from the PRESIDENT, the Secretary commenced his arrangement for diverting part of a loan, accepted and ratified by virtue of his commission, to a purpose different from that specified and required by his instruction. That a fact of so extraordinary a complexion might be grounded on the most unexceptionable proof, Mr. M. said he should take the liberty of supporting it by the authority of the Secretary himself. Here he read from the Secretary's Letter, dated August 28, 1790, to the Dutch houses from whom the Loan had been accepted, the following passages, viz:

"I should also wish, for particular reasons, that the business may be so regulated as to give it the form of two loans—one for two millions under the first act, and the other for one million under the second. But neither about this, am I so solicitous as to be willing that it should constitute an embarrassment."

"I destine a million and a half of this sum as a payment to France, under the direction of Mr. Short, our Chargé d'Affairs at that Court, whose orders for that purpose you will please to follow."

The aspect here presented by a comparison of the several documents, was singular and remarkable. The subordinate Officer appeared in direct opposition to the Chief Magistrate. The agent was seen overruling, by his own orders, the orders of his principal. The language of the PRESIDENT was "By virtue of the power vested in me by law, I destine the money to be borrowed to the discharge of the instalments and interest of the Foreign Debt." The language of the Secretary was: "I destine a part of the money only to that purpose, and a part to be brought to the United States for other purposes." He left every member to make his own reflections on the subject. He would only observe, in general, that it demonstrated the truth asserted in the proposition that the Secretary had violated both the law of August 4, 1790, and the instruction of the PRESIDENT relating to it.

He then proceeded to a more distinct view of the two points particularly stated in the resolution. The first was, "That a certain portion of the principal borrowed under the act of August 4, 1790, had been applied to the payment of the interest falling due on that principal." As the fact would not, he presumed, be denied, he forebore to quote that part of the documents which admitted and authenticated it. He would, however, premise to any observations on it, a cursory view of the nature of appropriations.

It was unnecessary to repeat the emphatic remarks on this subject, which had fallen from the member from Pennsylvania, [Mr. FINDLEY.] It was sufficiently understood. He concluded that appropriations of money were of a high and sacred character; that they were the great bulwark which our Constitution had carefully and jealously established against Executive usurpations. He meant only to take notice of the different plans into which appropriations might be moulded, and of the particular operation which ought to be given to them.

One of the plans was that of appropriating specified funds to specified objects, in which the supposed certainty of the funds was adjusted to the supposed importance of the objects.

The other plan formed all the branches of revenue into an aggregate fund, on which the several objects should have a priority of claim according to their superiority of importance. It was evident that in both these cases, the Legislature alone possessed the competent authority. The exclusive right of that Department of the Government to make the proper regulations, was the basis of the utility and efficacy of appropriations.

There was a third question incident to the doctrine of appropriations, viz: Whether, under specific appropriations, such as had been adopted by Congress, the Executive authority could, without special permission of the law, apply the excess of one fund to the aid of a deficient one, or borrow from one fund for the object of another. On this question, there might perhaps be a difference of opinion. He would only remark, that, admitting such a discretion to be implied in the trust of executing the laws, it would still be requisite that the due sanction of the Executive should be given, that a regular account should be kept between the different funds, and that all advances from one to the other should be replaced as soon as possible. This was equally necessary to the preservation of order in the public finances, and to a proper respect for the authority of the laws.

Official conduct of the Secretary of the Treasury.

In the present case, it did not appear that the moneys taken at different times from the Loans designated by the PRESIDENT, and thereby placed under the appropriation of the act of August 4, 1790, to the Foreign Debt, had ever been replaced. It did not appear that any such replacement was regularly planned or provided for. It was particularly worthy of observation, moreover, that the only use within the United States for which any loan in Europe could be assigned, was that of the Sinking Fund; that the Trustees of this Fund had never been even informed of the drafts; that if the moneys drawn had been carried to the Sinking Fund, the limited sum of $2,000,000 would have been exceeded; and that the statements and accounts had, in fact, been so wound up, as mentioned by the Secretary, that not a single dollar of the money laid out in purchasing the Public Debt had been charged on loans drawn into the United States, although such was the only purpose to which they were legally applicable, and such the principal reason assigned for making the drafts.

He did not go into a particular proof that the sum drawn into the United States, after subtracting the whole sum placed to a foreign account, exceeded the sum of $2,000,000, because the fact had been conceded on the other side, particularly by the statement of the member from Connecticut, [MR. HILLHOUSE.]

Thus it appeared clearly, in confirmation of the first point, that the application of a certain portion of the principal borrowed in Europe, to payment of the interest, was not a mere transposition of moneys, to prevent the sending them backwards or forwards, nor an advance of money from an overflowing fund in favor of a deficient one; but an absolute diversion of appropriated money, and consequently a violation of the law making the appropriation.

The second point in the resolution related to the drawing of moneys into the United States without the instruction of the PRESIDENT. This point had been fully established by the documents and explanations applied to the first. They had done more: they had demonstrated that the instructions of the PRESIDENT, which dedicated the loans to be made under his commission, to a foreign object, were an express prohibition of drafts for any domestic object. It was sufficient, therefore, to refer to the instructions of the PRESIDENT, and to the contradictory steps taken by the Secretary. Two attempts had been made to elude the force of these official proofs. The first appealed to the PRESIDENT'S Speech at the opening of the session in 1790; to the Report of the Secretary, made in consequence of it, to the House; and to the supplementary act of Congress passed in conformity to the Report.

Had the circumstances involved in this transaction been attended to by those who seemed to rely on it, Mr. M. was persuaded that a reference to it would never have been made by gentlemen on that side. As they had thought fit, however, to draw arguments from that source, it was proper to give an answer to them; and the best answer would be a naked statement of facts.

The instruction of the PRESIDENT to the Secretary was given, as has been seen, on the 28th of August, 1790. The Letter of the Secretary contravening this instruction, was dated, as has also been seen, on the same 28th day of August, 1790. The actual drawing of bills by the Secretary commenced the 15th of December, 1790. The law now pleaded in justification of the conduct of the Secretary, passed on the 3d of March, 1791.

There are other facts material to a correct and full view of the subject. The Speech of the PRESIDENT was delivered on the 8th of December, 1790. It briefly informed the two Houses that "a loan of 3,000,000 of florins, towards which some provisional measures had previously taken place, had been completed in Holland," and "that the Secretary of the Treasury had discretion to communicate such further particulars as might be requisite for more precise information." The consequent Report of the Secretary, recommending the provision in the supplementary act, was not received till the 25th of February, 1791—six days only before the constitutional dissolution of the House. In the interval between the Speech of the PRESIDENT and the Secretary's Report, he had proceeded to draw bills to the amount of 793,392 florins. His Report, notwithstanding what had been said of it, contained not a word from which it could be known that a single florin had been actually drawn over to the United States.

The other attempt to elude the evidence before the Committee, recoiled with equal force on the gentlemen who had hazarded it. In the report lately made by the Trustees of the Sinking Fund, is a statement laid before them by the Secretary, in which it is noted "that the acceptance of the loan of 3,000,000 of florins, and the application of one-third of it to the purpose of that Fund, was under the consideration of the PRESIDENT." From this fact, it had been inferred, not only that the Secretary had withheld no proper information from the Trustees, but that the result of the PRESIDENT'S deliberations on the subject had varied the purpose signified by his first instructions to the Secretary.

It happened, however, most unfortunately for the gentlemen who exulted in this argument, that they had entirely overlooked the dates of the two papers. The paper laid before the Trustees, and alleged to have explained the final purpose of the PRESIDENT, was dated on the 25th of August, 1790. The paper relied on by the other side, as the final, as well as the most formal, designation of the will of the PRESIDENT, was dated the 28th of August, 1790. The gentlemen, therefore, instead of the inference they had made, should have reversed their premises, and joined with their opponents in concluding that the PRESIDENT was led by a consideration of the subject, not to do what the Secretary, in his note to the Trustees, seemed to anticipate, but what had been evinced by the PRESIDENT'S own act of posterior date.

The second point, then, as well as the first, rests

MARCH, 1793.]

Debate on Mr. Giles's Resolutions.

on the most solid proofs, taken from a collective view of authentic documents.

Much has been said on the necessity of sometimes departing from the strictness of legal appropriations, as a plea for any freedoms that may have been taken with them by the Secretary. He would not deny that there might be emergencies, in the course of human affairs, of so extraordinary and pressing a nature, as to absolve the Executive from an inflexible conformity to the injunctions of the law. It was, nevertheless, as essential to remember, as it was obvious to remark, that in all such cases, the necessity should be palpable; that the Executive sanction should flow from the supreme source; and that the first opportunity should be seized for communicating to the Legislature the measures pursued, with the reasons explaining the necessity of them. This early communication was equally enforced by prudence and by duty. It was the best evidence of the motives for assuming the extraordinary power; it was a respect manifestly due to the Legislative authority; and it was more particularly indispensable, as that alone would enable the Legislature, by a provident amendment of the law, to accommodate it to like emergencies in future.

In the proceedings falling under the present inquiry, no necessity appeared for the liberties which had been taken, the money appropriated in Europe being more wanted there than at home. It appeared that the instructions of the Supreme Executive, instead of warranting those liberties, had precluded them; nor had the proper explanations been disclosed in due time to the Legislature. To place the subject in a more distinct point of view, it was proper to advert to the precise authorities and duties of the Secretary, as his office is defined by the act establishing the Treasury Department. For this purpose, Mr. M. read the second section of that act, which is in the words following:

"That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to digest and prepare plans for the improvement and management of the revenue, and for the support of public credit; to prepare and report estimates of the public revenue and the public expenditures; to superintend the collection of the revenue; to decide on the forms of keeping and stating accounts and making returns, and to grant, under the limitations herein established, or to be hereafter provided, all warrants for moneys to be issued from the Treasury, in pursuance of appropriations by law; to execute such services relative to the sale of the lands belonging to the United States as may be by law required of him; to make report and give information to either branch of the Legislature, in person or in writing, (as he may be required,) respecting all matters referred to him by the Senate or House of Representatives, or which shall appertain to his office; and generally to perform all such services relative to the finances as he shall be directed to perform."

This establishment of the office evidently had no reference beyond the case of superintending the regular and ordinary collection of the revenue, and granting warrants for moneys issued from the Treasury, in pursuance of appropriations by law.

The case of loans, as an occasional and extraordinary resource, was left to be provided for by particular laws for the purpose. The authority, with respect to the loans in question, was accordingly committed to the PRESIDENT, in order to secure for so special a trust, the highest responsibility to be found in the Government. And when it was considered that the whole sum contemplated was no less than fourteen millions of dollars, and when the latitude as to the terms and contracts was combined with the vastness of the sum, it might well be questioned whether so great a power would have been delegated to any man in whom the Legislature and the people of America had less confidence than they so justly reposed in the existing Chief Magistrate, and whether an equal power will ever be committed to a successor. This distinction between the case of ordinary revenue and that of loans is not only consonant to the actual policy of our laws, but is founded in obvious and solid considerations. In the collection and disbursement of the ordinary revenues arising from taxation, the business flows in official channels, is subject in every stage to official checks, and the money, being in constant influx and efflux, nowhere accumulates in immense sums. The case of loans is, in all these respects, different. In settling the terms and arranging the negotiations, there is always an important discretion involved. When the loans are foreign, as well as great, regulations concerning the bills of exchange form another occasion where great latitude is implied in the trust; whilst the magnitude of the sums, falling under the same direction at the same moment, present a further and material variance between the two cases. The tendency of these observations is to show that, as the permanent law establishing the Treasury Department does not extend the authority of the Secretary to the case of loans, and as the law authorizing loans exacts, for special reasons, a responsibility from the PRESIDENT himself, the authority of the Secretary, in executing the loans, and the appropriation of them, must be derived from the PRESIDENT; and, consequently, where that authority fails, there can be no resort to the law establishing the Department, much less to any general discretion incident to his official character. It is evident that the PRESIDENT, although no doubt guided by the most proper considerations in employing the agency of the Secretary of the Treasury in the business of the loans, might, if he had judged fit, have substituted the agency of another; and that, whatever agency he might prefer, his own instructions would always regulate the extent and exercise of the power conferred. The want of any apparent authority from the PRESIDENT had led several gentlemen to insist on presumed authorities, superceding the instructions joined with the commission to the Secretary. But here, again, the fair inference was to be reversed. A communication of the authorities given by the PRESIDENT to the Secretary, as to the application of the foreign loans, had been expressly requested by the vote of the House. It was not to be supposed that the Secretary, if he had received further authorities or instructions, would have failed to produce them, or to refer to them, in the justification of his conduct. Far less could it be presumed that the PRESIDENT, if he had given any superceding authorities or instructions, would not have caused them to be communicated to the House, or that he would have suffered a partial communication to mislead the House into an error as to so important a fact. The PRESIDENT was the last man in the world to whom any measure whatever of a deceptive tendency could be credibly attributed.

Thus far (said Mr. M.) his observations had departed as little as possible from the question in its strictest sense. He should now avail himself of the opportunity afforded by the terms of the last clause, which spoke of drafts generally, to take a more particular notice of those recently made; in doing which, he considered himself safe within the Rules of the House, which were so rigorously enforced against the affirmative side of the question. The whole amount of foreign loans transferred directly or indirectly to the United States appeared from the several statements to be about $3,000,000. The amount of the direct drafts was $2,304,769 13. Of the drafts made since the 16th of April, 1792, and sold by the Bank, the proceeds now in the Bank, or payable into it, before the 1st of April next, amount to $1,220,476 01. Of this sum $510,000 have been drawn in the course of the present session of Congress. With respect to the times and the amount of these drafts, hitherto absolutely unknown to the Legislature, because the account of them had remained in the books of the Bank without ever appearing in the books of the Treasurer, Mr. M. confessed that he had found no explanations that were satisfactory to him. He had looked through all the reports and all the communications before the House, without discovering either that they had been made by the authority or with the knowledge of the PRESIDENT, or had been required for, or applied to the purchase of, the Public Debt, or had been ever communicated to the Trustees of the Sinking Fund, who had the direction of such purchases, or that they were the effect of any necessity that could justify them. And if there was no evident necessity for the proceeding, it was the more to be lamented that, whilst we were everywhere sympathizing with our allies in their arduous struggles for liberty, and echoing from every part of the Union, our congratulations and good wishes, the pecuniary succors so critically necessary to their cause, and the most substantial proof of the sincerity of our professions, should be silently withdrawn across the Atlantic from the object for which they were intended—succors, too, which were not merely a tribute of gratitude, of generosity, or of benevolent zeal for the triumph of liberty, but a debt moreover of strict and positive obligation, for value acknowledged and received. In contemplating the subject in this point of view, he felt a pain which he could not easily express, and to which, he persuaded himself, the breast of no other member could be a stranger. Laying aside, however, all these unfavorable considerations, the important question still remained, why the Legislature had been uninformed of the moneys so unexpectedly drawn into the Bank, and to so very great an amount? If the drafts had received every requisite sanction, if they had been produced by the most justifiable causes, the existence of $1,220,476, in a situation so different from what had been contemplated, was a fact which the Representatives of the people had a right to know, which it was important to them and their constituents that they should know, and which it was the indispensable duty of the officer charged with it to have made known. This omission was the more remarkable when considered in relation to the measure above-mentioned, of paying off at once the whole sum of $2,000,000, payable to the Bank by instalments in ten years. A bill for this purpose had been introduced, and was on its passage; the object of it had been patronized by a report of the Secretary not long since made. In one of his last reports he expressly states, among the inducements to such extensive drafts of money from Europe, that they were made "with an eye to placing within the reach of the Legislature" the means necessary for this object. Was it not extraordinary, was it not unaccountable, that so important a measure should be recommended, and be actually introduced, and that money otherwise appropriated in Europe should be transferred to this country and deposited in the Bank, in order that it might be within the reach of being applied by the Legislature to that measure, and yet that no disclosure should be made to the Legislature of the fact that the money was so drawn and lay at the Bank, within their reach, to be so applied? If anything could heighten astonishment on this occasion it must be the reason assigned by the Secretary for any obscurity that might have hung over our finances—"that, till the last resolutions, no call had been made on the Department which rendered it proper to exhibit a general view of the public moneys and funds, or to show the amount and situation of such as were unapplied." Mr. M. would not decide that the Legislature was free from blame in not using more full and efficacious means of obtaining such information as would have removed all obscurity. But, whatever degree of blame might fall on them, it never could be admitted that their calls on the Department had furnished no proper occasion for exhibiting a full view of the public finances. He referred generally to the various resolutions, which, without the least force of construction, would have extended to every proper article of information. He reminded the Committee of the latitude of reports under certain other orders of the House, and asked whether less freedom of construction was to be allowed when information was to be given, than when power or discretion was to be exercised? But, independently of this view of the matter, Mr. M. held it to be clear and palpable that the very situation of the money afforded an occasion which rendered it proper that the House should be informed of it. If a liberty could be taken of removing money from Europe, where it stood appropriated by law, to this country, where there was no legal object that required it, and with an eye, as was stated, to an object to which no money was applicable, without the authority of the Legislature, how could it possibly be supposed improper to take the further liberty of communicating what was done to the Legislature? He concluded with recurring to the particular form in which the subject presented itself to the Committee, and repeating that, whatever quality might be attached to the facts charged, or however improper it might be thought by some to proceed in haste to any affirmative decision on them, it appeared irreconcilable with the evidence which had been produced, to decide, by a negative vote, against the truth of the facts.

Mr. AMES prefaced his remarks on the subject before the Committee by some observations on the nature of the charges brought forward. He was happy that they were determinate, and conceived that the defence could be crowded in a nutshell. As to the first charge in the resolution immediately before the Committee, he had seen no proof in support of it brought forward. It is founded only on assertion, and he conceived that contra-assertion was sufficient to meet it. No authority, it was said, was given to the Secretary to obtain the Loan under the blended authority of both acts. This is not one of the charges included in the resolutions before the Committee, and therefore this is not the time to answer it. However, if this were fact, nothing criminal could in consequence be imputed; and, since the purposes of both laws were carried into execution, there could be no ground for saying that either was violated. He said much on the impracticability of the line of conduct which some gentlemen appeared to think ought to have been followed by the Secretary. It was impossible to keep different funds, differently appropriated, so inviolably separate as that one might not be used for the object of the other; all was right, he conceived, provided what was taken was to be replaced. He was also of opinion that the over-flowing of one fund could be applied to make up the deficiency of another; and that all that is necessary is to give priority to the appropriation. The money paid in Europe for interest on the Loan was said to have been improperly applied, because the fund appropriated for the purpose was here. He insisted that that money was absolutely represented here by an equal sum: and he contended that, though the interest was not paid in the identical coin appropriated, yet, by allowing a very reasonable latitude of expression, it could be said that the interest was paid with the money appropriated, for the applicability of the sums there depended on the existence of the fund here. He next turned to the second charge in the resolution; and, after showing that the natural presumption was, that the Secretary either was instructed or had a discretionary power, he then vindicated his conduct in respect to the drafts of money to this country. He did honor to the motives of the gentlemen who had instituted the inquiry, and concluded an elegant speech, by a contrasted picture of our former and present situation as a country, dwelling upon the importance of preserving harmony, and insisting on the danger of giving rise to suspicions against a highly responsible officer, and of bringing forward charges not to be supported by proof.

Mr. FINDLEY.—If my hopes respecting the Government have not been equally elevated with those of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. AMES,] neither are my apprehensions so much depressed with fears. But I hope I am equally anxious for the stability and prosperity of the Government; and though we differ in opinion on this question, yet I am firmly persuaded that the part I take is the best calculated to promote the necessary confidence in Government, and secure the virtue of its Administration. As the gentleman, in an elegant discourse, has explained no difficulties, nor adduced any proofs in support of his opinions, I will only add, that I believe the Government to be so well established, and so much beloved by the citizens, as not to be endangered by the House of Representatives' examining how the laws have been obeyed in the application of public money, and giving their opinions upon the result of that examination.

That the Secretary has not reported fully to this House, in due time, is so much within the knowledge of every member, that it is impossible to doubt of the truth of the fact, however we may differ about the propriety of the conduct. To go no further back than last session—besides the references to the Secretary to report upon the Ways and Means, and inform the House what revenues were necessary, on the 30th of February, 1791, a standing order was resolved, directing that he should report to the House, within a few days after the meeting of the next session, "an accurate statement and account of the receipts and expenditures of all the public moneys, in which shall be distinguished the expenditures which fall under each head of appropriation, and that it shall be shown the sums, if any, which remain unexpended," &c. Were not the moneys drawn upon loan, public moneys, and were not those loans appropriated? Undoubtedly, they were strictly so. It is a strange evasion to say, that by these expressions, only the current revenue is intended. Arguments must be scarce when this becomes necessary. It requires no refutation.

On the 19th of January last, he was called upon to "lay before the House such information with respect to the finances of the United States, as will enable the Legislature to judge whether any or what additional revenues will be necessary." In consequence of the recommendations of the PRESIDENT, and the wishes of this House, to commence the discharge of the redeemable part of the Funded Debt, a reference was made to the Secretary, requiring him to report a mode for the application of the public money for that purpose; the House being assured, by the gentleman who moved the resolution, that no new tax was intended or necessary. But the Secretary, so far from informing the House how much money he had subject to his discretion, in the Bank, in notes, &c., proposed a new and partial tax, as the foundation of a new system of loans. When the memorable bill to authorize another loan of $2,000,000, was before the House, a few weeks ago, we were told by gentlemen on this floor, that there was not time for argument; that the bill must be passed in three or four days, &c.; and when we wanted information, we were told by some of the friends of the bill that it was not convenient to give information there—that we might procure information elsewhere, as they had done. I confess I did not comprehend this method of legislating; but the Secretary has since explained it, in one of his Reports, by complaining of the House, because the members did not go to his office and ask information, instead of requiring it to be publicly reported.

Official conduct of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Even when this favorite bill for a new loan was before the House, the Secretary did not condescend to inform us that he had, without authority, provided near a million and a half of dollars for that purpose; he did not inform us how obligingly he had drawn bills upon our bankers in Holland, to have the money put in our way. Thus, in order to anticipate the payments due to the Bank, he did what he could to induce Congress to break the public faith, by repealing the existing appropriation made for securing the discharge of a debt of justice and gratitude to the French nation. From this and other instances, it appears, that however high the Secretary's regard for public credit may be, there are other considerations which have obtained a higher degree of his attention than obedience to the laws. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MADISON] has so clearly explained the nature of that discretion with which the Secretary is vested, and so fully proved that there was no necessity to justify a departure from the appropriations made by law, that it is not necessary for me to explain further on this head. However, I cannot help remarking, that the discretionary powers were pretty freely exercised. The drawing of bills began early indeed, and were continued to a recent period. The times of drawing fortunately corresponded with the necessities of the Bank, and the power of employing agents was pretty freely used. The same agents were frequently both the sellers and the purchasers of the bills. Perhaps this was necessary: no doubt it was convenient. Probably it was safe; but who can say it will be always so.

I have not said so much to prove the truth of the facts expressed in the resolution, for of this there can be no doubt—it is as clear as the sun, shining in day-light,—but, in order to prove the propriety of this Committee expressing its disapprobation of a conduct so unjustifiable. That information was withheld unduly, is evident, from the lateness of this discussion; that it was obtained with difficulty, is evident, from the numerous applications we were obliged to make in order to obtain it.

Mr. BOUNDNOT called the attention of the Committee to the change in the usual situation of the House. They were no longer acting in a Legislative capacity, but were now exercising the important office of the grand inquest of the Nation. It was necessary to advert to this circumstance, to prevent running into the diffuse mode of argument that had improperly been adopted on this occasion. A gentleman of this Committee had thought proper to institute an inquiry into the conduct of an officer of the Government in a very important and highly responsible station. He had exhibited his charges against him in writing—had reduced them to certain and specific facts. To these, and to these alone, he had pointed his evidence, and we were bound in honor and in conscience to give a just and decisive opinion on each independent charge. In the first place, the truth of the facts must be settled and established; if in their favor, the criminality would then necessarily require a second consideration. The honor and reputation of the officer thus charged, as well as the respect due to the gentleman who had brought forward the accusation, required a steady, uniform, and disinterested examination of every question from us. Under this view of the subject, Mr. B. said he should avoid the desultory mode of argumentation that had been run into on both sides, and confine himself to the nature of the facts charged, and the evidence adduced in support of them. The short time that yet remained of the session was too precious to waste in collateral arguments, or the consideration of merely presumptive proofs. The first charge in the resolution now before the Committee was, "That the Secretary of the Treasury has violated the law passed on the 4th of August, 1790, making appropriations of certain moneys authorized to be borrowed by the same law, in the following particulars, to wit: 1st. By applying a certain portion of the principal borrowed to the payment of interest falling due upon that principal, which was not authorized by that or any other law. 2d. By drawing part of the same moneys into the United States, without the instruction of the PRESIDENT." These specific charges make it necessary for us to understand determinately the terms of the act mentioned in the resolution, and the nature of the proof offered in its support. By the act of the 4th August, 1790, section 2—

"THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES is authorized to cause to be borrowed a sum or sums not exceeding in the whole twelve millions of dollars; and that so much of this sum as may be necessary to the discharge of the arrears of interest on loans heretofore made by the United States in foreign countries, and the instalments of the principal of the said Foreign Debt, and (if it could be effected upon terms advantageous to the United States) to the paying off the whole of the said Foreign Debt, be appropriated solely to these purposes; and the PRESIDENT was moreover further authorized to cause to be made such other contracts respecting the said Debt as should be found for the interest of the said States."

It is asserted by the prosecutor of these charges that this act contained an emphatic appropriation of the whole of the twelve millions of dollars to the payment of the Foreign Debt. By a Letter to Mr. Short of May 9, 1791, read in the Committee, it appears that a Loan of three millions of florins had been made, and that one-half only was appropriated to the payment of our debt to France, and that eight hundred thousand florins were to be drawn to this country. This was said to be contrary to the terms of the appropriation, and without authority; and the Secretary's Report of January 3, 1793, folio 3, was referred to in proof of the fact "that the interest arising on the principal borrowed under this act was paid out of that principal;" when, by the same law, part of the domestic revenues of the United States were appropriated to that purpose. The words of the Report are, "payments on account of other Foreign Loans made and to be made to the 1st January, 1793, inclusive. February 1, 1791, two hundred and eighty-nine thousand seven hundred and eighty-three florins six stivers, with several other payments on the same terms, till January 1, 1793, amounting in the whole to one million eight hundred and thirty-three thousand one hundred and eighty nine florins two stivers eight deniers. These payments were asserted to be on account of interest on the principal borrowed, but without further proof. By the Report, folio 4, it appears that on the 1st of February, 1790, there was borrowed no more than one million one hundred and sixty-seven thousand florins, on which was due the 1st of February, 1791, one year's interest, amounting, at five per cent., to fifty-eight thousand three hundred and fifty florins; but this evidence proves that two hundred and eighty-nine thousand seven hundred and eighty-three florins were paid on that day. Can gentlemen be serious when they assert that this was for interest on this principal borrowed, being almost twenty-five per cent. per annum, instead of five. This certainly is an inattention to the subject that the serious nature of the charge cannot justify. Mr. B. then asserted that, on a critical examination of these items, they will be found to be instalments of the Dutch Loans made by the old Congress, and which this money was expressly appropriated to discharge; but he said he did not mean to avoid the fact, had it been proved, but he denied that any evidence of it arose from this testimony. The PRESIDENT was generally authorized to make the loans. Money arising from a domestic fund was appropriated to pay the interest. It happened that the Loan was made in Europe, to the amount of three millions of florins; part of it was to be drawn to this country, but before that event interest became due; this was paid out of the moneys intended to be drawn into this country, and repaid by the fund here, to prevent the unnecessary sending the moneys from one country to the other. Mr. B. asked, if the Secretary had done otherwise, would any man in his senses have thought him worthy of the trust committed to him? But the gentleman has proceeded on this charge (and has so expressed himself) as if this loan was exclusively made under the act of the 4th August, mentioned in the resolution before us, and therefore was wholly appropriated by law to the payment of the Foreign Debt, and ought not, in any part, to have been drawn into this country for other purposes. This brings to consideration the act of the 12th August, 1790, passed eight days after the act alluded to. By the 4th section of this act the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES is authorized to cause to be borrowed a sum or sums not exceeding two millions of dollars, at an interest not exceeding five per cent., and that the interest should be applied to the purchase of the Debt of the United States. The difference between these acts was, by that of the 4th of August, the PRESIDENT had a discretion as to the application of the sum borrowed towards payment of the whole of the Foreign Debt, over and above the instalments, depending upon terms of advantage to the United States. By the second act there was no discretion, the whole moneys being positively directed by law to be applied towards the purchasing of the Domestic Debt. By the first there was no restriction, in point of interest, to be paid, but an injunction that the terms of repayment should be stipulated within fifteen years. By the second, interest was restricted to five per cent., and no terms of repayment enjoined. By the preamble to the first law, the object of it appears to be the doing of justice and supporting public credit, by the payment of the Foreign Debt; by that of the second, "the reduction of the Public Debt, which would be beneficial to the credit of the Union, by raising the price of their stock, and be productive of savings to the United States." By virtue of these acts the PRESIDENT thought proper to constitute the Secretary of the Treasury his agent to make the loans; and, accordingly, on the 28th of August, 1790, by a commission under his hand and seal, reciting both the said laws, authorized him, "by himself or any other person or persons generally, to borrow, within the United States or elsewhere, a sum or sums not exceeding in the whole fourteen millions of dollars, subject to the restrictions and limitations in the said several acts contained." With this commission the Secretary received instructions relative to the said loans, in these words: "You shall borrow, or cause to be borrowed, on the best terms which shall be found practicable, and within the limitations prescribed by law, as to the time of repayment and rate of interest, such sum or sums as shall be sufficient to discharge as well all instalments or parts of the principal of the Foreign Debt which now are due, or shall become payable to the end of the year 1791, as all interest and arrears of interest which now are or shall become due, in respect to the said Debt, to the same end of the year 1791. And you shall apply, or cause to be applied, the moneys which shall be so borrowed, with all convenient despatch, to the payment of the said instalments and parts of the principal and interest, and arrears of the interest of the said Debt. You shall not extend the amount of the said Loan beyond the sum which shall be necessary for completing such payment, unless upon terms more advantageous to the United States," &c.

These instructions related solely to the application of the twelve millions, the two millions, as before observed, being applied by law, without any discretionary power, to the reduction of the Public Debt. Under this commission, it is in proof the Secretary caused three millions of florins to be borrowed in Europe generally, without expressing particularly under which law, but reciting under them both. He directed half of this sum to be applied to the payment of the Foreign Debt, and part of the other half he appropriated, for the purposes mentioned, towards the reduction of the Public Debt. But it is insisted that the whole of this money was borrowed under the act of the 4th August, and therefore it was highly criminal to apply any part of it to the discharge of the interest arising on the principal so borrowed, there being another fund designed for that purpose. But it has clearly appeared that the Secretary made this Loan in Europe, where the interest was to be paid and had become due; the fund for its payment was in this country; and therefore, if he was authorized to draw any part of that principal into the United States, it was a mere economical operation, to pay the interest there out of those moneys on the spot, and repay them out of moneys here, where they were to be applied, and by that means prevent the loss of insurance and interest, that must have arisen by another negotiation. This question, then, depends wholly on the fact whether this money was borrowed by virtue of both acts, or under that of the 12th of August exclusively.

The Loan was made at five per cent., subject to charges and douceurs of four and a half per cent. on the whole. The Secretary thought this within the act of the twelfth of August, limiting him to an interest not exceeding five per cent. This was the opinion of others besides the Secretary. Mr. B. himself had been of that opinion, and at the time thought an application to the Legislature unnecessary. But the prudence and caution of the Secretary led him to state this fact to Congress for their consideration and determination, who, by an act of the 3d March, 1791, declared their sense of the act of the 12th of August, and that the Loan was legally made under that act. The preamble to this act removes all doubt on this question:

"Whereas it hath been made known to Congress that the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, in consequence of an act making provision for the reduction of the Public Debt, (that is, that of the twelfth of August,) hath caused a certain loan to be made in Holland, on account of the United States, to the amount of three millions of florins, bearing an interest of five per cent." &c. "And whereas it hath been also stated to Congress that the charges upon said loan have amounted to four and a half per cent., whereby a doubt hath arisen, whether the said loan be within the meaning of the said last-mentioned act, which limits the rate of interest to five per cent. per annum. And whereas it is expedient that the said doubt should be removed, be it enacted," &c., "that the loan aforesaid shall be deemed and construed to be within the true intent and meaning of the said act making provision for the reduction of the public debt," &c.

This puts an end to any dispute on this subject; and if this money was borrowed under both acts jointly, or exclusively under the act of the twelfth August, there can be no propriety or justice in the charge, that the Secretary had violated the act of the fourth of August in applying part of this money to the purposes of the act of the twelfth of August, under which the Loan, as to a greater sum, was certainly made. By this act also the opinion of the Secretary of the meaning of the act of the twelfth of August as to the restriction of the interest to five per cent. was confirmed, and of course all his proceedings under it. There can then be no foundation for the charge, and it remains unsupported by proof.

The next part of the accusation attempted to be supported, was the drawing part of the same "moneys of the United States without instructions from the PRESIDENT." The instructions from the PRESIDENT as to the making the loans and applying them were only called for, he has therefore only reported these to the House; from this negative testimony, it was presumed that no other instructions have been given. This is weak support, indeed, to a criminal charge of this nature. I know it has been urged by one gentleman [Mr. MERCER] that the Secretary has been called upon for the instructions, and if he has failed to report them to the House, he ought to suffer: this shows how fallible gentlemen's memories are. There has been no call whatever of the House on the Secretary for this purpose—our Journals do not show any. The requisition was to the PRESIDENT, and he has complied with the terms of it. But if we are to rest on presumptive evidence, the presumption is in favor of the Secretary. The PRESIDENT has not made objections to the conduct of his agent. He has mentioned the loans to Congress, without disapprobation. The agent was properly accountable to him, and he has not found fault with him; but in his Speech at the opening of this and the last session of Congress, has expressed great satisfaction in the state of public affairs. But if the gentlemen who advocate this prosecution really believed this fact, had they it not in their power to have rendered the evidence certain to demonstration, by requesting, by resolutions of the House, that the PRESIDENT would declare whether this money was or was not drawn in consequence of his instructions, or with his approbation and consent? Can any man suppose that so responsible an agent as the Secretary of the Treasury would presume (for his own sake) to proceed in so important negotiation, without the knowledge, approbation, and directions of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES? But, for argument sake, suppose the fact to be true, is not the Secretary an officer to superintend the collection of the public revenue? As soon as this Loan was made under the act of the twelfth August, was it not his duty, without further instructions, to draw the money into the United States for the purposes mentioned in the act? Would he not have been highly culpable if he had left this money in Holland till the next session of Congress, and waited for a law authorizing him so to do? It is really a reflection on the whole Legislature to suppose they would have directed a Loan which should remain inactive on an interest of five per cent. without giving a power of application.

But it has been said that a larger sum, viz., almost three millions of dollars, has been drawn into this country, which was more than the PRESIDENT himself was authorized to do. If this is meant to criminate the PRESIDENT, we ought to know it. How does the fact stand? It is agreed that the PRESIDENT had a right to draw the moneys loaned under the act of the twelfth of August

He had a right to make such other contracts respecting the Debt as should be for the interest of the United States, in consequence whereof the agent in Europe agreed with the National Assembly or the Executive of France, for the payment of four millions of livres, part of their debt, in the produce of the United States, for the supply of St. Domingo

The interest to foreign officers amounted to about

$2,000,000 00
800,000 00
191,316 90

This, then, makes about the sum that it is proved was drawn for by the Secretary, and shows that he did not exceed the powers vested in the PRESIDENT for this purpose.

It has been also held up as highly criminal in the Secretary, that although he began to draw for this money in December, 1790, yet he never gave information to Congress or to the Trustees for purchasing the Public Debt on the subject; but left them wholly in the dark with respect to so important a measure, when it was his duty particularly to have kept the House constantly informed, and that this could only have happened for the purpose of covering some improper design, or aiding individuals with the public moneys of the United States.

To this charge Mr. B. said, he had paid serious attention, for as on the one hand he would ever be ready to bring every defaulter in public office, however exalted in character, to condign punishment, where found guilty: on the other hand, he wished ever to be found giving full support to every good officer of Government against unfounded charges of speculation and mismanagement of the public revenue. He had satisfied his mind on the subject, not being able to find a scintilla of evidence to support the charge, but abundant testimony to the contrary.

1. Congress knew that this money was appropriated to the payment of the debts in this country, that the Loan was made in Holland, and therefore that it must necessarily be drawn here for the purposes of the act.

2. By the Report of the Trustees of the Sinking Fund, folio 12, under the date of the 25th of August, 1790, is the following entry:

"It is probable that it will be deemed advisable to pay the interest for the year 1791 on the amount of the foreign debt out of foreign loans. There is one now matured for the acceptance of the United States, amounting to three millions of florins, the proceeds of which may be at command in the course of the present year.

The expediency of an acceptance of the loan, and of an application of one third of it, to the purpose of the act, for the reduction of the Public Debt, is under the consideration of the PRESIDENT or THE UNITED STATES."—Alexander Hamilton, Secretary of the Treasury."

This entry affords strong presumption against all the suggestions of the want of instructions from the PRESIDENT, or his ignorance of the proceedings of the Secretary.

3. The Speech of the PRESIDENT delivered to both Houses of Congress, on the 8th of December, 1790, has the following paragraph:

"In conforming to the powers vested in me by the acts of the last session, a Loan of three millions of florins, towards which some provisional measures had previously taken place, has been completed in Holland. The Secretary of the Treasury has my directions to communicate such further particulars as may be requisite for more precise information."

4. The Report of the Secretary in conformity to that direction, dated 24th February, 1791, mentioning terms of the loans and application of moneys.

5. The preamble of the act of 3d March, 1791, already read.

6. In the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury of the receipts and expenditures from the commencement of the Government to the 31st of December, 1791, is the following article of receipts:

"FOREIGN LOANS.

"From the President, Directors, & Co., of the Bank of North America, being the produce of bills of exchange, drawn on the agents for negotiating Foreign loans in Holland - - - - - $239,369 47

"From the President, Directors, & Co., of the Bank of New York, being the produce of bills of exchange, drawn on the agents aforesaid - - - - - 132,121 87

7. In the Treasurer's account, commencing January 1, 1792, and ending on the 31st March, 1792, are found the following entries of receipts:

"On the proceeds of bills of exchange, drawn on Wilhelm & Jan Willink, Nicholas and Jacob Van Stephorst & Hubbard, of Amsterdam, on account of loans made for the United States, per statement, $402,908 89."

In his account commencing on the 1st of April, 1792, and ending on the 30th of June, 1792:

"On the proceeds of bills of exchange, &c., in same words, $1,400,000."

In his account commencing on the 1st of July, 1792, and ending on the 30th of September, 1792:

"On the proceeds of bills of exchange, &c., in same words, $1,000,000."

Mr. B., after reading these vouchers, proceeded: These, Mr. Chairman, are the facts that have convinced my mind, at first much alarmed at the severity of the charges and the positive assertions of gentlemen, that discoveries would be made, showing corruption at the very heart of the Government; these have convinced me fully that this prosecution has been rashly brought forward, without a proper examination of the transaction. My mind, in a conscientious research into the facts, has not been able to raise a doubt, on which to found even a suspicion of the integrity or abilities of the Secretary in this whole negotiation. So far am I from considering those charges supported by testimony, that I consider the conduct of the officer concerned in this transaction, not only wholly cleared up, but the measures he has pursued as stamped with wisdom and official knowledge. So far am I from judging him reprehensible for the manner in which he has negotiated and applied these loans, that I think him deserving of the thankful approbation of his country for his economy and strict attention to the true interests and credit of the United States. I rejoice, sir, that after so full and zealous an investigation, this officer, though unheard, appears to be free from even a suspicion of malconduct in the whole transaction; this is not only honorable to him, but does credit to our country. On the whole, therefore, I am decidedly against the present resolutions, and shall give them my hearty negative.

The House then adjourned until seven o'clock post meridian.

EVENING SESSION—7 P. M.

An engrossed bill making certain appropriations therein mentioned was read the third time, and passed.

The bill sent from the Senate entitled "An act providing for the compensation of Ebenezer Storer," was read twice, and committed.

OFFICIAL CONDUCT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth resolutions contained in the motion of Thursday last, respecting the official conduct of the Secretary of the Treasury. The third resolution being still under consideration, in the words following, viz:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury has violated the law passed the 4th of August, 1790, making appropriations of certain moneys authorized to be borrowed by the said law, in the following particulars, viz: First, by applying a certain portion of the principal borrowed, to the payment of interest falling due upon that principal, which was not authorized by that or any other law. Secondly, by drawing a part of the said moneys into the United States, without the instructions of the President of the United States.

A motion was made, and the question being put, that the House do agree with the Committee of the Whole House in their disagreement to the resolution, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 40, nays 12, as follows:

A motion was then made, and the question put, that the House do agree with the Committee of the Whole House in their disagreement to the fourth resolution, in the words following:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury has deviated from the instructions given him by the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, in executing the authorities for making loans, under the acts of the fourth and twelfth of August, one thousand seven hundred and ninety."

It was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 39, nays 12, as follows:

Another motion was then made, and the question being put, that the House do agree with the Committee of the Whole House in their disagreement to the fifth resolution, in the words following:

Mr. DAYTON said, that, at so late an hour of the night, he was unwilling to detain the Committee unnecessarily. He trusted, however, that they would grant him their indulgence and attention for a few moments before the vote was taken. The resolution upon which the sense of the Committee was about to be expressed contained a direct charge against the Secretary of the Treasury for having "failed to give Congress official information in due time of the moneys drawn by him from Europe into the United States, and of the cause of such drafts." He rose principally to remark, that the arguments which had been used by the advocates of these resolutions, in support of the first which had been discussed, and particularly by the member from Virginia, [Mr. MADISON,] were of such a nature as must, if applied to the one now under debate, compel that gentleman to abandon this charge, and give it his negative, if he would preserve any sort of consistency between his arguments and his vote.

It had been asserted by him, and seemed to be relied upon as an important fact, that the Secretary's agency in respect to foreign loans did not necessarily result from the duties of his office, or the constitution of the Treasury Department, which on that head was silent, but that it was founded upon a special commission and instructions given to that officer by the PRESIDENT, in whom the laws had vested an authority. Under that view, then, it was deemed convenient and proper to regard the PRESIDENT as the principal, and the Secretary as his agent, in order that there might appear to be some foundation for the charge against the latter for having acted in any instance without the express instructions of the former. If this was truly the relationship in which the Secretary stood to the PRESIDENT—if the PRESIDENT's commission was his authority, and the PRESIDENT's instructions his law and guide—if the case of loans was, in respect to the Treasury Department, an extraordinary and extra-official one, not necessarily falling under the head of it, but distinct from the ordinary revenues which bounded his legal authority, as had been declared by a member from Virginia and another from Pennsylvania, Mr. D. called upon those two gentlemen to explain with what propriety the Secretary of the Treasury could be censured for not comprising in his annual official statement of receipts and expenditures of public moneys in his Department a report of his agency in a business unconnected therewith, which he transacted, not in quality of financier, but of agent, and for which he was directly responsible to the PRESIDENT, who was his principal, and who could, and doubtless would, have dismissed him from office, if he had acted unfaithfully. There appeared to his mind (Mr. D. said) such inconsistency and contradiction between the reasoning he had quoted and the resolution on the table, as induced him to believe that all who gave their assent to those arguments, but especially those who had expressed and supported them, would join with him in voting against this proposition.

But there were other reasons (Mr. D. added) which seemed to his judgment to lead irresistibly to the same conclusion. The House of Representatives had already expressed their sense upon this subject. Their resolutions, passed on the 23d of January, without any opposition, evidently recognised certain principles which directly militated against those contained in this resolution. The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES was there requested to communicate the information wanted. It is well known to every member that this mode was never adopted in any call for information respecting our fiscal concerns, or other matters relating to the ordinary business of the Department, but that it was always observed when the information wanted was of such a nature as to render it improper for either of the subordinate Executive officers to give it without the order of their head, the PRESIDENT. Shall the Secretary of the Treasury, then, be censured for not reporting to Congress transactions unasked for, which it is admitted he was not at liberty to report, even upon the order of the House, without the sanction and express direction of the PRESIDENT? Shall he be censured for not giving information of the moneys drawn by him from Europe, and of the causes of making such drafts, when the very laws which authorized the loan of fourteen millions, point out the causes, declare the purposes, and designate the appropriation? The act of the 12th of August directed the application of two millions to the purchase of the Public Debt. Was not this country the only proper place for that operation? And would any one say that those purchases could be made advantageously for the United States unless the money was drawn here? Was there not a discretionary power given to the Executive over the other twelve millions destined to the payment of our debt to France, in virtue of which, such portion of it might be drawn here as might be deemed consistent with the public good? Had not events fully justified Congress in having granted that discretionary power, and the Executive in the use they had made of it? Through the instrumentality of those drafts, we had been enabled to purchase nearly two millions of our own debt, and to pay in this country (principally in our own produce) about half a million of the French debt, by which the Colony of St. Domingo had been relieved from its sufferings, and the Government and people of France highly gratified and benefited. Far from meriting censure for arrangements so provident and beneficial, the man who had effected them was (Mr. D. asserted) entitled to the commendation and thanks of his countrymen. That the Secretary had discharged both his ordinary and extraordinary duties with ability and integrity, had been directly denied by none; that he had misconstrued the act of the 4th of August, and departed from its true spirit, had been urged and supported by very few; but that the arrangements which he made had proved beneficial to France, and highly favorable to the interests of the United States, seemed to have been admitted by all, even by the very gentlemen who had questioned the legality of them.

Mr. D. concluded with saying that he was happy to find he should be with a very large majority of the House in the vote that the Secretary was not chargeable with the omission and failure which the resolution aimed to fix upon him.

It was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 33, nays 15, as follows:

YEAS.—Fisher Ames, Robert Barnwell, Egbert Benson, Elias Boudinot, Shearjashub Bourne, Benjamin Bourne, Jonathan Dayton, Thomas Fitzsimons, El-

Another motion was then made, and the question being put, that the House do agree with the Committee of the Whole House in their disagreement to the sixth resolution, in the words following:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury has, without the instruction of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, drawn more moneys, borrowed in Holland, into the United States, than the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES was authorized to draw, under the act of the twelfth of August, one thousand seven hundred and ninety, which act appropriated two millions of dollars only, when borrowed, to the purchase of the Public Debt; and that he has emitted to discharge an essential duty of his office, in failing to give official information to the Commissioners for purchasing the Public Debt, of the various sums drawn from time to time, suggested by him to have been intended for the purchase of the Public Debt:—

It was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 33, nays 8, as follows:

NAYS.—John Baptist Ashe, Abraham Baldwin, William Findley, William B. Giles, Nathaniel Macon, James Madison, John Francis Mercer, and Josiah Parker.

Another motion was then made, and the question being put, that the House do agree with the Committee of the Whole House in their disagreement to the seventh resolution, in the words following:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury did not consult the public interest, in negotiating a Loan with the Bank of the United States, and drawing therefrom four hundred thousand dollars, at five per centum per annum, when a greater sum of public money was deposited in various banks, at the respective periods of making the respective drafts:—

It was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 33, nays 8, as follows:

NAYS.—John Baptist Ashe, Abraham Baldwin, William Findley, William B. Giles, Nathaniel Macon, James Madison, John Francis Mercer, and Josiah Parker.

Another motion was then made, and the question being put, that the House do agree with the Committee of the Whole House in their disagreement to the eighth resolution, in the words following:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury has been guilty of an indecorum to this House, in undertaking to judge of its motives in calling for information, which was demandable of him, from the constitution of his office, and in failing to give all the necessary information within his knowledge relatively to the subjects of reference made to him, of the nineteenth of January, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, and of the twenty-second of November, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, during the present session:—

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH said, that, after the vote which had just prevailed by so considerable a majority on the preceding resolutions, the Committee could not, with any propriety, criminate the Secretary of the Treasury for failing to give the information alluded to, because by that vote it had been established that the Secretary had only acted under the authority of the PRESIDENT, and conformably to his instructions. If there had been any omission to communicate information to Congress, that omission was surely not chargeable to the Secretary. But it had been already clearly shown, by documents in the possession of the House, that the necessary information had been communicated. The Treasurer's accounts, which had been from time to time laid before the House, exhibited the amount of moneys proceeding from the sale of bills, and the Secretary's Report of February, 1791, conveyed full information of the drawing. It was true, there was a sum of about $600,000, the proceeds of bills which, as had been remarked by a gentleman, [Mr. MADISON,] did not appear in the Treasurer's account, but this was owing to the sales of the bills by the Bank not having been closed at the time the last quarterly account was rendered, and consequently that sum could not appear in the Treasurer's account.

[Mr. MADISON said, he had not meant to blame the Treasurer.]

Mr. SMITH proceeded. The gentleman, however, had attributed misconduct to the Secretary, for withholding information of the amount of moneys in the Treasury accruing from Foreign loans, when directed by the House, January 19th, 1792, to report whether the existing revenues were adequate to face the additional expense of the Indian war. Mr. S. could not forbear expressing great surprise at this remark of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MADISON,] when he recollected what had been just before said by the same gentleman in support of the former resolution. The gentleman, on that occasion, in his attempt to disprove the right of the Secretary, ex officio, to superintend the moneys derived from the Foreign loans, had endeavored to establish a nice distinction between the ordinary internal revenues of the country, and the resources resulting from Foreign loans. The law constituting the Treasury Department, he had said, gave the Secretary power only over the revenues, which embraced only the ordinary resources, whereas loans were distinct things, the management of which was specially intrusted by law to the Supreme Magistrate, and in relation to which the Secretary could exercise no authority whatever that was not derived from the President. The gentleman now argued that the Secretary was blameable in not giving information of the state of these extraordinary resources, which were not within his Department, when only called upon to state the amount of the ordinary revenues, which were within his Department. He left it to the gentleman to reconcile this contradiction, for certainly his doctrine was erroneous on the former occasion, or it must be so now. If the moneys obtained from Foreign loans were to be deemed the revenues of the country, then they fell of course under the management of the Head of the Treasury Department, and it was wrong in the gentleman to impute misconduct to the Secretary for exercising a legal authority; if, on the contrary, those moneys were viewed as an extra resource, and not within the purview of the Secretary's functions, then it was wrong to censure him for not communicating a state of those moneys, when required only to report the ordinary revenues.

Without admitting the soundness of the distinction set up by the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. S. said that it was never in the intention of the House, nor in the idea of any individual member, to call for a state of the moneys proceeding from the Foreign loans, when they passed the order of the 19th January, 1792. That order was in these terms:

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before this House such information with respect to the finances of the United States, as will enable the Legislature to judge whether any additional revenue will be necessary in consequence of the proposed increase of the military establishment."

This call was fully complied with, for the Secretary laid before the House an estimate of the internal revenues—which, unquestionably, were the only revenues in contemplation of the House at the time—and the House being satisfied that they were incompetent, laid additional duties. The House knew, as well as the Secretary, that loans had been made, and that moneys had, under them, been drawn into this country; but they knew that those moneys had been specially appropriated to the Sinking Fund, and it never entered into the idea of any member to divert them from that beneficial object, in order to apply them to the current service. It was not to be supposed that the Secretary would have recommended such a diversion. To impute blame to him for not communicating the amount of moneys drawn from time to time, there must have been some law or order of the House requiring the communication, or it must have been necessary to some object depending before the House. What law or order of the House made it necessary? None. The laws authorized the loans, and prescribed their objects; the rest was mere Executive business; and no communication was necessary to any measure depending before the House.

But though the Secretary would not have been censurable for omitting to give the information, the truth was, that the President's Speech of 8th December, 1790, the Secretary's Report of 25th February, and the act of the 3d of March, 1791, were conclusive proofs that the Legislature knew that the proceeds of the loans were in a train of being brought to the United States, and the accounts of receipts and expenditures presented in the first week of the session, informed the House that a large sum had been drawn for, and the Treasurer's quarterly account contained further information on the subject, all which was prior to any call of the House for such information. Hence, Mr. S. deduced, that it was not a fact that the Secretary had failed to give the information, as stated in the resolution, and that had he even so failed, he would not have been censurable for a breach of an essential duty of his office. It had been said, by a member from Pennsylvania, [Mr. FENDLEY,] that the lateness of the information from the Secretary made it inconvenient to go into an inquiry of his official conduct so near the close of the session. To this, Mr. S. replied, that he did not expect such a remark from that quarter of the House. If the gentleman had not been prepared for the inquiry, or thought it an improper season to enter upon it, why did he second the motion for bringing forward the charges? If suspicion had so long existed against the integrity of the Secretary, why was not reformation called for at the beginning of the session? Why was the call delayed till the session was within a few weeks of its termination? It was admitted that the Secretary had obeyed the order of the House with wonderful alacrity and promptitude. It was indeed strange that the gentleman who brought forward the charges, should be the first to complain that there was not time for their consideration.

Mr. S. concluded by noticing the observation of Mr. MERCER and Mr. MADISON, that the opinion of the House on the preceding resolutions would not change the truth of facts, and that the public would ultimately decide whether the Secretary's conduct was criminal or not. This, said Mr. S., was like the conduct of a prosecutor, who having chosen his jurisdiction, and being nonsuited, wished to appeal to another tribunal. Why were the resolutions brought before the House? Was it not to substantiate the truth of them by a vote? And had the prosecution succeeded, would the Secretary have had an appeal to the public? No; the resolutions would have been sent to the PRESIDENT, and the Secretary would have been removed, disgraced, and ruined forever, without appeal.

Mr. FINDLEY said: Since these resolutions were laid on the table, I have, upon reflection, been convinced of the impropriety of connecting it with the others, or of treating this part of the Secretary's conduct in this manner. It is solely in the power of this House to punish all contemptuous or indecent treatment of its authority or orders; for this purpose, it is not necessary to lay our opinions in this way before the public, report them to the PRESIDENT, or make them a foundation of impeachment. We might have ordered him to the bar of this House, and obliged him to make proper acknowledgments. I have known some high in office treated in this manner for infinitely less impropriety. It is true, in the case to which I allude, I thought the affair was carried too far; the offence was only a letter to the House respecting the conduct of a member, whom the officer charged with making free with his character in an insidious manner among the members. I would be sorry to see this House pursue such trifles. Though the indecorum of the Secretary to this House is of a higher nature, I think it is best to treat it with silent contempt; I will vote against this resolution, lest it should be interpreted as a relinquishment of our authority to punish contempts.

The question was then taken, and it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 34, nays 7, as follows:

SATURDAY, MARCH 2.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying his report on the petition of Lewis Garanger, on behalf of his brother, Charles Garanger; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. FITZSIMONS, from the committee to whom was referred the Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, stating certain inaccuracies in printing the statements communicated by his first and second Letters lately presented, on the subject of Foreign loans, and expressing a wish that some regulation may be adopted to enable the Head of the Treasury Department to secure the fidelity and correctness of the printed copies of the reports which shall hereafter be made to the House, and shall be committed to the press by their order, made a report; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

"That the committee have examined into the circumstances stated in the Letter, and find "That the standing order of the Clerk of this House to the printer, is, to send the proof sheets of all reports and statements to the Department from whence they were made, and that this practice has been generally followed.

"That it has been discontinued during the present session (so far as respects the Secretary of the Treasury) from an opinion of the printer, that the delay which the examination would occasion, might interfere with the intention of the House, of having the business speedily accomplished.

"It did not appear to the committee, that any unnecessary delay had taken place at the office of the Comptroller, by reason of the examination of the proof sheets, nor in the printer, in the execution of his business.

"The committee are of opinion, that it is not necessary for them to recommend any new regulation for the future execution of this business; but, in order to rectify the errors which have taken place in the printed reports and statements, the committee recommend the following resolution:

"Resolved, That there be printed under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, three hundred copies of the reports and statements made by him during the present session, and that the same be delivered to the Clerk of this House."

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives shall be deemed to continue in office until a successor be appointed.

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper and assistant Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives shall be deemed to continue in office until successors to those officers, respectively, be appointed.

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House be authorized to pay to Thomas Claxton, out of the money appropriated to defray the contingent expenses of this House, the sum of eighty dollars, for extra services.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill making addition to the compensation of the Auditor of the Treasury, and the Commissioner of the Revenue; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

And on the question, that the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 24, nays 17, as follows:

NAYS.—Abraham Clark, William B. Giles, James Gordon, Christopher Greenup, William Barry Grove, James Hillhouse, Aaron Kitchell, Samuel Livermore, Nathaniel Macon, Nathaniel Niles, Alexander D. Orr, Peter Sylvester, Jeremiah Smith, Jonathan Sturges, Thomas Sumpter, Thomas Tredwell, and Artemas Ward.

Mr. LIVERMORE, from the managers appointed on the part of this House to attend the conference with the Senate, on the subject-matter of the amendments depending between the two Houses, to the bill, entitled "An act fixing the time for the next annual meeting of Congress," made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate, informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Simeon Thayer," with an amendment; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the said amendment, and, the same being read, was disagreed to—yeas 17, nays 21, as follows:

YEAS.—Fisher Ames, Robert Barnwell, Egbert Benson, Shearjashub Bourne, Benjamin Bourne, Nicholas Gilman, Andrew Gregg, Thomas Hartley, John Laurence, Richard Bland Lee, Samuel Livermore, Josiah Parker, Theodore Sedgwick, William Smith, George Thacher, Thomas Tredwell, and Francis Willis.

NAYS.—Elias Boudinot, Abraham Clark, William Findley, Thomas Fitzsimons, Christopher Greenup, William Barry Grove, Daniel Heister, Aaron Kitchell, Nathaniel Macon, James Madison, Andrew Moore, Frederick Augustus Muhlenberg, William Vans Murray, Nathaniel Niles, Alexander D. Orr, Peter Sylvester, Jeremiah Smith, John Steele, Jonathan Sturges, Thomas Sumpter, and Hugh Williamson.

A message from the Senate, informed the House that the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES will, on Monday next, take the oath of office required by the Constitution, in the Senate Chamber, at twelve o'clock.

An engrossed bill making addition to the compensation of the Auditor of the Treasury, and the Commissioner of the Revenue, was read the third time and passed.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury report to Congress, on the first Monday of January next, the number of stills in the respective districts, distinguishing those that are employed in distilling spirits from materials of the growth of the United States; and also, the nett product of revenue arising from the respective Districts and States, particularizing the drawbacks, and distinguishing the Foreign from American materials, and the product by the gallon, month, and year. Also, the number of officers, and amount of their salaries.

The House then adjourned until seven o'clock post meridian.

EVENING SESSION—7 P. M.

The SPEAKER laid before the House, a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying a copy of a letter from the Commissioner of the Revenue to him; also, a report of the general state of the revenue on stills, and on spirits distilled, within the United States, made in pursuance of the order of this House, of the eighth of May last; which were read, and laid on the table.

Ordered, That the Clerk of this House be directed, to suffer such persons as have given in statements of their public conduct, to the committee appointed to inquire into the causes of the failure of the expedition under General St. Clair, to take copies of all or any such statements.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill marking farther provision for securing and collecting the duties on Foreign and Domestic distilled spirits, stills, wines, and teas; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and were discharged from the further consideration of the said bill.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of War, accompanying his reports on sundry petitions; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate, informed the House that the Senate having completed the Legislative business before them, are now about to adjourn.

Resolved, That Mr. BOUDINOT, Mr. SEDGWICK, and Mr. HINDMAN, be appointed a committee, jointly, with a committee on the part of the Senate, to wait on the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, and inform him that Congress is ready to adjourn without day, unless he may have any farther communications to make to them.

A message from the Senate, informed the House that the Senate have agreed to the resolution of this House for the appointment of a joint committee, to wait on the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, and inform him of the intended recess of Congress, and have appointed a committee for that purpose, on their part.

On a motion made and seconded,

"That the thanks of the House of Representatives be presented to JONATHAN TRUMBULL, in testimony of their approbation of his conduct in the Chair, and in the execution of the difficult and important trust reposed in him, as SPEAKER of the said House,"

It was resolved unanimously: Whereupon, Mr. SPEAKER made his acknowledgments to the House, in manner following:

"GENTLEMEN: You have made me very happy by this testimony of your approbation of my conduct in the Chair. I feel, at the same time, an additional pleasure in the opportunity of rendering to you my sincere acknowledgments for the kind candor and indulgence, as well as the constant aid and support, which I have experienced in the performance of the duty which you were pleased to assign me. Be assured, gentlemen, I shall ever retain a grateful sense of your goodness—and you will suffer me to add, that my best wishes for your welfare and happiness, in public and private life, will attend each member of this honorable body."

Mr. BOUDINOT, from the Joint Committee appointed to wait on the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, and inform him of the intended recess of Congress, reported that the Committee had performed that duty, and that the PRESIDENT was pleased to say he had no farther communication to make during the present session: Whereupon, Mr. SPEAKER adjourned the House sine die.

APPENDIX

TO THE HISTORY OF THE SECOND CONGRESS,

COMPRISING THE MOST IMPORTANT DOCUMENTS ORIGINATING DURING THAT CONGRESS, AND THE PUBLIC ACTS PASSED BY IT.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Nov. 4, 1791.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a Report to the House of Representatives, accompanying certain estimates of sums necessary to be appropriated for various objects therein specified, including the service of the year 1792.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your most obedient and humble servant,

ALEXANDER HAMILTON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

HON. JONATHAN TRUMBULL, Esq.,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

ESTIMATES OF APPROPRIATIONS.

The Secretary of the Treasury respectfully reports to the House of Representatives the Estimates herewith transmitted, Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4:

The first relating to the Civil List, or the expenditure for the support of Government during the year 1792, (including incidental and contingent expenses of the several Departments and offices,) amounting to - - - $328,653 56

The second relating to certain liquidated claims upon the Treasury; to certain deficiencies in former estimates for the current service, and to a provision in aid of the fund heretofore appropriated for the payment of certain officers of the Courts, jurors, witnesses, &c. - - - 197,119 49

The third relating to the Department of War, showing the stated expenditure of that Department for the year 1792 - - - 357,731 61

The amount of a year's pensions to invalids - - - 87,463 60

Pay and subsistence to sundry officers, for which no appropriation has yet been made - - - 10,490 36

Arrearages due upon Indian Affairs for the year 1791, and the sum supposed to be necessary for the year 1792 - - - 39,424 71

Expenses incurred for the defensive protection of the frontiers for the years 1790 and 1791, and for which no appropriation has yet been made - - - 37,339 48

Total - - - $1,058,222 81

As appears by No. 4, which contains a summary of the three preceding ones—exhibiting in one view the total sum as above stated, for which an appropriation is requisite.

The funds out of which the said appropriation may be made are, first, the sum of six hundred thousand dollars reserved annually out of the duties on Imports and Tonnage, by the act making provision for the Debt of the United States, for the support of the Government thereof; and, secondly, such surplus as shall have accrued to the end of the present year upon the revenues heretofore established, over and above the sums necessary for the payment of interest on the Public Debt during the same year, and for the satisfying of other prior appropriations.

Judging from the returns heretofore received at the Treasury, there is good ground to conclude that that surplus, together with the above mentioned sum of six hundred thousand dollars, will be adequate to the object.

All which is humbly submitted.

ALEXANDER HAMILTON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

 JOSEPH NOURSE, Register.

REPORT ON MANUFACTURES.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY, in obedience to the order of the House of Representatives of the 15th day of January, 1790, has applied his attention, at as early a period as his other duties would permit, to the subject of Manufactures; and particularly to the means of promoting such as will tend to render the United States independent of Foreign Nations, for military and other essential supplies. And he thereupon respectfully submits the following Report:

The expediency of encouraging manufactures in the United States, which was not long since deemed very questionable, appears at this time to be pretty generally admitted. The embarrassments which have obstructed the progress of our external trade, have led to serious reflections on the necessity of enlarging the sphere of our domestic commerce: the restrictive regulations, which in foreign markets abridge the vent of the increasing surplus of our agricultural produce, serve to beget an earnest desire that a more extensive demand for that surplus may be created at home. And the complete success which has rewarded manufacturing enterprise, in some valuable branches, conspiring with the promising symptoms which attend some less mature essays in others, justify a hope that the obstacles to the growth of this species of industry are less formidable than they were apprehended to be; and that it is not difficult to find, in its further extension, a full indemnification for any external disadvantages which are or may be experienced, as well as an accession of resources favorable to national independence and safety.

There still are, nevertheless, respectable patrons of opinions, unfriendly to the encouragement of manufactures. The following are, substantially, the arguments by which these opinions are defended:

"In every country, (say those who entertain them,) agriculture is the most beneficial and productive object of human industry. This position, generally, if not universally true, applies with peculiar emphasis to the United States, on account of their immense tracts of fertile territory, uninhabited and unimproved. Nothing can afford so advantageous an employment for capital and labor, as the conversion of this extensive wilderness into cultivated farms. Nothing, equally with this, can contribute to the population, strength, and real riches of the country."

"To endeavor, by the extraordinary patronage of Government, to accelerate the growth of manufactures, is, in fact, to endeavor, by force and art, to transfer the natural current of industry from a more to a less beneficial channel. Whatever has such a tendency, must necessarily be unwise: indeed it can hardly ever be wise in a Government to attempt to give a direction to the industry of its citizens. This, under the quick-sighted guidance of private interest, will, if left to itself, infallibly find its own way to the most profitable employment; and it is by such employment that the public prosperity will be most effectually promoted. To leave industry to itself, therefore, is, in almost every case, the soundest as well as the simplest policy."

"This policy is not only recommended to the United States by considerations which affect all nations; it is, in a manner, dictated to them by the imperious force of a very peculiar situation. The smallness of their population, compared with their territory; the constant allurements to emigration from the settled to the unsettled parts of the country; the facility with which the less independent condition of an artisan can be exchanged for the more independent condition of a farmer; these, and similar causes, conspire to produce, and for a length of time must continue to occasion, a scarcity of hands for manufacturing occupation, and dearth of labor generally. To these disadvantages for the prosecution of manufactures, a deficiency of pecuniary capital being added, the prospect of a successful competition with the manufactures of Europe must be regarded as little less than desperate. Extensive manufactures can only be the offspring of a redundant, at least of a full population. Until the latter shall characterize the situation of this country, it is vain to hope for the former."

"If, contrary to the natural course of things, an unseasonable and premature spring can be given to certain fabrics by heavy duties, prohibitions, bounties, or by other forced expedients, this will only be to sacrifice the interests of the community to those of particular classes. Besides the misdirection of labor, a virtual monopoly will be given to the persons employed on such fabrics; and an enhancement of price, the inevitable consequence of every monopoly, must be defrayed at the expense of the other parts of the society. It is far preferable that those persons should be engaged in the cultivation of the earth, and that we should procure, in exchange for its productions, the commodities with which foreigners are able to supply us in greater perfection, and upon better terms."

This mode of reasoning is founded upon facts and principles which have certainly respectable pretensions. If it had governed the conduct of nations more generally than it has done, there is room to suppose that it might have carried them faster to prosperity and greatness, than they have attained by the pursuit of maxims too widely opposite. Most general theories, however, admit of numerous exceptions; and there are few, if any, of the political kind, which do not blend a considerable portion of error with the truths they inculcate.

In order to an accurate judgment how far that which has been just stated ought to be deemed liable to similar imputation, it is necessary to advert carefully to the considerations which plead in favor of manufactures, and which appear to recommend the special and positive encouragement of them in certain cases, and under certain reasonable limitations.

It ought readily to be conceded that the cultivation of the earth, as the primary and most certain source of national supply; as the immediate and chief source of subsistence to man; as the principal source of those materials which constitute the nutriment of other kinds of labor; as including a state most favorable to the freedom and independence of the human mind; one, perhaps, most conducive to the multiplication of the human species; has intrinsically a strong claim to pre-eminence over every other kind of industry.

But, that it has a title to anything like an exclusive predilection, in any country, ought to be admitted with great caution. That it is even more productive than every branch of industry, requires more evidence than has yet been given in support of the position. That its real interests, precious and important as without the help of exaggeration they truly are, will be advanced rather than injured by the due encouragement of manufactures, may, it is believed, be satisfactorily demonstrated. And it is also believed, that the expediency of such encouragement, in a general view, may be shown to be recommended by the most cogent and persuasive motives of national policy.

It has been maintained that agriculture is not only the most productive, but the only productive species of industry. The reality of this suggestion, in either respect, has, however, not been verified by any accurate detail of facts and calculations; and the general arguments, which are adduced to prove it, are rather subtle and paradoxical than solid or convincing. Those which maintain its exclusive productiveness are to this effect:

Labor, bestowed upon the cultivation of land, produces enough not only to replace all the necessary expenses incurred in the business, and to maintain the persons who are employed in it, but to afford, together with the ordinary profit on the stock or capital of the farmer, a nett surplus or rent for the landlord or proprietor of the soil. But the labor of artificers does nothing more than replace the stock which employs them, or which furnishes materials, tools, and wages, and yield the ordinary profit upon that stock. It yields nothing equivalent to the rent of land. Neither does it add anything to the total value of the whole annual produce of the land and labor of the country. The additional value given to those parts of the produce of land which are wrought into manufactures, is counterbalanced by the value of those other parts of that produce, which are consumed by the manufacturers. It can therefore only be by saving or parsimony, not by the positive productiveness of their labor, that the classes of artificers can in any degree augment the revenue of the society. To this it has been answered—

1. "That, inasmuch as it is acknowledged that manufacturing labor reproduces a value equal to that which is expended or consumed in carrying it on, and continues in existence the original stock or capital employed, it ought, on that account alone, to escape being considered, as wholly unproductive: that though it should be admitted, as alleged, that the consumption of the produce of the soil by the classes of artificers or manufacturers is exactly equal to the value added by their labor to the materials upon which it is exerted, yet it would not thence follow that it added nothing to the revenue of the society, or to the aggregate value of the annual produce of its land and labor. If the consumption for any given period amounted to a given sum, and the increased value of the produce manufactured in the same period to a like sum, the total amount of the consumption and production during that period would be equal to the two sums, and consequently double the value of the agricultural produce consumed. And though the increment of value produced by the classes of artificers should at no time exceed the value of the produce of the land consumed by them, yet there would be at every moment, in consequence of their labor, a greater value of goods in the market than would exist independent of it."

2. "That the position, that artificers can augment the revenue of a society only by parsimony, is true in no other sense than in one which is equally applicable to husbandmen or cultivators. It may be alike affirmed, of all these classes, that the fund acquired by their labor and destined for their support, is not, in an ordinary way, more than equal to it. And hence it will follow, that augmentations of the wealth or capital of the community (except in the instances of some extraordinary dexterity or skill) can only proceed, with respect to any of them, from the savings of the more thrifty and parsimonious."

3. "That the annual produce of the land and labor of a country can only be increased in two ways, by some improvement in the productive powers of the useful labor which actually exists within it, or by some increase in the quantity of such labor. That with regard to the first, the labor of artificers being capable of greater subdivision and simplicity of operation than that of cultivators, it is susceptible, in a proportionably greater degree, of improvement in its productive powers, whether to be derived from an accession of skill, or from the application of ingenious machinery; in which particular, therefore, the labor employed in the culture of land can pretend to no advantage over that engaged in manufactures. That with regard to an augmentation of the quantity of useful labor, this (excluding adventitious circumstances) must depend essentially upon an increase of capital; which, again, must depend upon the savings made out of the revenues of those who furnish or manage that which is at any time employed, whether in agriculture or in manufactures, or in any other way.²

But, while the exclusive productiveness of agricultural labor has been thus denied and refuted, the superiority of its productiveness has been conceded without hesitation. As this concession involves a point of considerable magnitude in relation to maxims of public administration, the grounds on which it rests are worthy of a distinct and particular examination.

One of the arguments made use of in support of the idea, may be pronounced both quaint and superficial; it amounts to this: That in the productions of the soil Nature co-operates with man, and that the effect of their joint labor must be greater than that of the labor of man alone. This, however, is far from being a necessary inference. It is very conceivable, that the labor of man alone, laid out upon a work requiring great skill and art to bring it to perfection, may be more productive, in value, than the labor of Nature and man combined, when directed towards more simple operations and objects: and when it is recollected to what an extent the agency of Nature, in the application of the mechanical powers, is made auxiliary to the prosecution of manufactures, the suggestion which has been noticed loses even the appearance of plausibility.

It might also be observed, with a contrary view, that the labor employed in agriculture is in a great measure periodical and occasional, depending on seasons liable to various and long intermissions; while that occupied in many manufactures is constant and regular, extending through the year, embracing, in some instances, night as well as day. It is also probable that there are, among the cultivators of land, more examples of remissness than among artificers. The farmer, from the peculiar fertility of his land, or some other favorable circumstance, may frequently obtain a livelihood, even with a considerable degree of carelessness in the mode of cultivation; but the artisan can with difficulty effect the same object, without exerting himself pretty equally with all those who are engaged in the same pursuit. And if it may likewise be assumed as a fact that manufactures open a wider field to exertions of ingenuity than agriculture, it would not be a strained conjecture, that the labor employed in the former being at once more constant, more uniform, and more ingenious, than that which is employed in the latter, will be found at the same time more productive. But it is not meant to lay stress on observations of this nature: they ought only to serve as a counterbalance to those of a similar complexion. Circumstances so vague and general, as well as so abstract, can afford little instruction in a matter of this kind.

Another, and that which seems to be the principal argument offered for the superior productiveness of agricultural labor, turns upon the allegation that labor employed on manufactures yields nothing equivalent to the rent of land; or to that nett surplus, as it is called, which accrues to the proprietor of the soil. But this distinction, important as it has been deemed, appears rather verbal than substantial. It is easily discernible that what, in the first instance, is divided into two parts, under the denominations of the ordinary profit of the stock of the farmer and rent to the landlord, is, in the second instance, united, under the general appellation of the ordinary profit on the stock of the undertaker; and that this formal or verbal distribution constitutes the whole difference in the two cases. It seems to have been overlooked that the land is, itself, a stock or capital, advanced or lent by its owner to the occupier or tenant, and that the rent he receives is only the ordinary profit of a certain stock in land, not managed by the proprietor himself, but by another to whom he lends or lets it, and who, on his part, advances a second capital to stock and improve the land, upon which he also receives the usual profit. The rent of the landlord and the profit of the farmer, are, therefore, nothing more than the ordinary profits of two capitals, belonging to two different persons, and united in the cultivation of a farm. As in the other case; the surplus which arises upon any manufactory, after replacing the expenses of carrying it on, answers to the ordinary profits of one or more capitals engaged in the prosecution of such manufactory: it is said one or more capitals, because, in fact, the same thing which is contemplated in the case of the farm, sometimes happens in that of a manufactory. There is one who furnishes a part of the capital, or lends a part of the money by which it is carried on, and another who carries it on, with the addition of his own capital. Out of the surplus which remains after defraying expenses, an interest is paid to the money-lender for the portion of the capital furnished by him, which exactly agrees with the rent paid to the landlord; and the residue of that surplus constitutes the profit of the undertaker or manufacturer, and agrees with what is denominated the ordinary profits on the stock of the farmer. Both together make the ordinary profits of two capitals employed in a manufactory; as, in the other case, the rent of the landlord and the revenue of the farmer compose the ordinary profits of two capitals employed in the cultivation of a farm. The rent, therefore, accruing to the proprietor of the land, far from being a criterion of exclusive productiveness, as has been argued, is no criterion even of superior productiveness. The question must still be, whether the surplus, after defraying expenses of a given capital employed in the purchase and improvement of a piece of land, is greater or less than that of a like capital employed in the prosecution of a manufactory? or whether the whole value produced from a given capital and a given quantity of labor, employed in one way, be greater or less than the whole value produced from an equal capital and an equal quantity of labor employed in the other way? or, rather, perhaps, whether the business of agriculture or that of manufactures will yield the greatest product, according to a compound ratio of the quantity of the capital and the quantity of labor, which are employed in the one or in the other?

The solution of either of these questions is not easy; it involves numerous and complicated details, depending on an accurate knowledge of the objects to be compared. It is not known that the comparison has ever yet been made upon sufficient data properly ascertained and analyzed. To be able to make it on the present occasion, with satisfactory precision, would demand more previous inquiry and investigation than there has been hitherto either leisure or opportunity to accomplish. Some essays, however, have been made, towards acquiring the requisite information, which have rather served to throw doubt upon than to confirm the hypothesis under examination. But it ought to be acknowledged that they have been too little diversified, and are too imperfect, to authorize a definitive conclusion either way; leading rather to probable conjecture than to certain deduction. They render it probable, that there are various branches of manufactures in which a given capital will yield a greater total product, and a considerably greater nett product, than an equal capital invested in the purchase and improvement of lands; and that there are also some branches in which both the gross and the nett produce will exceed that of agricultural industry, according to a compound ratio of capital and labor. But it is on this last point that there appears to be the greatest room for doubt. It is far less difficult to infer, generally, that the nett produce of capital engaged in manufacturing enterprises is greater than that of capital engaged in agriculture.

The foregoing suggestions are not designed to inculcate an opinion that manufacturing industry is more productive than that of agriculture. They are intended rather to show that the reverse of this proposition is not ascertained; that the general arguments which are brought to establish it are not satisfactory; and, consequently, that a supposition of the superior productiveness of tillage ought to be no obstacle to listening to any substantial inducements to the encouragement of manufactures, which may be otherwise perceived to exist, through an apprehension that they may have a tendency to divert labor from a more to a less profitable employment. It is extremely probable, that, on a full and accurate development of the matter, on the ground of fact and calculation, it would be discovered that there is no material difference between the aggregate productiveness of the one and of the other kind of industry; and that the propriety of the encouragements which may in any case be proposed to be given to either, ought to be determined upon considerations irrelative to any comparison of that nature.

But, without contending for the superior productiveness of manufacturing industry, it may conduce to a better judgment of the policy which ought to be pursued respecting its encouragement, to contemplate the subject under some additional aspects, tending not only to confirm the idea that this kind of industry has been improperly represented as unproductive in itself, but to evince, in addition, that the establishment and diffusion of manufactures have the effect of rendering the total mass of useful and productive labor, in a community, greater than it would otherwise be. In prosecuting this discussion, it may be necessary briefly to resume and review some of the topics which have been already touched.

To affirm that the labor of the manufacturer is unproductive, because he consumes as much of the produce of land as he adds value to the raw materials which he manufactures, is not better founded than it would be to affirm that the labor of the farmer, which furnishes materials to the manufacturer, is unproductive, because he consumes an equal value of manufactured articles. Each furnishes a certain portion of the produce of his labor to the other, and each destroys a correspondent portion of the produce of the labor of the other. In the mean time, the maintenance of two citizens, instead of one, is going on; the State has two members, instead of one; and they together consume twice the value of what is produced from the land. If, instead of a farmer and artificer, there were a farmer only, he would be under the necessity of devoting a part of his labor to the fabrication of clothing and other articles, which he would procure of the artificer, in the case of there being such a person, and of course he would be able to devote less labor to the cultivation of his farm, and would draw from it a proportionably less product. The whole quantity of production, in this state of things, in provisions, raw materials, and manufactures, would certainly not exceed in value the amount of what would be produced in provisions and raw materials only, if there were an artificer as well as a farmer. Again: if there were both an artificer and a farmer, the latter would be left at liberty to pursue exclusively the cultivation of his farm. A greater quantity of provisions and raw materials would of course be produced, equal, at least, as has been already observed, to the whole amount of the provisions, raw materials, and manufactures, which would exist on a contrary supposition. The artificer, at the same time, would be going on in the production of manufactured commodities, to an amount sufficient not only to repay the farmer in those commodities for the provisions and materials which were procured from him, but to furnish the artificer himself with a supply of similar commodities for his own use. Thus, then, there would be two quantities or values in existence, instead of one; and the revenue and consumption would be double in one case what it would be in the other.

If, in place of both these suppositions, there were supposed to be two farmers and no artificer, each of whom applied a part of his labor to the culture of land, and another part to the fabrication of manufactures; in this case, the portion of the labor of both bestowed upon land would produce the same quantity of provisions and raw materials only, as would be produced by the entire sum of the labor of one applied in the same manner, and the portion of the labor of both bestowed upon manufactures, would produce the same quantities of manufactures only, as would be produced by the entire sum of the labor of one applied in the same manner. Hence, the produce of the labor of the two farmers would not be greater than the produce of the labor of the farmer and artificer; and hence it results, that the labor of the artificer is as positively productive as that of the farmer, and, as positively, augments the revenue of the society.

The labor of the artificer replaces to the farmer that portion of his labor with which he provides the materials of exchange with the artificer, and which he would otherwise have been compelled to apply to manufactures; and while the artificer thus enables the farmer to enlarge his stock of agricultural industry, a portion of which he purchases for his own use, he also supplies himself with the manufactured articles of which he stands in need. He does still more; besides this equivalent, which he gives for the portion of agricultural labor consumed by him, and this supply of manufactured commodities for his own consumption, he furnishes still a surplus, which compensates for the use of the capital advanced either by himself or some other person, for carrying on the business. This is the ordinary profit of the stock employed in the manufactory, and is, in every sense, as effective an addition to the income of the society as the rent of land.

The produce of the labor of the artificer, consequently, may be regarded as composed of three parts; one by which the provisions for his subsistence and the materials for his work are purchased of the farmer, one by which he supplies himself with manufactured necessaries, and a third which constitutes the profit on the stock employed. The two last portions seem to have been overlooked in the system, which represents manufacturing industry as barren and unproductive.

In the course of the preceding illustrations, the products of equal quantity of the labor of the farmer and artificer have been treated as if equal to each other. But this is not to be understood as intending to assert any such precise equality. It is merely a manner of expression adopted for the sake of simplicity and perspicuity.

Whether the value of the produce of the labor of the farmer be somewhat more or less than that of the artificer, is not material to the main scope of the argument which hitherto has only aimed at showing that the one, as well as the other, occasions a positive augmentation of the total produce and revenue of the society.

It is now proper to proceed a step further, and to enumerate the principal circumstances, from which it may be inferred. That manufacturing establishments not only occasion a positive augmentation of the produce and revenue of the society, but that they contribute essentially to rendering them greater than they could possibly be, without such establishments.

These circumstances are—

1. The division of labor.
2. An extension of the use of machinery.
3. Additional employment to classes of the community not ordinarily engaged in the business.
4. The promoting of emigration from foreign countries.
5. The furnishing greater scope for the diversity of talents and dispositions which discriminate men from each other.
6. The affording a more ample and various field for enterprise.
7. The creating, in some instances, a new, and securing in all, a more certain and steady demand for the surplus produce of the soil.

Each of these circumstances has a considerable influence upon the total mass of industrious effort in a community; together, they add to it a degree of energy and effect, which are not easily conceived. Some comments upon each of them, in the order in which they have been stated, may serve to explain their importance.

1. As to the division of labor.

It has justly been observed, that there is scarcely any thing of greater moment in the economy of a nation, than the proper division of labor. The separation of occupations causes each to be carried to a much greater perfection than it could possibly acquire, if they were blended. This arises, principally, from three circumstances.

1st. The greater skill and dexterity naturally resulting from a constant and undivided application to a single object. It is evident that these properties must increase, in proportion to the separation and simplification of objects and the steadiness of the attention devoted to each; and must be less, in proportion to the complication of objects, and the number among which the attention is distracted.

2d. The economy of time, by avoiding the loss of it, incident to a frequent transition from one operation to another of a different nature. This depends on various circumstances; the transition itself, the orderly disposition of the implements, machines, and materials employed in the operation to be relinquished, the preparatory steps to the commencement of a new one, the interruption of the impulse, which the mind of the workman acquires, from being engaged in a particular operation; the distractions, hesitations, and reluctance, which attended the passage from one kind of business to another.

3d. An extension of the use of machinery. A man occupied on a single object will have it more in his power, and will be more naturally led to exert his imagination devising methods to facilitate and abridge labor than if he were perplexed by a variety of independent and dissimilar operations. Besides this, the fabrication of machines, in numerous instances, becoming itself a distinct trade, the artist who follows it, has all the advantages which have been enumerated for improvement in his particular art, and in both ways the invention and application of machinery are extended.

And from these causes united, the mere separation of the occupation of the cultivator from that of the artificer, has the effect of augmenting the productive powers of labor, and with them, the total mass of the produce or revenue of a country. In this single view of the subject, therefore, the utility of artificers or manufacturers, towards promoting an increase of productive industry, is apparent.

II. As to an extension of the use of machinery, a point which, though partly anticipated, requires to be placed in one or two additional lights.

The employment of machinery forms an item of great importance in the general mass of national industry. It is an artificial force, brought in aid of the natural force of man; and, to all the purposes of labor, is an increase of hands; an accession of the strength, unincumbered too, by the expense of maintaining the laborer. May it not, therefore, be fairly inferred, that those occupations, which give greatest scope to the use of this auxiliary, contribute most to the general stock of industrious effort, and, in consequence, to the general product of industry?

It shall be taken for granted, and the truth of the position referred to observation, that manufacturing pursuits are susceptible in a greater degree of the application of machinery, than those of agriculture. If so, all the difference is lost to a community, which, instead of manufacturing for itself, procures the fabrics requisite to its supply from other countries. The substitution of foreign for domestic manufactures is a transfer to foreign nations of the advantages accruing from the employment of machinery, in the modes in which it is capable of being employed, with most utility and to the greatest extent.

The cotton mill invented in England, within the last twenty years, is a signal illustration of the general proposition, which has been just advanced. In consequence of it, all the different processes for spinning cotton are performed by means of machines, which are put in motion by water, and attended chiefly by women and children; and by a smaller number of persons, in the whole, than are requisite in the ordinary mode of spinning. And it is an advantage of great moment that the operations of this mill continue, with convenience, during the night, as well as through the day. The prodigious effect of such a machine is easily conceived. To this invention is to be attributed, essentially, the immense progress which has been so suddenly made in Great Britain, in the various fabrics of cotton.

III. As to the additional employment of classes of the community, not originally engaged in the particular business.

This is not among the least valuable of the means by which manufacturing institutions contribute to augment the general stock of industry and production. In places where those institutions prevail, besides the persons regularly engaged in them, they afford occasional and extra employment to industrious individuals and families who are willing to devote the leisure resulting from the intermissions of their ordinary pursuits to collateral labors, as a resource for multiplying their acquisitions or their enjoyments. The husbandman himself experiences a new source of profit and support from the increased industry of his wife and daughters; invited and stimulated by the demands of the neighboring manufactories.

Besides this advantage of occasional employment to classes having different occupations, there is another of a nature allied to it, and of a similar tendency. This is the employment of persons who would otherwise be idle, (and in many cases a burden on the community,) either from the bias of temper, habit, infirmity of body, or some other cause, indisposing or disqualifying them for the toils of the country. It is worthy of particular remark, that, in general, women and children are rendered more useful, and the latter more early useful, by manufacturing establishments, than they would otherwise be. Of the number of persons employed in the cotton manufactories of Great Britain, it is computed that four-sevenths, nearly, are women and children; of whom the greatest proportion are children, and many of them of a tender age.

And thus it appears to be one of the attributes of manufactories, and one of no small consequence, to give occasion to the exertion of a greater quantity of industry, even by the same number of persons, where they happen to prevail, than would exist, if there were no such establishments.

IV. As to the promoting of emigration from foreign countries.

Men reluctantly quit one course of occupation and livelihood for another, unless invited to it by very apparent and proximate advantages. Many who would go from one country to another, if they had a prospect of continuing, with more benefit, the callings to which they have been educated, will often not be tempted to change their situation by the hope of doing better in some other way. Manufacturers who, listening to the powerful invitations of a better price for their fabrics or their labor, of greater cheapness of provisions and raw materials, of an exemption from the chief part of the taxes, burdens, and restraints, which they endure in the Old World, of greater personal independence and consequence, under the operation of a more equal Government; and of what is far more precious than mere religious toleration, a perfect equality of religious privileges; would, probably, flock from Europe to the United States to pursue their own trades or professions, if they were once made sensible of the advantages they would enjoy, and were inspired with an assurance of encouragement and employment, will, with difficulty, be induced to transplant themselves, with a view to becoming cultivators of land.

If it be true, then, that it is the interest of the United States to open every possible avenue to emigration from abroad, it affords a weighty argument for the encouragement of manufactures; which, for the reason just assigned, will have the strongest tendency to multiply the inducements to it.

Here is perceived an important resource, not only for extending the population, and with it the useful and productive labor of the country, but likewise for the prosecution of manufactures, without deducting from the number of hands which might otherwise be drawn to tillage, and even for the indemnification of agriculture for such as might happen to be diverted from it. Many, whom manufacturing views would induce to emigrate, would afterwards yield to the temptations, which the particular situation of this country holds out to agricultural pursuits. And while agriculture would, in other respects, derive many signal and unmingled advantages, from the growth of manufactures, it is a problem whether it would gain or lose, as to the article of the number of persons employed in carrying it on.

V. As to the furnishing greater scope for the diversity of talents and dispositions, which discriminate men from each other.

This is a much more powerful mean of augmenting the fund of national industry than may at first sight appear. It is a just observation, that minds of the strongest and most active powers for their proper objects fall below mediocrity and labor without effect, if confined to unengendered pursuits. And it is thence to be inferred, that the results of human exertion may be immensely increased by diversifying its objects. When all the different kinds of industry obtain in a community, each individual can find his proper element, and can call into activity the whole vigor of his nature. And the community is benefited by the services of its respective members, in the manner in which each can serve it with most effect.

If there be any thing in a remark often to be met with, namely: that there is, in the genius of the people of this country, a peculiar aptitude for mechanic improvements, it would operate as a forcible reason for giving opportunities to the exercise of that species of talent, by the propagation of manufactures.

VI. As to the affording a more ample and various field for enterprise.

This, also, is of greater consequence in the general scale of national exertion, than might, perhaps, on a superficial view be supposed, and has effects not altogether dissimilar from those of the circumstance last noticed. To cherish and stimulate the activity of the human mind, by multiplying the objects of enterprise, is not among the least considerable of the expedients, by which the wealth of a nation may be promoted. Even things in themselves, not positively advantageous, sometimes become so, by their tendency to provoke exertion. Every new scene which is opened to the busy nature of man to rouse and exert itself, is the addition of a new energy to the general stock of effort.

The spirit of enterprise, useful and prolific as it is, must necessarily be contracted or expanded in proportion to the simplicity or variety of the occupations and productions, which are to be found in a society. It must be less in a nation of mere cultivators, than in a nation of cultivators and merchants; less in a nation of cultivators and merchants, than in a nation of cultivators, artificers, and merchants.

VII. As to the creating, in some instances, a new, and securing in all a more certain and steady demand for the surplus produce of the soil.

This is among the most important of the circumstances which has been indicated. It is a principal mean by which the establishment of manufactures contributes to an augmentation of the produce or revenue of a country, and has an immediate and direct relation to the prosperity of agriculture.

It is evident that the exertions of the husbandman will be steady or fluctuating, vigorous or feeble, in proportion to the steadiness or fluctuation, adequateness or inadequateness of the markets on which he must depend, for the vent of the surplus, which may be produced by his labor; and that such surplus in the ordinary course of things will be greater or less in the same proportion.

For the purpose of this vent, a domestic market is greatly to be preferred to a foreign one; because it is, in the nature of things, far more to be relied upon.

It is a primary object of the policy of nations to be able to supply themselves with subsistence from their own soils; and manufacturing nations, as far as circumstances permit, endeavor to procure, from the same source, the raw materials necessary for their own fabrics. This disposition, urged by the spirit of monopoly, is sometimes even carried to an injudicious extreme. It seems not always to be recollected that nations who have neither mines nor manufactures, can only obtain the manufactured articles of which they stand in need, by an exchange of the products of their soils; and that, if those who can best furnish them with such articles are unwilling to give a due course to this exchange, they must, of necessity, make every possible effort to manufacture for themselves; the effect of which is, that the manufacturing nations abridge the natural advantages of their situation, through an unwillingness to permit the agricultural countries to enjoy the advantages of theirs, and sacrifice the interests of a mutually beneficial intercourse to the vain project of selling every thing and buying nothing.

But it is also a consequence of the policy which has been noted, that the foreign demand for the products of agricultural countries is, in a great degree, rather casual and occasional, than certain or constant. To what extent injurious interruptions of the demand for some of the staple commodities of the United States may have been experienced from that cause, must be referred to the judgment of those who are engaged in carrying on the commerce of the country; but it may be safely affirmed, that such interruptions are at times very inconveniently felt; and that cases not unfrequently occur, in which markets are so confined and restricted, as to render the demand very unequal to the supply.

Report on Manufactures.

Independently, likewise, of the artificial impediments, which are created by the policy in question, there are natural causes tending to render the external demand for the surplus of agricultural nations a precarious reliance. The differences of seasons, in the countries which are the consumers, make immense differences in the produce of their own soils, in different years; and, consequently, in the degrees of their necessity for foreign supply. Plentiful harvests with them, especially if similar ones occur at the same time in the countries which are the furnishers, occasion, of course, a glut in the markets of the latter.

Considering how fast and how much the progress of new settlements of the United States must increase the surplus produce of the soil, and weighing seriously the tendency of the system, which prevails among most of the commercial nations of Europe; whatever dependence may be placed on the force of natural circumstances to counteract the effects of an artificial policy, there appear strong reasons to regard the foreign demand for that surplus as too uncertain a reliance, and to desire a substitute for it, in an extensive domestic market.

To secure such a market, there is no other expedient than to promote manufacturing establishments. Manufacturers who constitute the most numerous class, after the cultivators of land, are, for that reason, the principal consumers of the surplus of their labors.

This idea of an extensive domestic market for the surplus produce of the soil, is of the first consequence. It is of all things, that which most effectually conduces to a flourishing state of agriculture. If the effect of manufactories should be to detach a portion of the hands which would otherwise be engaged in tillage, it might possibly cause a smaller quantity of land to be under cultivation; but by their tendency to procure a mere certain demand for the surplus produce of the soil, they would, at the same time, cause the lands which were in cultivation, to be better improved and more productive. And while, by their influence, the condition of each individual farmer would be meliorated, the total mass of agricultural production would probably be increased. For this must evidently depend as much, if not more, upon the degree of improvement, than upon the number of acres under culture.

It merits particular observation, that the multiplication of manufactories not only furnishes a market for those articles which have been accustomed to be produced in abundance in a country, but it likewise creates a demand for such as were either unknown or produced in considerable quantities. The bowels as well as the surface of the earth, are ransacked for articles which were before neglected. Animals, plants, and minerals acquire a utility and value, which were before unexplored.

The foregoing considerations seem sufficient to establish the propositions, that it is the interest of nations to diversify the industrious pursuits of the individuals who compose them; that the establishment of manufactures is calculated, not only to increase the general stock of useful and productive labor, but even to improve the state of agriculture in particular, certainly to advance the interests of those who are engaged in it. There are other views, that will be hereafter taken of the subject, which, it is conceived, will serve to confirm these inferences.

Previously to a further discussion of the objections to the encouragement of manufactures which have been stated, it will be of use to see what can be said in reference to the particular situation of the United States, against the conclusions appearing to result from what has been already offered.

It may be observed, and the idea is of no inconsiderable weight, that however true it might be, that a State, which, possessing large tracts of vacant and fertile territory, was at the same time secluded from foreign commerce, would find its interest and the interest of agriculture, in diverting a part of its population from tillage to manufactures; yet it will not follow, that the same is true of a State, which, having such vacant and fertile territory, has at the same time ample opportunity of procuring from abroad, on good terms, all the fabrics of which it stands in need, for the supply of its inhabitants. The power of doing this at least secures the great advantage of a division of labor, leaving the farmer free to pursue exclusively the culture of his land, and enabling him to procure with its products the manufactured supplies requisite either to his wants or to his enjoyments. And though it should be true, that in settled countries, the diversification of industry is conducive to an increase in the productive powers of labor, and to an augmentation of revenue and capital, yet it is scarcely conceivable that there can be anything of so solid and permanent advantage to an uncultivated and unpeopled country, as to convert its wastes into cultivated and inhabited districts. If the revenue, in the mean time, should be less, the capital, in the event, must be greater.

To these observations, the following appears to be a satisfactory answer:

1. If the system of perfect liberty to industry and commerce were the prevailing system of nations, the arguments which dissuade a country, in the predicament of the United States, from the zealous pursuit of manufactures would doubtless have great force. It will not be affirmed, that they might not be permitted, with few exceptions, to serve as a rule of national conduct. In such a state of things, each country would have the full benefit of its peculiar advantages to compensate for its deficiencies or disadvantages. If one nation were in condition to supply manufactured articles on better terms than another, that other might find an abundant indemnification in a superior capacity to furnish the produce of the soil. And a free exchange mutually beneficial of the commodities which each was able to supply on the best terms, might be carried on between them, supporting in full vigor the industry of each. And though the circumstances which have been mentioned, and others which will be unfolded hereafter, render it probable, that nations merely agricultural, would not enjoy the same degree of opulence, in proportion to their numbers, as those which united manufactures with agriculture; yet the progressive improvement of the lands of the former, might in the end, atone for an inferior degree of opulence in the mean time; and in a case, in which opposite considerations are pretty equally balanced, the option ought perhaps always to be, in favor of leaving industry to its own direction.

But the system, which has been mentioned, is far from characterizing the general policy of nations. The prevalent one has been regulated by an opposite spirit. The consequence of it is, that the United States are to a certain extent in the situation of a country precluded from foreign commerce. They can indeed, without difficulty, obtain from abroad the manufactured supplies, of which they are in want; but they experience numerous and very injurious impediments to the emission and vent of their own commodities. Nor is this the case in reference to a single foreign nation only. The regulations of several countries, with which we have the most extensive intercourse, throw serious obstructions in the way of the principal staples of the United States.

In such a position of things, the United States cannot exchange with Europe on equal terms; and the want of reciprocity, would render them the victim of a system which would induce them to confine their views to agriculture, and refrain from manufactures. A constant and increasing necessity on their part, for the commodities of Europe, and only a partial and occasional demand for their own, in return, could not but expose them to a state of impoverishment, compared with the opulence to which their political and natural advantages authorize them to aspire.

Remarks of this kind are not made in the spirit of complaint. It is for the nations, whose regulations are alluded to, to judge for themselves, whether by aiming at too much, they do not lose more than they gain. It is for the United States to consider by what means they can render themselves least dependent on the combinations, right or wrong, of foreign policy.

It is no small consolation, that already the measures which have embarrassed our trade, have accelerated internal improvements, which upon the whole have bettered our affairs. To diversify and extend these improvements, is the surest and safest method of indemnifying ourselves for any inconveniencies, which those or similar measures have a tendency to beget. If Europe will not take from us the products of our soil, upon terms consistent with our interest, the natural remedy is to contract as fast as possible our wants of her.

2. The conversion of their waste into cultivated lands is certainly a point of great moment in the political calculations of the United States. But the degree in which this may possibly be retarded by the encouragement of manufactories does not appear to countervail the powerful inducements to affording that encouragement.

An observation made in another place is of a nature to have great influence upon this question. If it cannot be denied that the interests even of agriculture may be advanced more by having such of the lands of a State as are occupied under good cultivation, than by having a greater quantity occupied under a much inferior cultivation, and if manufactories, for the reasons assigned, must be admitted to have a tendency to promote a more steady and vigorous cultivation of the lands occupied, than would happen without them, it will follow that they are capable of indemnifying a country for a diminution of the progress of new settlements; and may serve to increase both the capital value and the income of its lands, even though they should abridge the number of acres under tillage.

But it does by no means follow, that the progress of new settlements would be retarded by the extension of manufactures. The desire of being an independent proprietor of land is founded on such strong principles in the human breast, that where the opportunity of becoming so is as great as it is in the United States, the proportion will be small of those, whose situations would otherwise lead to it, who would be diverted from it towards manufactures. And it is highly probable, as already intimated, that the accessions of foreigners, who originally drawn over by manufacturing views would afterwards abandon them for agricultural, would be more than an equivalent for those of our own citizens, who might happen to be detached from them.

The remaining objections to a particular encouragement of manufactures in the United States now require to be examined.

One of these turn on the proposition that industry, if left to itself, will naturally find its way to the most useful and profitable employment: whence it is inferred, that manufactures, without the aid of Government, will grow up as soon and as fast as the natural state of things and the interest of the community may require.

Against the solidity of this hypothesis, in the full latitude of the terms, very cogent reasons may be offered. These have relation to the strong influence of habit and the spirit of imitation, the fear of want of success in untried enterprises, the intrinsic difficulties incident to first essays towards a competition with those who have previously attained to perfection in the business to be attempted, the bounties, premiums, and other artificial encouragements, with which foreign nations second the exertions of their own citizens in the branches in which they are to be rivalled.

Experience teaches that men are often so much governed by what they are accustomed to see and practice, that the simplest and most obvious improvements, in the most ordinary occupations, are adopted with hesitation, reluctance, and by slow gradations. The spontaneous transition to new pursuits, in a community long habituated to different ones, may be expected to be attended with proportionably greater difficulty. When former occupations ceased to yield a profit adequate to the subsistence of their followers, or when there was an absolute deficiency of employment in them, owing to the superabundance of hands, changes would ensue; but these changes would be likely to be more tardy than might consist with the interest either of individuals or of the society. In many cases they would not happen, while a bare support could be insured by an adherence to ancient courses; though a resort to a more profitable employment might be practicable. To produce the desirable changes as early as may be expedient, may therefore require the incitement and patronage of Government.

The apprehension of failing in new attempts is perhaps a more serious impediment. There are dispositions apt to be attracted by the mere novelty of an undertaking; but these are not always those best calculated to give it success. To this, it is of importance that the confidence of cautious, sagacious capitalists, both citizens and foreigners, should be excited. And to inspire this description of persons with confidence, it is essential that they should be made to see in any project, which is new, and for that reason alone, if for no other, precarious, the prospect of such a degree of countenance and support from Government, as may be capable of overcoming the obstacles, inseparable from first experiments.

The superiority antecedently enjoyed by nations, who have pre-occupied and perfected a branch of industry, constitutes a more formidable obstacle than either of those which have been mentioned, to the introduction of the same branch into a country in which it did not before exist. To maintain, between the recent establishments of one country and the long matured establishments of another country, a competition upon equal terms, both as to quality and price, is in most cases impracticable. The disparity in the one, or in the other, or in both, must necessarily be so considerable as to forbid a successful rivalry, without the extraordinary aid and protection of Government.

But the greatest obstacle of all to the successful prosecution of a new branch of industry in a country in which it was before unknown, consists, as far as the instances apply, in the bounties, premiums, and other aids which are granted, in a variety of cases, by the nations in which the establishments to be imitated are previously introduced. It is well known (and particular examples in the course of this Report will be cited) that certain nations grant bounties on the exportation of particular commodities to enable their own workmen to undersell and supplant all competitors in the countries to which those commodities are sent. Hence the undertakers of a new manufacture have to contend, not only with the natural disadvantages of a new undertaking, but with the gratuities and remunerations which other Governments bestow. To be enabled to contend with success, it is evident that the interference and aid of their own Government are indispensable.

Combinations by those engaged in a particular branch of business in one country, to frustrate the first efforts to introduce it into another, by temporary sacrifices, recompensed perhaps by extraordinary indemnifications of the Government of such country, are believed to have existed, and are not to be regarded as destitute of probability.

The existence or assurance of aid from the Government of the country in which the business is to be introduced, may be essential to fortify adventurers against the dread of such combinations, to defeat their effects, if formed, and to prevent their being formed, by demonstrating that they must in the end prove fruitless.

Whatever room there may be for an expectation that the industry of a people, under the direction of private interest, will upon equal terms find out the most beneficial employment for itself, there is none for a reliance that it will struggle against the force of unequal terms, or will of itself surmount all the adventitious barriers to a successful competition, which may have been erected either by the advantages naturally acquired from practice and previous possession of the ground, or by those which may have sprung from positive regulations and an artificial policy. This general reflection might alone suffice as an answer to the objection under examination—exclusively of the weighty considerations which have been particularly urged.

The objections to the pursuit of manufactures in the United States which next present themselves to discussion, represent an impracticability of success, arising from three causes: scarcity of hands, dearness of labor, want of capital.

The two first circumstances are to a certain extent real, and, within due limits, ought to be admitted as obstacles to the success of manufacturing enterprise in the United States. But there are various considerations which lessen their force, and tend to afford an assurance that they are not sufficient to prevent the advantageous prosecution of many very useful and extensive manufactories.

With regard to scarcity of hands, the fact itself must be applied with no small qualification to certain parts of the United States. There are large districts, which may be considered as pretty fully peopled; and which, notwithstanding a continual drain for distant settlement, are thickly interspersed with flourishing and increasing towns. If these districts have not already reached the point at which the complaint of scarcity of hands ceases, they are not remote from it, and are approaching fast towards it; and, having perhaps fewer attractions to agriculture than some other parts of the Union, they exhibit a proportionably stronger tendency towards other kinds of industry. In these districts may be discerned no inconsiderable maturity for manufacturing establishments.

But there are circumstances which have been already noticed with another view, that materially diminish every where the effect of a scarcity of hands. These circumstances are the great use which can be made of women and children; on which point a very pregnant and instructive fact has been mentioned; the vast extension given by late improvements to the employment of machines, which, substituting the agency of fire and water, has prodigiously lessened the necessity for manual labor; the employment of persons ordinarily engaged in other occupations during the seasons, or hours of leisure, which, besides giving occasion to the exertion of a greater quantity of labor by the same number of persons, and thereby increasing the general stock of labor, as has been elsewhere remarked, may also be taken into the calculation as a resource for obviating the scarcity of hands; lastly, the attraction of foreign emigrants. Whoever inspects with a careful eye the composition of our towns, will be made sensible to what an extent this resource may be relied upon. This exhibits a large proportion of ingenious and valuable workmen, in different arts and trades, who by expatriating from Europe have improved their own condition, and added to the industry and wealth of the United States. It is a natural inference, from the experience we have already had, that, as soon as the United States shall present the countenance of a serious prosecution of manufactures, as soon as foreign artists shall be made sensible that the state of things here affords a moral certainty of employment and encouragement, competent numbers of European workmen will transplant themselves, effectually to insure the success of the design. How, indeed, can it otherwise happen, considering the various and powerful inducements which the situation of this country offers; addressing themselves to so many strong passions and feelings, to so many general and particular interests?

It may be affirmed, therefore, in respect to hands for carrying on manufactures, that we shall in a great measure trade upon a foreign stock—reserving our own for the cultivation of our lands, and the manning of our ships, as far as character and circumstances shall incline. It is not unworthy of remark, that the objection to the success of manufactures, deduced from the scarcity of hands, is alike applicable to trade and navigation, and yet these are perceived to flourish without any sensible impediment from that cause.

As to the dearness of labor, (another of the obstacles alleged,) this has relation principally to two circumstances; one, that which has been just discussed, or the scarcity of hands; the other, the greatness of profits.

As far as it is a consequence of the scarcity of hands, it is mitigated by all the considerations which have been adduced as lessening that deficiency. It is certain, too, that the disparity in this respect, between some of the most manufacturing parts of Europe and a large proportion of the United States, is not nearly so great as is commonly imagined. It is also much less in regard to artificers and manufacturers than in regard to country laborers; and, while a careful comparison shows that there is in this particular much exaggeration, it is also evident that the effect of the degree of disparity which does truly exist, is diminished in proportion to the use which can be made of machinery.

To illustrate this last idea, let it be supposed that the difference of price in two countries, of a given quantity of manual labor requisite to the fabrication of a given article is as ten, and that some mechanic power is introduced into both countries, which, performing half the necessary labor, leaves only half to be done by hand, it is evident that the difference in the cost of the fabrication of the article in question in the two countries, as far as it is connected with the price of labor, will be reduced from ten to five, in consequence of the introduction of that power.

This circumstance is worthy of the most particular attention. It diminishes immensely one of the objections most strenuously urged against the success of manufactures in the United States.

To procure all such machines as are known in any part of Europe, can only require a proper provision and due pains. The knowledge of several of the most important of them is already possessed. The preparation of them here is, in most cases, practicable on nearly equal terms. As far as they depend on water, some superiority of advantages may be claimed, from the uncommon variety and greater cheapness of situations adapted to mill seats, with which different parts of the United States abound.

So far as the dearness of labor may be a consequence of the greatness of profits in any branch of business, it is no obstacle to its success. The undertaker can afford to pay the price.

There are grounds to conclude that undertakers of manufactures in this country can at this time afford to pay higher wages to the workmen they may employ than are paid to similar workmen in Europe. The prices of foreign fabrics in the markets of the United States, which will for a long time regulate the prices of domestic ones, may be considered as compounded of the following ingredients: the first cost of materials, including taxes, if any, which are paid upon them where they are made; the expense of grounds, buildings, machinery, and tools; the wages of the persons employed in the manufactory; the profits on the capital stock so employed; the commissions of agents to purchase them where they are made; the expense of transportation to the United States, including insurance and other incidental charges; the taxes or duties, if any, and fees of office which are paid on their exportation; the taxes or duties, and fees of office, which are paid on their importation.

As to the first of these items, the cost of materials, the advantage, upon the whole, is at present on the side of the United States, and the difference in their favor must increase in proportion as a certain and extensive domestic demand shall induce the proprietors of land to devote more of their attention to the production of those materials. It ought not to escape observation, in a comparison on this point, that some of the principal manufacturing countries of Europe are much more dependent on foreign supply for the materials of their manufactures, than would be the United States, who are capable of supplying themselves with a greater abundance as well as a greater variety of the requisite materials.

As to the second item, the expense of grounds, buildings, machinery, and tools, an equality at least may be assumed; since advantages in some particulars will counterbalance temporary disadvantages in others.

As to the third item, or the article of wages, the comparison certainly turns against the United

Report on Manufactures.

States; though, as before observed, not in so great a degree as is commonly supposed.

The fourth item is alike applicable to the foreign and to the domestic manufacture. It is, indeed, more properly a result than a particular to be compared.

But, with respect to all the remaining items, they are alone applicable to the foreign manufacture, and in the strictest sense extraordinary; constituting a sum of extra charge on the foreign fabric, which cannot be estimated at less than from fifteen to thirty per cent. on the cost of it at the manufactory.

This sum of extra charge may confidently be regarded as more than a counterpoise for the real difference in the price of labor, and is a satisfactory proof that manufactures may prosper in defiance of it in the United States.

To the general allegation, connected with the circumstances of scarcity of hands and dearness of labor, that extensive manufactures can only grow out of a redundant or full population, it will be sufficient to answer, generally, that the fact has been otherwise; that the situation alleged to be an essential condition of success, has not been that of several nations, at periods when they had already attained to maturity in a variety of manufactures.

The supposed want of capital for the prosecution of manufactures in the United States, is the most indefinite of the objections which are usually opposed to it. It is very difficult to pronounce anything precise concerning the real extent of the moneyed capital of a country, and still more concerning the proportion which it bears to the objects that invite the employment of capital. It is not less difficult to pronounce how far the effect of any given quantity of money, as capital, or, in other words, as a medium for circulating the industry and property of a nation, may be increased by the very circumstance of the additional motion which is given to it by new objects of employment. That effect, like the momentum of descending bodies, may not improperly be represented as in a compound ratio to mass and velocity. It seems pretty certain, that a given sum of money, in a situation in which the quick impulses of commercial activity were little felt, would appear inadequate to the circulation of as great a quantity of industry and property, as in one in which their full influence was experienced.

It is not obvious, why the same objection might not as well be made to external commerce as to manufactures, since it is manifest that our immense tracts of land, occupied and unoccupied, are capable of giving employment to more capital than is actually bestowed upon them. It is certain that the United States offer a vast field for the advantageous employment of capital, but it does not follow that there will not be found, in one way or another, a sufficient fund for the successful prosecution of any species of industry which is likely to prove truly beneficial.

The following considerations are of a nature to remove all inquietude on the score of want of capital. The introduction of banks, as has been shown on another occasion, has a powerful tendency to extend the active capital of a country. Experience of the utility of these institutions, is multiplying them in the United States. It is probable that they will be established wherever they can exist with advantage; and wherever they can be supported, if administered with prudence, they will add new energies to all pecuniary operations. The aid of foreign capital may safely, and with considerable latitude, be taken into calculation. Its instrumentality has been long experienced in our external commerce; and it has begun to be felt in various other modes. Not only our own funds, but our agriculture and other internal improvements, have been animated by it. It has already, in a few instances, extended even to our manufactures. It is a well known fact, that there are parts of Europe which have more capital than profitable domestic objects of employment. Hence, among other proofs, the large loans continually furnished to foreign States. And it is equally certain that the capital of other parts may find more profitable employment in the United States than at home. And notwithstanding there are weighty inducements to prefer the employment of capital at home, even at less profit, to an investment of it abroad, though with greater gain, yet these inducements are overruled, either by a deficiency of employment, or by a very material difference in profit. Both these causes operate to produce a transfer of foreign capital to the United States. It is certain that various objects in this country hold out advantages which are with difficulty to be equalled elsewhere; and under the increasingly favorable impressions which are entertained of our Government, the attractions will become more and more strong. These impressions will prove a rich mine of prosperity to the country, if they are confirmed and strengthened by the progress of our affairs. And to secure this advantage, little more is necessary than to foster industry, and cultivate order and tranquility, at home and abroad.

It is not impossible that there may be persons disposed to look with a jealous eye on the introduction of foreign capital, as if it were an instrument to deprive our citizens of the profits of our own industry; but, perhaps, there never could be a more unreasonable jealousy. Instead of being viewed as a rival, it ought to be considered as a most valuable auxiliary, conducing to put in motion a greater quantity of productive labor, and a greater portion of useful enterprise, than could exist without it. It is at least evident, that in a country situated like the United States, with an infinite fund of resources yet to be unfolded, every farthing of foreign capital which is laid out in internal ameliorations, and in industrious establishments of a permanent nature, is a precious acquisition. And whatever be the objects which originally attract foreign capital, when once introduced it may be directed towards any purpose of beneficial exertion which is desired. And to detain it among us, there can be no expedient so effectual as to enlarge the sphere within which it may be usefully employed: though introduced merely with views to speculations in the funds, it may afterwards be rendered subservient to the interests of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures.

But the attraction of foreign capital for the direct purpose of manufactures, ought not to be deemed a chimerical expectation. There are already examples of it, as remarked in another place; and the examples, if the disposition be cultivated, can hardly fail to multiply. There are, also, instances of another kind, which serve to strengthen the expectation; enterprises for improving the public communications, by cutting canals, opening the obstructions in rivers, and erecting bridges, have received very material aid from the same source.

When the manufacturing capitalist of Europe shall advert to the many important advantages which have been intimated in the course of this Report, he cannot but perceive very powerful inducements to a transfer of himself and his capital to the United States. Among the reflections, which a most interesting peculiarity of situation is calculated to suggest, it cannot escape his observation, as a circumstance of moment in the calculation, that the progressive population and improvement of the United States, insure a continually increasing domestic demand for the fabrics which he shall produce, not to be affected by any external casualties or vicissitudes.

But while there are circumstances sufficiently strong to authorize a considerable degree of reliance on the aid of foreign capital, towards the attainment of the object in view, it is satisfactory to have good grounds of assurance that there are domestic resources of themselves adequate to it. It happens that there is a species of capital, actually existing within the United States, which relieves from all inquietude on the score of want of capital—this is the Funded Debt.

The effect of a Funded Debt, as a species of capital, has been noticed upon a former occasion; but a more particular elucidation of the point seems to be required by the stress which is here laid upon it: this shall accordingly be attempted.

Public funds answer the purpose of capital from the estimation in which they are usually held by moneyed men, and consequently from the ease and despatch with which they can be turned into money. This capacity of prompt convertibility into money causes a transfer of stock to be in a great number of cases equivalent to a payment in coin; and where it does not happen to suit the party who is to receive, to accept a transfer of stock, the party who is to pay is never at a loss to find elsewhere a purchaser of his stock, who will furnish him in lieu of it with the coin of which he stands in need.

Hence in a sound and settled state of the public funds, a man possessed of a sum in them can embrace any scheme of business which offers with as much confidence as if he were possessed of an equal sum in coin.

This operation of public funds, as capital, is too obvious to be denied; but it is objected to the idea of their operating as an augmentation of the capital of the community that they serve to occasion the destruction of some other capital to an equal amount.

The capital which alone they can be supposed to destroy must consist of the annual revenue, which is applied to the payment of interest on the Debt, and to the gradual redemption of the principal. The amount of the coin, which is employed in circulating the funds, or, in other words, in effecting the different alienations which they undergo.

But the following appears to be the true and accurate view of this matter:

1. As to the point of the annual revenue requisite for the payment of interest and redemption of principal.

As a determinate proportion will tend to perspicuity in the reasoning, let it be supposed that the annual revenue to be applied corresponding with the modification of the six per cent. stock of the United States is in the ratio of eight upon the hundred; that is, in the first instance, six on account of interest, and two on account of principal.

Thus far it is evident that the capital destroyed to the capital created would bear no greater proportion than eight to one hundred. There would be withdrawn from the total mass of other capitals a sum of eight dollars to be paid to the public creditor, while he would be possessed of a sum of one hundred dollars, ready to be applied to any purpose, to be embarked in any enterprise which might appear to him eligible. Here, then, the augmentation of capital, or the excess of that which is produced beyond that which is destroyed, is equal to ninety-two dollars.

To this conclusion it may be objected, that the sum of eight dollars is to be withdrawn annually, until the whole hundred is extinguished; and it may be inferred that in process of time a capital will be destroyed equal to that which is at first created.

But it is nevertheless true that during the whole of the interval between the creation of the capital of one hundred dollars and its reduction to a sum not greater than that of the annual revenue appropriated to its redemption, there will be a greater active capital in existence than if no debt had been contracted. The sum drawn from other capitals in any one year will not exceed eight dollars; but there will be at every instant of time during the whole period in question a sum corresponding with so much of the principal as remains unredeemed in the hands of some person or other employed, or ready to be employed, in some profitable undertaking. There will therefore constantly be more capital in capacity to be employed than capital taken from employment. The excess for the first year has been stated to be ninety-two dollars; it will diminish yearly; but there always will be an excess until the principal of the Debt is brought to a level with the redeeming annuity; that is, in the case which has been assumed by way of example, to $8. The reality of this excess becomes palpable, if it be supposed, as often happens, that the citizen of a foreign country imports into the United States $100 for the purchase of an equal sum of Public Debt; here is an absolute augmentation of the mass of circulating coin to the extent of one hundred dollars. At the end of a year the foreigner is presumed to draw back eight dollars on account of his principal and interest, but he still leaves ninety-two of his original deposit in circulation, as he in like manner leaves eighty-four at the end of the second year, drawing back then also the annuity of eight dollars; and thus the matter proceeds; the capital left in circulation diminishing each year, and coming nearer to the level of the annuity drawn back. There are however some differences in the ultimate operation of the part of the Debt, which is purchased by foreigners, and that which remains in the hands of citizens. But the general effect in each case, though in different degrees, is to add to the active capital of the country.

Hitherto the reasoning has proceeded on a concession of the position, that there is a destruction of some other capital to the extent of the annuity appropriated to the payment of the interest and the redemption of the principal of the Debt; but in this too much has been conceded. There is at most a temporary transfer of some other capital, to the amount of the annuity, from those who pay, to the creditor who receives; which he again restores to the circulation to resume the offices of a capital. This he does either immediately by employing the money in some branch of industry, or immediately by lending it to some other person, who does so employ it, or by spending it on his own maintenance. In either supposition, there is no destruction of capital; there is nothing more than a suspension of its motion for a time; that is, while it is passing from the hands of those who pay into the public coffers and thence through the public creditor into some other channel of circulation. When the payments of interest are periodical and quick, and made by the instrumentality of banks, the diversion or suspension of capital may almost be denominated momentary. Hence the deduction on this account is far less than it at first sight appears to be.

There is evidently, as far as regards the annuity, no destruction or transfer of any other capital than that portion of the income of each individual, which goes to make up the annuity. The land which furnishes the farmer with the sum which he is to contribute remains the same; and the like may be observed of other capitals. Indeed, as far as the tax, which is the object of contribution (as frequently happens when it does not oppress by its weight) may have been a motive to greater exertion in any occupation; it may even serve to increase the contributory capital: this idea is not without importance in the general view of the subject.

It remains to see what further deduction ought to be made from the capital which is created by the existence of the Debt on account of the coin which is employed in its circulation. This is susceptible of much less precise calculation than the article which has been just discussed. It is impossible to say what proportion of coin is necessary to carry on the alienations which any species of property usually undergoes: the quantity, indeed, varies, according to circumstances. But it may still, without hesitation, be pronounced, from the quickness of the rotation, or rather of the transitions that the medium of circulation, always bears but a small proportion to the amount of the property circulated. And it is thence satisfactorily deducible that the coin employed in the negotiations of the funds, and which serve to give them activity as capital, is incomparably less than the sum of the Debt negotiated for the purpose of business.

It ought not, however, to be omitted, that the negotiation of the funds becomes itself a distinct business, which employs, and by employing diverts a portion of the circulating coin from other pursuits; but, making due allowance for this circumstance, there is no reason to conclude that the effect of the diversion of coin in the whole operation bears any considerable proportion to the amount of the capital to which it gives activity. The sum of the Debt in circulation is continually at the command of any useful enterprise; the coin itself which circulates it is never more than momentarily suspended from its ordinary functions. It experiences an incessant and rapid flux and reflux to and from the channels of industry to those of speculations in the funds.

There are strong circumstances in confirmation of this theory. The force of moneyed capital which has been displayed in Great Britain, and the height to which every species of industry has grown up under it, defy a solution from the quantity of coin which that Kingdom has ever possessed. Accordingly it has been coeval with its Funding System, the prevailing opinion of the men of business, and of the generality of the most sagacious theorists of that country, that the operation of the public funds as capital has contributed to the effect in question. Among ourselves appearances thus far favor the same conclusion. Industry in general seems to have been reanimated. There are symptoms indicating an extension of our commerce. Our navigation has certainly of late had a considerable spring; and there appears to be in many parts of the Union a command of capital, which, till lately, since the Revolution at least, was unknown. But it is at the same time to be acknowledged that other circumstances have concurred, and in a great degree, in producing the present state of things, and that the appearances are not yet sufficiently decisive to be entirely relied upon.

In the question under discussion, it is important to distinguish between an absolute increase of capital, or an accession of real wealth and an artificial increase of capital, as an engine of business or as an instrument of industry and commerce. In the first sense, a Funded Debt has no pretensions to being deemed an increase of capital; in the last, it has pretensions which are not easy to be controverted. Of a similar nature is bank credit, and, in an inferior degree, every species of private credit.

But though a Funded Debt is not in the first instance an absolute increase of capital or an augmentation of real wealth, yet by serving as a new power in the operations of industry, it has, within certain bounds, a tendency to increase the real wealth of a community; in like manner as money borrowed by a thrifty farmer, to be laid out in the improvement of his farm may, in the end, add to his stock of real riches.

There are respectable individuals who, from a just aversion to an accumulation of Public Debt, are unwilling to concede to it any kind of utility, who can discern no good to alleviate the ill with which they suppose it pregnant, who cannot be persuaded that it ought in any sense to be viewed as an increase of capital, lest it should be inferred that the more debt the more capital—the greater the burdens the greater the blessings of the community.

But it interests the public councils to estimate every object as it truly is, to appreciate how far the good in any measure is compensated by the ill, or the ill by the good; either of them is seldom unmixed.

Neither will it follow that an accumulation of Debt is desirable, because a certain degree of it operates as capital. There may be a plethora in the political as in the natural body; there may be a state of things in which any such artificial capital is unnecessary. The Debt, too, may be swelled to such a size as that the greatest part of it may cease to be useful as a capital, serving only to pamper the dissipation of idle and dissolute individuals; as that the sums required to pay the interest upon it may become oppressive, and beyond the means which a Government can employ consistently with its tranquility to raise them; as that the resources of taxation to face the Debt may have been strained too far to admit of extensions adequate to exigencies which regard the public safety.

Where this critical point is, cannot be pronounced; but it is impossible to believe that there is not such a point.

And as the vicissitudes of nations beget a perpetual tendency to the accumulation of Debt, there ought to be in every Government a perpetual, anxious, and unceasing effort to reduce that, which at any time exists, as fast as shall be practicable, consistently with integrity and good faith.

Reasonings on a subject comprehending ideas so abstract and complex, so little reducible to precise calculation as those which enter into the question just discussed, are always attended with a danger of running into fallacies; due allowance ought therefore to be made for this possibility. But, as far as the nature of the subject admits of it, there appears to be satisfactory ground for a belief that the public funds operate as a resource of capital to the citizens of the United States, and if they are a resource at all, it is an extensive one.

To all the arguments which are brought to evince the impracticability of success in manufacturing establishments in the United States, it might have been a sufficient answer to have referred to the experience of what has been already done. It is certain that several important branches have grown up and flourished with a rapidity which surprises, affording an encouraging assurance of success in future attempts; of these it may not be improper to enumerate the most considerable:

I. Of skins. Tanned and tawed leather, dressed skins, shoes, boots, and slippers; harness and saddlery of all kinds; portmanteaus and trunks; leather breeches, gloves, muffs, and tippets; parchment and glue.

II. Of iron. Bar and sheet iron, steel, nail rods, and nails; implements of husbandry; stoves, pots and other household utensils; the steel and iron work of carriages and for ship building; anchors, scale beams and weights, and various tools of artificers; arms of different kinds: though the manufacture of these last has of late diminished for want of demand.

III. Of wood. Ships, cabinet wares, and turnery; wool and cotton cards, and other machinery for manufactures and husbandry; mathematical instruments; coopers' wares of every kind.

IV. Of flax and hemp. Cables, sailcloth, cordage, twine, and packthread.

V. Bricks and coarse tiles, and potters' wares.

VI. Ardent spirits and malt liquors.

VII. Writing and printing paper, sheathing and wrapping paper, pasteboards, fullers or presspapers, paperhangings.

VIII. Hats of fur and wool and of mixtures of both. Women's stuff and silk shoes.

IX. Refined sugars.

X. Oils of animals and seeds; soap, spermaceti and tallow candles.

XI. Copper and brass wares, particularly utensils for distillers, sugar refiners, and brewers; andirons and other articles for household use; philosophical apparatus.

XII. Tin wares for most purposes of ordinary use.

XIII. Carriages of all kinds.

XIV. Snuff, chewing and smoking tobacco.

XV. Starch and hairpowder.

XVI. Lampblack, and other painters' colors.

XVII. Gunpowder.

Besides manufactories of these articles, which are carried on as regular trades, and have attained to a considerable degree of maturity, there is a vast scene of household manufacturing, which contributes more largely to the supply of the community than could be imagined without having made it an object of particular inquiry. This observation is the pleasing result of the investigation to which the subject of this Report has led, and is applicable as well to the Southern as to the Middle and Northern States. Great quantities of coarse cloths, coatings, serges, and flannels, linsey-woolseys, hosiery of wool, cotton, and thread, coarse fustians, jeans and muslins, checked and striped cotton and linen goods, bedticks, coverlets and counterpanes, tow linens, coarse shirtings, sheetings, toweling and table linen, and various mixtures of wool and cotton, and of cotton and flax, are made in the household way, and, in many instances, to an extent not only sufficient for the supply of the families in which they are made, but for sale, and even in some cases for exportation. It is computed, in a number of districts, that two-thirds, three-fourths, and even four-fifths of all the clothing of the inhabitants are made by themselves. The importance of so great a progress as appears to have been made in family manufactures, within a few years, both in a moral and political view, renders the fact highly interesting.

Neither does the above enumeration comprehend all the articles that are manufactured as regular trades. Many others occur, which are equally well established, but which not being of equal importance have been omitted. And there are many attempts, still in their infancy, which, though attended with very favorable appearances, could not have been properly comprised in an enumeration of manufactories already established. There are other articles, also, of great importance, which, though, strictly speaking, manufactures, are omitted, as being immediately connected with husbandry—such are flour, pot and pearl ash, pitch, tar, turpentine, and the like.

There remains to be noticed an objection to the encouragement of manufactures, of a nature different from those which question the probability of success. This is derived from its supposed tendency to give a monopoly of advantages to particular classes, at the expense of the rest of the community, who, it is affirmed, would be able to procure the requisite supplies of manufactured articles on better terms from foreigners than from our own citizens, and who, it is alleged, are reduced to a necessity of paying an enhanced price for whatever they want by every measure which obstructs the free competition of foreign commodities.

It is not an unreasonable supposition that measures which serve to abridge the free competition of foreign articles have a tendency to occasion an enhancement of prices, and it is not to be denied that such is the effect in a number of cases; but the fact does not uniformly correspond with the theory. A reduction of prices has, in several instances, immediately succeeded the establishment of a domestic manufacture. Whether it be that foreign manufacturers endeavor to supplant by underselling our own, or whatever else be the cause, the effect has been such as is stated, and the reverse of what might have been expected.

But though it were true that the immediate and certain effect of regulations controlling the competition of foreign with domestic fabrics was an increase of price, it is universally true that the contrary is the ultimate effect with every successful manufacture. When a domestic manufacture has attained to perfection, and has engaged in the prosecution of it a competent number of persons, it invariably becomes cheaper. Being free from the heavy charges which attend the importation of foreign commodities, it can be afforded, and accordingly seldom or never fails to be sold cheaper, in process of time, than was the foreign article for which it is a substitute. The internal competition which takes place soon does away every thing like monopoly, and by degrees reduces the price of the article to the minimum of a reasonable profit on the capital employed. This accords with the reason of the thing and with experience. Whence it follows, that it is the interest of the community, with a view to eventual and permanent economy, to encourage the growth of manufactures. In a national view, a temporary enhancement of price must always be well compensated by a permanent reduction of it.

It is a reflection which may with propriety be indulged here, that this eventual diminution of the prices of manufactured articles, which is the result of internal manufacturing establishments, has a direct and very important tendency to benefit agriculture. It enables the farmer to procure with a smaller quantity of his labor the manufactured produce of which he stands in need, and consequently increases the value of his income and property.

The objections which are commonly made to the expediency of encouraging and to the probability of succeeding in manufacturing pursuits in the United States, having now been discussed, the considerations which have appeared in the course of the discussion, recommending that species of industry to the patronage of the Government, will be materially strengthened by a few general and some particular topics, which have been naturally reserved for subsequent notice.

1. There seems to be a moral certainty that the trade of a country which is both manufacturing and agricultural will be more lucrative and prosperous than that of a country which is merely agricultural. One reason for this is found in that general effort of nations (which has been already mentioned) to procure from their own soils the articles of prime necessity requisite to their own consumption and use, and which serves to render their demand for a foreign supply of such articles in a great degree occasional and contingent. Hence, while the necessities of nations exclusively devoted to agriculture for the fabrics of manufacturing States are constant and regular, the wants of the latter for the products of the former are liable to very considerable fluctuations and interruptions. The great inequalities resulting from difference of seasons have been elsewhere remarked. This uniformity of demand on the one side, and unsteadiness of it on the other, must necessarily have a tendency to cause the general course of the exchange of commodities between the parties to turn to the disadvantage of the merely agricultural States. Peculiarity of situation, a climate and soil adapted to the production of peculiar commodities, may sometimes contradict the rule; but there is every reason to believe that it will be found in the main a just one.

Another circumstance which gives a superiority of commercial advantages to States that manufacture as well as cultivate, consists in the more numerous attractions which a more diversified market offers to foreign customers, and in the greater scope which it affords to mercantile enterprise. It is a position of indisputable truth in commerce, depending, too, on very obvious reasons, that the greatest resort will ever be to those marts where commodities, while equally abundant, are most various. Each difference of kind holds out an additional inducement; and it is a position not less clear, that the field of enterprise must be enlarged to the merchants of a country in proportion to the variety as well as the abundance of commodities which they find at home for exportation to foreign markets.

A third circumstance, perhaps not inferior to either of the other two, conferring the superiority which has been stated, has relation to the stagnations of demand for certain commodities which at some time or other interfere more or less with the sale of all. The nation which can bring to market but few articles is likely to be more quickly and sensibly affected by such stagnations than one which is always possessed of a great variety of commodities. The former frequently finds too great a portion of its stock of materials for sale or exchange lying on hand, or is obliged to make injurious sacrifices to supply its wants of foreign articles, which are numerous and urgent in proportion to the smallness of the number of its own. The latter commonly finds itself indemnified by the high prices of some articles for the low prices of others; and the prompt and advantageous sale of those articles which are in demand enables its merchants the better to wait for a favorable change in respect to those which are not. There is ground to believe that a difference of situation in this particular has immensely different effects upon the wealth and prosperity of nations.

From these circumstances, collectively, two important inferences are to be drawn—one, that there is always a higher probability of a favorable balance of trade in regard to countries in which manufactures, founded on the basis of a thriving agriculture, flourish, than in regard to those which are confined wholly or almost wholly to agriculture; the other (which is also a consequence of the first) that countries of the former description are likely to possess more pecuniary wealth, or money, than those of the latter.

Facts appear to correspond with this conclusion. The importations of manufactured supplies seem invariably to drain the merely agricultural people of their wealth. Let the situation of the manufacturing countries of Europe be compared in this particular with that of countries which only cultivate, and the disparity will be striking. Other causes, it is true, help to account for this disparity between some of them, and, among these causes, the relative state of agriculture; but, between others of them, the most prominent circumstance of dissimilitude arises from the comparative state of manufactures. In corroboration of the same idea, it ought not to escape remark, that the West India Islands, the soils of which are the most fertile, and the nation which in the greatest degree supplies the rest of the world with precious metals, exchange to a loss with almost every other country. As far as experience at home may guide, it will lead to the same conclusion. Previous to the Revolution, the quantity of coin possessed by the Colonies which now compose the United States appeared to be inadequate to their circulation, and their debt to Great Britain was progressive. Since the Revolution, the States in which manufactures have most increased have recovered safest from the injuries of the late war, and abound most in pecuniary resources.

It ought to be admitted, however, in this, as in the preceding case, that causes irrelative to the state of manufactures, account, in a degree, for the phenomena remarked. The continual progress of new settlements has a natural tendency to occasion an unfavorable balance of trade, though it indemnifies for the inconvenience by that increase of the national capital which flows from the conversion of waste into improved lands; and the different degrees of external commerce which are carried on by the different States may make material differences in the comparative state of their wealth. The first circumstance has reference to the deficiency of coin and the increase of debt previous to the Revolution; the last to the advantages which the most manufacturing States appear to have enjoyed over the others since the termination of the late war. But the uniform appearance of an abundance of specie, as the concomitant of a flourishing state of manufactures, and of the reverse, where they do not prevail, afford a strong presumption of their favorable operation upon the wealth of a country. Not only the wealth, but the independence and security of a country, appear to be materially connected with the prosperity of manufactures. Every nation, with a view to those great objects, ought to endeavor to possess within itself all the essentials of national supply. These comprise the means of subsistence, habitation, clothing, and defence. The possession of these is necessary to the perfection of the body politic, to the safety as well as to the welfare of the society. The want of either is the want of an important organ of political life and motion; and in the various crises which await a State it must severely feel the effects of such deficiency. The extreme embarrassments of the United States during the late war from an incapacity of supplying themselves, are still matter of keen recollection. A future war might be expected again to exemplify the mischiefs and dangers of a situation to which that incapacity is still in too great a degree applicable, unless changed by timely and vigorous exertions. To effect this change, as fast as shall be prudent, merits all the attention and all the zeal of our public councils. It is the next great work to be accomplished. The want of a Navy to protect our external commerce, as long as it shall continue, must render it a peculiarly precarious reliance for the supply of essential articles, and must serve to strengthen prodigiously the arguments in favor of manufactures.

To these general considerations are added some of a more particular nature. Our distance from Europe, the great fountain of manufactured supply, subjects us, in the existing state of things, to inconvenience and loss in two ways. The bulkiness of those commodities which are the chief productions of the soil, necessarily imposes very heavy charges on their transportation to distant markets. These charges, in the cases in which the nations to whom our products are sent, maintain a competition in the supply of their own markets, principally fall upon us, and form material deductions from the primitive value of the articles furnished. The charges on manufactured supplies brought from Europe are greatly enhanced by the same circumstance of distance. These charges, again, in the cases in which our own industry maintains no competition in our own markets, also principally fall upon us, and are an additional cause of extraordinary deduction from the primitive value of our own products, these being the materials of exchange for the foreign fabrics which we consume.

The equality and moderation of individual property, and the growing settlements of new districts, occasion, in this country, an unusual demand for coarse manufactures—the charges of which, being greater in proportion to their greater bulk, augment the disadvantage which has been just described.

As in most countries, domestic supplies maintain a very considerable competition with such foreign productions of the soil as are imported for sale. If the extensive establishment of manufactories in the United States does not create a similar competition in respect to manufactured articles, it appears to be clearly deducible, from the considerations which have been mentioned, that they must sustain a double loss in their exchanges with foreign nations, strongly conducive to an unfavorable balance of trade, and very prejudicial to their interests. These disadvantages press with no small weight on the landed interest of the country. In seasons of peace, they cause a serious deduction from the intrinsic value of the products of the soil. In the time of a war, which should either involve ourselves or another nation possessing a considerable share of our carrying trade, the charges on the transportation of our commodities, bulky as most of them are, could hardly fail to prove a grievous burden to the farmer, while obliged to depend in so great a degree as he now does, upon foreign markets for the vent of the surplus of his labor. As far as the prosperity of the fisheries of the United States is impeded by the want of an adequate market, there arises another special reason for desiring the extension of manufactures. Besides the fish, which, in many places, would be likely to make a part of the subsistence of the persons employed, it is known that the oils, bones, and skins, of marine animals are of extensive use in various manufactures. Hence the prospect of an additional demand for the produce of the fisheries.

One more point of view only remains, in which to consider the expediency of encouraging manufactures in the United States. It is not uncommon to meet with an opinion, that though the promoting of manufactures may be the interest of a part of the Union, it is contrary to that of another part. The Northern and Southern regions are sometimes represented as having adverse interests in this respect. Those are called manufacturing, these agricultural States, and a species of opposition is imagined to subsist between the manufacturing and agricultural interests. This idea of an opposition between those two interests is the common error of the early periods of every country; but experience gradually dissipates it. Indeed, they are perceived so often to succor and to befriend each other, that they come at length to be considered as one—a supposition which has been frequently abused, and is not universally true. Particular encouragements of particular manufactures may be of a nature to sacrifice the interests of landholders to those of manufacturers; but it is nevertheless a maxim well established by experience, and generally acknowledged where there has been sufficient experience, that the “aggregate” prosperity of manufactures, and the “aggregate” prosperity of agriculture are intimately connected. In the course of the discussion which has had place, various weighty considerations have been adduced, operating in support of that maxim. Perhaps the superior steadiness of the demand of a domestic market for the surplus produce of the soil, is alone a convincing argument of its truth.

Ideas of a contrariety of interests between the Northern and Southern regions of the Union, are, in the main, as unfounded as they are mischievous. The diversity of circumstances on which such contrariety is usually predicated, authorizes a directly contrary conclusion. Mutual wants constitute one of the strongest links of political connexion, and the extent of these bears a natural proportion to the diversity in the means of mutual supply. Suggestions of an opposite complexion are ever to be deplored, as unfriendly to the steady pursuit of one great common cause, and to the perfect harmony of all the parts.

In proportion as the mind is accustomed to trace the intimate connexion of interest which subsists between all the parts of a society, united under the same Government, the infinite variety of channels which serve to circulate the prosperity of each to and through the rest, in that proportion it will be little apt to be disturbed by solicitudes and apprehensions which originate in local discriminations. It is a truth as important as it is agreeable, and one to which it is not easy to imagine exceptions, that everything tending to establish substantial and permanent order in the affairs of a country, to increase the total mass of industry and opulence, is ultimately beneficial to every part of it. On the credit of this great truth, an acquiescence may safely be accorded, from every quarter, to all institutions and arrangements which promise a confirmation of public order, and an augmentation of national resource.

But there are more particular considerations, which serve to fortify the idea that the encouragement of manufactures is the interest of all parts of the Union. If the Northern and Middle States should be the principal scenes of such establishments, they would immediately benefit the more Southern, by creating a demand for productions, some of which they have in common with the other States, and others of which are either peculiar to them, or more abundant, or of better quality than elsewhere. These productions, principally, are timber, flax, hemp, cotton, wool, raw silk, indigo, iron, lead, furs, hides, skins, and coals. Of these articles, cotton and indigo are peculiar to the Southern States, as are hitherto lead and coal. Flax and hemp are, or may be raised in greater abundance there, than in the more Northern States; and the wool of Virginia is said to be of better quality than that of any other State—a circumstance rendered the more probable by the reflection that Virginia embraces the same latitudes with the finest wool countries of Europe. The climate of the South is also better adapted to the production of silk. The extensive cultivation of cotton can perhaps hardly be expected, but from the previous establishment of domestic manufactories of the article; and the surest encouragement and vent for the others, would result from similar establishments in respect to them.

If, then, it satisfactorily appears, that it is the interest of the United States, generally, to encourage manufactures, it merits particular attention, that there are circumstances which render the present a critical moment for entering with zeal upon the important business. The effort cannot fail to be materially seconded by a considerable and increasing influx of money, in consequence of foreign speculations in the funds, and by the disorders which exist in different parts of Europe.

The first circumstance not only facilitates the execution of manufacturing enterprises, but it indicates them as a necessary mean to turn the thing itself to advantage, and to prevent its being eventually an evil. If useful employment be not found for the money of foreigners brought to the country to be invested in purchases of the Public Debt, it will quickly be re-exported to defray the expense of an extraordinary consumption of foreign luxuries; and distressing drains of our specie may hereafter be experienced to pay the interest, and redeem the principal of the purchased Debt. This useful employment, too, ought to be of a nature to produce solid and permanent improvements. If the money merely serves to give a temporary spring to foreign commerce, as it cannot procure new and lasting outlets for the products of the country, there will be no real or durable advantage gained. As far as it shall find its way in agricultural ameliorations, in opening canals, and in similar improvements, it will be productive of substantial utility. But there is reason to doubt whether, in such channels, it is likely to find sufficient employment, and still more whether many of those who possess it, would be as readily attracted to objects of this nature, as manufacturing pursuits, which bear greater analogy to those to which they are accustomed, and to the spirit generated by them. To open the one field as well as the other, will at least secure a better prospect of useful employment, for whatever accession of money there has been or may be.

There is at the present juncture a certain fermentation of mind, a certain activity of speculation and enterprise, which, if properly directed, may be made subservient to useful purposes, but which, if left entirely to itself, may be attended with pernicious effects.

The disturbed state of Europe inclining its citizens to emigration, the requisite workmen will be more easily acquired than at another time; and the effect of multiplying the opportunities of employment to those who emigrate, may be an increase of the number and extent of valuable acquisitions to the population, arts, and industry of the country. To find pleasure in the calamities of other nations, would be criminal; but to benefit ourselves, by opening an asylum to those who suffer in consequence of them, is as justifiable as it is politic.

A full view having now been taken of the inducements to the promotion of manufactures in the United States, accompanied with an examination of the principal objections which are commonly urged in opposition, it is proper, in the next place, to consider the means by which it may be effected, as introductory to a specification of the objects which, in the present state of things, appear the most fit to be encouraged, and of the particular measures which it may be advisable to adopt, in respect to each.

In order to a better judgment of the means proper to be resorted to by the United States, it will be of use to advert to those which have been employed with success in other countries. The principal of these are—

I. Protecting duties, or duties on those foreign articles which are the rivals of the domestic ones intended to be encouraged. Duties of this nature evidently amount to a virtual bounty on the domestic fabrics, since, by enhancing the charges on foreign articles, they enable the national manufacturers to undersell all their foreign competitors. The propriety of this species of encouragement need not be dwelt upon, as it is not only a clear result from the numerous topics which have been suggested, but is sanctioned by the laws of the United States, in a variety of instances. It has the additional recommendation of being a resource of revenue. Indeed, all the duties imposed on imported articles, though with an exclusive view to revenue, have the effect in contemplation, and, except where they fall on raw materials, wear a beneficent aspect towards the manufactures of the country.

II. Prohibitions of rival articles, or duties equivalent to prohibitions. This is another and an efficacious mean of encouraging national manufactures, but in general it is only fit to be employed when a manufacture has made such a progress, and is in so many hands as to insure a due competition, and an adequate supply on reasonable terms. Of duties equivalent to prohibitions, there are examples in the laws of the United States, and there are other cases to which the principle may be advantageously extended, but they are not numerous. Considering a monopoly of the domestic market to its own manufacturers as the reigning policy of manufacturing nations, a similar policy on the part of the United States, in every proper instance, is dictated, it might almost be said, by the principles of distributive justice—certainly by the duty of endeavoring to secure to their own citizens a reciprocity of advantage.

III. Prohibitions of the exportation of the materials of manufactures. The desire of securing a cheap and plentiful supply for the national workmen, and, where the article is either peculiar to the country, or of peculiar quality there, the jealousy of enabling foreign workmen to rival those of the nation, with its own materials, are the leading motives to this species of regulation. It ought not to be affirmed, that it is in no instance proper; but it is certainly one which ought to be adopted with great circumspection, and only in very plain cases. It is seen at once, that its immediate operation is, to abridge the demand, and keep down the price of the produce of some other branch of industry—generally speaking, of agriculture—to the prejudice of those who carry it on; and though, if it be really essential to the prosperity of any very important national manufacture, it may happen that those who are injured in the first instance may be eventually indemnified by the superior steadiness of an extensive domestic market depending on that prosperity; yet, in a matter in which there is so much room for nice and difficult combinations, in which such opposite considerations combat each other, prudence seems to dictate that the expedient in question ought to be indulged with a sparing hand.

IV. Pecuniary bounties. This has been found one of the most efficacious means of encouraging manufactures, and it is in some views the best. Though it has not yet been practised upon by the Government of the United States, (unless the allowance on the exportation of dried and pickled fish and salted meat could be considered as a bounty,) and though it is less favored by public opinion than some other modes. Its advantages are these:

First. It is a species of encouragement more positive and direct than any other, and for that very reason, has a more immediate tendency to stimulate and uphold new enterprises, increasing the chances of profit, and diminishing the risks of loss in the first attempts.

Second. It avoids the inconvenience of a temporary augmentation of price, which is incident to some other modes, or it produces it to a less degree, either by making no addition to the charges on the rival foreign article, as in the case of protecting duties, or by making a smaller addition. The first happens when the fund for the bounty is derived from a different object, which may or may not increase the price of some other article, according to the nature of that object; the second, when the fund is derived from the same or a similar object of foreign manufacture. One per cent. duty on the foreign article converted into a bounty on the domestic, will have an equal effect with a duty of two per cent., exclusive of such bounty; and the price of the foreign commodity is liable to be raised in the one case in the proportion of one per cent.; in the other, in that of two per cent. Indeed, the bounty, when drawn from another source, is calculated to promote a reduction of price; because, without laying any new charge on the foreign article, it serves to introduce a competition with it, and to increase the total quantity of the article in the market.

Third. Bounties have not, like high protecting duties, a tendency to produce scarcity. An increase of price is not always the immediate (though where the progress of a domestic manufacture does not counteract a rise, it is commonly the ultimate) effect of an additional duty. In the interval between the laying of the duty and a proportional increase of price, it may discourage importation, by interfering with the profits to be expected from the sale of the article.

Fourth. Bounties are sometimes not only the best, but the only proper expedient, for uniting the encouragement of a new object of agriculture with that of a new object of manufacture. It is the interest of the farmer to have the production of the raw material promoted, by counteracting the interference of the foreign material of the same kind. It is the interest of the manufacturer to have the material abundant and cheap. If, prior to the domestic production of the material in sufficient quantity to supply the manufacturer on good terms, a duty be laid upon the importation of it from abroad, with a view to promote the raising of it at home, the interest both of the farmer and manufacturer will be disserved, by either destroying the requisite supply, or raising the price of the article beyond what can be afforded to be given for it by the conductor of an infant manufacture, it is abandoned or fails; and, there being no domestic manufactories to create a demand for the raw material which is raised by the farmer, it is in vain that the competition of the like foreign article may have been destroyed.

It cannot escape notice, that a duty upon the importation of an article can no otherwise aid the domestic production of it, than by giving the latter greater advantages in the home market. It can have no influence upon the advantageous sale of the article produced, in foreign markets—no tendency, therefore, to promote its exportation.

The true way to conciliate these two interests is, to lay a duty on foreign manufactures of the material, the growth of which is desired to be encouraged, and to apply the produce of that duty by way of bounty, either upon the production of the material itself, or upon its manufacture at home, or upon both. In this disposition of the thing, the manufacturer commences his enterprise under every advantage which is attainable, as to quantity or price of the raw material. And the farmer, if the bounty be immediately to him, is enabled by it to enter into a successful competition with the foreign material; if the bounty be to the manufacturer on so much of the domestic material as he consumes, the operation is nearly the same: he has a motive of interest to prefer the domestic commodity, if of equal quality, even at a higher price than the foreign, so long as the difference of price is anything short of the bounty which is allowed upon the article.

Except the simple and ordinary kinds of household manufacture, or those for which there are very commanding local advantages, pecuniary bounties are in most cases indispensable to the introduction of a new branch. A stimulus and a support not less powerful and direct is, generally speaking, essential to the overcoming of the obstacles which arise from the competitions of superior skill and maturity elsewhere. Bounties are especially essential, in regard to articles upon which those foreigners who have been accustomed to supply a country, are in the practice of granting them.

The continuance of bounties on manufactures long established, must almost always be of questionable policy; because a presumption would arise in every such case, that there were natural and inherent impediments to success. But in new undertakings, they are as justifiable as they are oftentimes necessary. There is a degree of prejudice against bounties from an appearance of giving away the public money, without an immediate consideration, and from a supposition that they serve to enrich particular classes at the expense of the community. But neither of these sources of dislike will bear serious examination. There is no purpose to which public money can be more beneficially applied, than to the acquisition of a new and useful branch of industry—no consideration more valuable than a permanent addition to the general stock of productive labor.

As to the second source of objection, it equally lies against the other modes of encouragement which are admitted to be eligible. As often as a duty upon a foreign article makes an addition to its price, it causes an extra expense to the community, for the benefit of the domestic manufacturer. A bounty does no more. But it is the interest of the society, in each case, to submit to a temporary expense, which is more than compensated by an increase of industry and wealth, by an augmentation of resources and independence, and by the circumstance of eventual cheapness, which has been noticed in another place.

It would deserve attention, however, in the employment of this species of encouragement in the United States, as a reason for moderating the degree of it in the instances in which it might be deemed eligible, that the great distance of this country from Europe imposes very heavy charges on all the fabrics which are brought from thence, amounting from 15 to 30 per cent. on their value, according to their bulk.

A question has been made concerning the constitutional right of the Government of the United States to apply this species of encouragement, but there is certainly no good foundation for such a question. The National Legislature has express authority "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts, and provide for the common defence and general welfare," with no other qualifications than that "all duties, imposts, and excises, shall be uniform throughout the United States;" that no capitation or other direct tax shall be laid unless in proportion to numbers ascertained by a census or enumeration, taken on the principles prescribed in the Constitution, and that "no tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State."

These three qualifications excepted, the power to raise money is plenary and indefinite; and the objects to which it may be appropriated are no less comprehensive, than the payment of the public debts, and the providing for the common defence and general welfare. The terms "general welfare" were doubtless intended to signify more than was expressed or imported in those which preceded; otherwise, numerous exigencies, incident to the affairs of a nation, would have been left without a provision. The phrase is as comprehensive as any that could have been used; because it was not fit that the constitutional authority of the Union to appropriate its revenues, should have been restricted within narrower limits than the "general welfare;" and because this necessarily embraces a vast variety of particulars, which are susceptible neither of specification nor of definition. It is therefore, of necessity, left to the discretion of the National Legislature to pronounce upon the objects which concern the general welfare, and for which, under that description, an appropriation of money is requisite and proper; and there seems to be no room for a doubt that whatever concerns the general interests of learning, of agriculture, of manufactures, and of commerce, are within the sphere of the National Councils, as far as regards an application of money.

The only qualification of the generality of the phrase in question, which seems to be admissible, is this: That the object to which an appropriation of money is to be made, be general, and not local; its operation extending, in fact or by possibility, throughout the Union, and not being confined to a particular spot.

No objection ought to arise to this construction from a supposition that it would imply a power to do whatever else should appear to Congress conducive to the general welfare. A power to appropriate money with this latitude, which is granted, too, in express terms, would not carry a power to do any other thing, not authorized in the Constitution, either expressly or by fair implication.

V. Premiums.

These are of a nature allied to bounties, though distinguishable from them in some important features.

Bounties are applicable to the whole quantity of an article produced, or manufactured, or exported, and involve a correspondent expense. Premiums serve to reward some particular excellence or superiority, some extraordinary exertion or skill, and are dispensed only in a small number of cases. But their effect is to stimulate general effort: contrived so as to be both honorary and lucrative, they address themselves to different passions, touching the chords as well of emulation as interest. They are accordingly a very economical mean of exciting the enterprise of a whole community.

There are various societies in different countries, whose object is the dispensation of premiums for the encouragement of agriculture, arts, manufactures, and commerce; and though they are, for the most part, voluntary associations, with comparatively slender funds, their utility has been immense. Much has been done by this mean in Great Britain. Scotland, in particular, owes materially to it a prodigious amelioration of condition. From a similar establishment in the United States, supplied and supported by the Government of the Union, vast benefits might reasonably be expected.

Report on Manufactures.

Some further ideas on this head, shall accordingly be submitted, in the conclusion of this Report.

VI. The exemption of the materials of manufactures from duty.

The policy of that exemption as a general rule, particularly in reference to new establishments, is obvious. It can hardly ever be advisable to add the obstructions of fiscal burdens to the difficulties which naturally embarrass a new manufacture; and where it is matured, and in condition to become an object of revenue, it is, generally speaking, better that the fabric, than the material, should be the subject of taxation. Ideas of proportion between the quantum of the tax and the value of the article, can be more easily adjusted in the former than in the latter case. An argument for exemptions of this kind in the United States, is to be derived from the practice, as far as their necessities have permitted, of those nations whom we are to meet as competitors, in our own and in foreign markets.

There are, however, exceptions to it; of which some examples will be given under the next head.

The laws of the Union afford instances of the observance of the policy here recommended, but it will probably be found advisable to extend it to some other cases. Of a nature bearing some affinity to that policy is the regulation which exempts from duty the tools and implements, as well as the books, clothes, and household furniture, of foreign artists, who come to reside in the United States; an advantage already secured to them by the laws of the Union, and which it is, in every view, proper to continue.

VII. Drawbacks of the duties which are imposed on the materials of manufactures.

It has already been observed, as a general rule, that duties on those materials ought, with certain exceptions, to be forborne. Of these exceptions, three cases occur, which may serve as examples: One, where the material is itself an object of general or extensive consumption, and a fit and productive source of revenue. Another, where a manufacture of a simpler kind, the competition of which with a like domestic article is desired to be restrained, partakes of the nature of a raw material, from being capable, by a further process, to be converted into a manufacture of a different kind, the introduction or growth of which is desired to be encouraged. A third, where the material itself is a production of the country, and in sufficient abundance to furnish a cheap and plentiful supply to the national manufacturers.

Under the first description comes the article of molasses. It is not only a fair object of revenue, but being a sweet, it is just that the consumers of it should pay a duty as well as the consumers of sugar.

Cottons and linen, in their white state, fall under the second description; a duty upon such as are imported is proper, to promote the domestic manufacture of similar articles in the same state; a drawback of that duty is proper, to encourage the printing and staining at home of those which are brought from abroad. When the first of these manufactures has attained sufficient maturity in a country to furnish a full supply for the second, the utility of the drawback ceases.

The article of hemp, either now does, or may be expected soon to exemplify the third case, in the United States.

Where duties on the materials of manufactures are not laid for the purpose of preventing a competition with some domestic production, the same reasons which recommend, as a general rule, the exemption of those materials from duties, would recommend as a like general rule, the allowance of drawbacks, in favor of the manufacturer. Accordingly, such drawbacks are familiar in countries which systematically pursue the business of manufactures; which furnishes an argument for the observance of a similar policy in the United States; and the idea has been adopted by the laws of the Union, in the instances of salt and molasses. It is believed that it will be found advantageous to extend it to some other articles.

VIII. The encouragement of new inventions and discoveries, at home, and of the introduction into the United States of such as may have been made in other countries, particularly those which relate to machinery.

This is among the most useful and unexceptionable of the aids which can be given to manufactures. The usual means of that encouragement are pecuniary rewards, and, for a time, exclusive privileges. The first must be employed according to the occasion and the utility of the invention or discovery. For the last, so far as respects "authors and inventors," provision has been made by law. But it is desirable, in regard to improvements and secrets of extraordinary value, to be able to extend the same benefit to introducers, as well as authors and inventors; a policy which has been practised with advantage in other countries. Here, however, as in some other cases, there is cause to regret that the competency of the authority of the National Government to the good which might be done, is not without a question: Many aids might be given to industry, many internal improvements of primary magnitude might be promoted, by an authority operating throughout the Union; which cannot be effected as well, if at all, by an authority confined within the limits of a single State.

But if the Legislature of the Union cannot do all the good that might be wished, it is at least desirable that all may be done which is practicable. Means for promoting the introduction of foreign improvements, though less efficaciously than might be accomplished with more adequate authority, will form a part of the plan intended to be submitted in the close of this Report.

It is customary with manufacturing nations to prohibit, under severe penalties, the exportation of implements and machines, which they have either invented or improved. There are already objects for a similar regulation in the United States, and others may be expected to occur from time to time. The adoption of it seems to be dictated by the principle of reciprocity. Greater liberality in such respects might better comport with the general spirit of the country; but a selfish and exclusive policy in other quarters will not always permit the free indulgence of a spirit which would place us on an unequal footing. As far as prohibitions tend to prevent foreign competitors from deriving the benefit of the improvements made at home, they tend to increase the advantages of those by whom they may have been introduced, and operate as an encouragement to exertion.

IX. Judicious regulations for the inspection of manufactured commodities.

This is not among the least important of the means by which the prosperity of manufactures may be promoted. It is indeed, in many cases, one of the most essential. Contributing to prevent frauds upon consumers at home, and exporters to foreign countries; to improve the quality and preserve the character of the national manufactures; it cannot fail to aid the expeditious and advantageous sale of them, and to serve as a guard against successful competition from other quarters. The reputation of the flour and lumber of some States, and of the potash of others, has been established by an attention to this point; and the like good name might be procured for those articles, wheresoever produced, by a judicious and uniform system of inspection throughout the ports of the United States. A like system might also be extended with advantage to other commodities.

X. The facilitating of pecuniary remittances from place to place—

Is a point of considerable moment to trade in general, and to manufactures in particular, by rendering more easy the purchase of raw materials and provisions, and the payment for manufactured supplies. A general circulation of bank paper—which is to be expected from the institution lately established—will be a most valuable mean to this end. But much good would accrue from some additional provisions respecting inland bills of exchange. If those drawn in one State, payable in another, were made negotiable everywhere, and interest and damages allowed in case of protest, it would greatly promote negotiations between the citizens of different States, by rendering them more secure, and with it the convenience and advantage of the merchants and manufacturers of each.

XI. The facilitating of the transportation of commodities.

Improvements favoring this object intimately concern all the domestic interests of a community; but they may, without impropriety, be mentioned as having an important relation to manufactures. There is, perhaps, scarcely anything which has been better calculated to assist the manufactures of Great Britain than the ameliorations of the public roads of that Kingdom, and the great progress which has been of late made in opening canals. Of the former, the United States stand much in need, for they present uncommon facilities.

The symptoms of attention to the improvement of inland navigation, which have lately appeared in some quarters, must fill with pleasure every breast warmed with a true zeal for the prosperity of the country. These examples, it is to be hoped, will stimulate the exertions of the Government and citizens of every State. There can certainly be no object more worthy of the cares of the local administrations; and it were to be wished that there was no doubt of the power of the National Government to lend its direct aid, on a comprehensive plan. This is one of those improvements which could be prosecuted with more efficacy by the whole, than by any part or parts of the Union. There are cases in which the general interest will be in danger to be sacrificed to the collision of some supposed local interests. Jealousies, in matters of this kind, are as apt to exist, as they are apt to be erroneous.

The following remarks are sufficiently judicious and pertinent to deserve a literal quotation:

“Good roads, canals, and navigable rivers, by diminishing the expense of carriage, put the remote parts of a country more nearly upon a level with those in the neighborhood of the town. They are upon that account the greatest of all improvements. They encourage the cultivation of the remote, which must always be the most extensive circle of the country. They are advantages to the town, by breaking down the monopoly of the country in its neighborhood. They are advantages even to that part of the country. Though they introduce some rival commodities into the old market, they open many new markets to its produce. Monopoly, besides, is a great enemy to good management, which can never be universally established, but in consequence of that free and universal competition, which forces everybody to have recourse to it for the sake of self-defence. It is not more than fifty years ago that some of the counties in the neighborhood of London petitioned the Parliament against the extension of the turnpike roads into the remoter counties. Those remoter counties, they pretended, from the cheapness of labor, would be able to sell their grass and corn cheaper in the London market, than themselves, and they would thereby reduce their rents, and ruin their cultivation. Their rents, however, have risen, and their cultivation has been improved, since that time.”

Specimens of a spirit similar to that which governed the counties here spoken of, present themselves too frequently to the eye of an impartial observer, and render it a wish of patriotism that the body in this country, in whose councils a local or partial spirit is least likely to predominate, were at liberty to pursue and promote the general interest, in those instances in which there might be danger of the interference of such a spirit.

The foregoing are the principal of the means by which the growth of manufactures is ordinarily promoted. It is, however, not merely necessary that the measures of Government which have a direct view to manufactures, should be calculated to assist and protect them, but that those which only collaterally affect them, in the general course of the Administration, should be guarded from any peculiar tendency to injure them.

There are certain species of taxes which are apt to be oppressive to different parts of the community, and, among other ill effects, have a very unfriendly aspect towards manufactures. All poll or capitation taxes are of this nature. They either proceed according to a fixed rate, which operates unequally, and injuriously to the industrious poor; or they vest a discretion in certain officers, to make estimates and assessments which are necessarily vague, conjectural, and liable to abuse. They ought, therefore, to be abstained from, in all but cases of distressing emergency.

Report on Manufactures.

All such taxes (including all taxes on occupations) which proceed according to the amount of capital supposed to be employed in a business, or of profits supposed to be made in it, are unavoidably hurtful to industry. It is in vain that the evil may be endeavored to be mitigated, by leaving it, in the first instance, in the option of the party to be taxed, to declare the amount of his capital or profits.

Men engaged in any trade or business have commonly weighty reasons to avoid disclosures, which would expose, with anything like accuracy, the real state of their affairs. They most frequently find it better to risk oppression, than to avail themselves of so inconvenient a refuge; and the consequence is, that they often suffer oppression.

When the disclosure, too, if made, is not definitive, but controllable by the discretion, or, in other words, by the passions and prejudices of the revenue officers, it is not only an ineffectual protection, but the possibility of its being so is an additional reason for not resorting to it.

Allowing to the public officers the most equitable dispositions, yet where they are to exercise a discretion without certain data, they cannot fail to be often misled by appearances. The quantity of business which seems to be going on, is, in a vast number of cases, a very deceitful criterion of the profits which are made; yet it is, perhaps, the best they can have, and it is the one on which they will most naturally rely. A business, therefore, which may rather require aid from the Government than be in a capacity to be contributory to it, may find itself crushed by the mistaken conjectures of the assessors of taxes.

Arbitrary taxes—under which denomination are comprised all those that leave the quantum of the tax to be raised on each person to the discretion of certain officers—are as contrary to the genius of liberty, as to the maxims of industry. In this light they have been viewed by the most judicious observers on Government, who have bestowed upon them the severest epithets of reprobation, as constituting one of the worst features usually to be met with in the practice of despotic governments. It is certain, at least, that such taxes are particularly inimical to the success of manufacturing industry, and ought carefully to be avoided by a government which desires to promote it.

The great copiousness of the subject of this Report, has insensibly led to a more lengthy preliminary discussion, than was originally contemplated or intended. It appeared proper to investigate principles, to consider objections, and to endeavor to establish the utility of the thing proposed to be encouraged, previous to a specification of the objects which might occur, as meriting or requiring encouragement, and of the measures which might be proper in respect to each. The first purpose having been fulfilled, it remains to pursue the second.

In the selection of objects, five circumstances seem entitled to particular attention: The capacity of the country to furnish the raw material—the degree in which the nature of the manufacture admits of a substitute for manual labor in machinery—the facility of execution—the extensiveness of the uses to which the article can be applied—its subserviency to other interests, particularly the great one of the national defence. There are, however, objects to which these circumstances are little applicable, which, for some special reasons, may have a claim to encouragement.

A designation of the principal raw material of which each manufacture is composed, will serve to introduce the remarks upon it; as, in the first place, IRON.—The manufactures of this article are entitled to pre-eminent rank. None are more essential in their kinds, nor so extensive in their uses. They constitute, in whole or in part, the implements or the materials, or both, of almost every useful occupation. Their instrumentality is everywhere conspicuous.

It is fortunate for the United States that they have peculiar advantages for deriving the full benefit of this most valuable material, and they have every motive to improve it, with systematic care. It is to be found in various parts of the United States, in great abundance and of almost every quality; and fuel, the chief instrument in manufacturing it, is both cheap and plenty. This particularly applies to charcoal; but there are productive coal mines already in operation, and strong indications, that the material is to be found in abundance, in a variety of other places.

The inquiries to which the subject of this Report has led, have been answered with proofs that manufactories of iron, though generally understood to be extensive, are far more so than is commonly supposed. The kinds in which the greatest progress has been made, have been mentioned in another place, and need not be repeated; but there is little doubt that every other kind, with due cultivation, will rapidly succeed. It is worthy of remark, that several of the particular trades, of which it is the basis, are capable of being carried on without the aid of large capitals.

Iron works have greatly increased in the United States, and are prosecuted with much more advantage than formerly. The average price before the Revolution, was about sixty-four dollars per ton; at present it is about eighty; a rise which is chiefly to be attributed to the increase of manufactories of the material.

The still further extension and multiplication of such manufactories will have the double effect of promoting the extraction of the metal itself, and of converting it to a greater number of profitable purposes.

Those manufactures, too, unite in a greater degree, than almost any others, the several requisites, which have been mentioned, as proper to be consulted in the selection of objects.

The only further encouragement of manufactories of this article, the propriety of which may be considered as unquestionable, seems to be an increase of the duties on foreign rival commodities.

Steel is a branch which has already made a considerable progress, and it is ascertained that some new enterprises, on a more extensive scale, have been lately set on foot. The facility of carrying it to an extent which will supply all internal demands, and furnish a considerable surplus for exportation, cannot be doubted. The duty upon the importation of this article, which is at present seventy-five cents per cwt., may, it is conceived, be safely and advantageously extended to one hundred cents. It is desirable, by decisive arrangements, to second the efforts which are making in so very valuable a branch.

The United States already, in a great measure, supply themselves with nails and spikes. They are able, and ought certainly, to do it entirely. The first and most laborious operation in this manufacture, is performed by water-mills; and of the persons afterwards employed, a great proportion are boys, whose early habits of industry are of importance to the community, to the present support of their families, and to their own future comfort. It is not less curious than true, that, in certain parts of the country, the making of nails is an occasional family manufacture.

The expediency of an additional duty on these articles is indicated by an important fact. About 1,800,000 pounds of them were imported into the United States in the course of a year, ending the 30th of September, 1790. A duty of two cents per pound would, it is presumable, speedily put an end to so considerable an importation. And it is in every view proper that an end should be put to it.

The manufacture of these articles, like that of some others, suffers from the carelessness and dishonesty of a part of those who carry it on. An inspection in certain cases might tend to correct the evil. It will deserve consideration whether a regulation of this sort cannot be applied, without inconvenience, to the exportation of the articles either to foreign countries, or from one State to another.

The implements of husbandry are made in several States in great abundance. In many places it is done by the common blacksmiths. And there is no doubt that an ample supply for the whole country can with great ease be procured among ourselves.

Various kinds of edged tools for the use of mechanics are also made, and a considerable quantity of hollow wares; though the business of castings has not yet attained the perfection which might be wished. It is however improving, and as there are respectable capitals in good hands, embarked in the prosecution of those branches of iron manufactories, which are yet in their infancy, they may all be contemplated as objects not difficult to be acquired.

To insure the end it seems equally safe and prudent to extend the duty ad valorem upon all manufactures of iron, of which iron is the article of chief value, to ten per cent.

Fire arms and other military weapons may, it is conceived, be placed without inconvenience in the class of articles rated at fifteen per cent. There exist already manufactories of these articles, which only require the stimulus of a certain demand to render them adequate to the supply of the United States.

It would also be a material aid to manufactories of this nature, as well as a mean of public security if provision should be made for an annual purchase of military weapons, of home manufacture to a certain determined extent, in order to the formation of arsenals; and to replace from time to time such as should be withdrawn for use, so as always to have in store the quantity of each kind, which should be deemed a competent supply.

But it may hereafter deserve Legislative consideration, whether manufactories of all the necessary weapons of war ought not to be established on account of Government itself. Such establishments are agreeable to the usual practice of nations, and that practice seems founded on sufficient reason.

There appears to be an improvidence, in leaving these essential instruments of national defence to the casual speculations of individual adventure; a resource which can less be relied upon, in this case than in most others; the articles in question not being objects of ordinary and indispensable private consumption or use. As a general rule, manufactories on the immediate account of Government are to be avoided; but this seems to be one of the few exceptions, which that rule admits, depending on very special reasons.

Manufactures of steel, generally, or of which steel is the article of chief value, may with advantage be placed in the class of goods rated at seven and an half per cent. As manufactures of this kind have not yet made any considerable progress, it is a reason for not rating them as high as those of iron; but as this material is the basis of them, and as their extension is not less practicable, than important, it is desirable to promote it by a somewhat higher duty than the present.

A question arises, how far it might be expedient to permit the importation of iron in pigs and bars free from duty? It would certainly be favorable to manufacturers of the article; but the doubt is whether it might not interfere with its production.

Two circumstances, however, abate if they do not remove apprehension, on this score, one is the considerable increase of price, which has been already remarked, and which renders it probable that the free admission of foreign iron would not be inconsistent with an adequate profit to the proprietors of iron works; the other is, the augmentation of demand, which would be likely to attend the increase of manufactures of the article, in consequence of the additional encouragements proposed to be given. But caution, nevertheless, in a matter of this kind is most advisable. The measure suggested ought perhaps rather to be contemplated, subject to the lights of further experience, than immediately adopted.

COPPER.—The manufactures of which this article is susceptible are also of great extent and utility. Under this description, those of brass, of which it is the principal ingredient, are intended to be included.

The material is a natural production of the country. Mines of copper have actually been wrought, and with a profit to the undertakers, though it is not known, that any are now in this condition. And nothing is easier, than the introduction of it, from other countries, on moderate terms, and in great plenty.

Coppersmiths and brass founders, particularly the former, are numerous in the United States; some of whom carry on business to a respectable extent.

To multiply and extend manufactories, of the materials in question is worthy of attention and effort. In order to this, it is desirable to facilitate a plentiful supply of the materials. And a proper mean to this end is to place them in the class of free articles. Copper in plates and brass are already in this predicament; but copper in bars and pigs is not; neither is lapis caliminaris, which together with copper and charcoal, constitute the component ingredients of brass. The exemption from duty by parity of reason, ought to embrace all such of these articles, as are objects of importation.

An additional duty on brass wares, will tend to the general end in view. These now stand at five per cent., while those of tin, pewter, and copper, are rated at seven and an half. There appears to be a propriety in every view in placing brass wares upon the same level with them; and it merits consideration whether the duty upon all of them ought not to be raised to ten per cent.

LEAD.—There are numerous proofs, that this material abounds in the United States, and requires little to unfold it to an extent, more than equal to every domestic occasion. A prolific mine of it has long been open in the Southwestern parts of Virginia, and under a public administration, during the late war, yielded a considerable supply for military use. This is now in the hands of individuals, who not only carry it on with spirit, but have established manufactories of it, at Richmond, in the same State.

The duties already laid upon the importation of this article, either in its unmanufactured, or manufactured state, insure it a decisive advantage in the home market—which amounts to considerable encouragement. If the duty on pewter wares should be raised, it would afford a further encouragement. Nothing else occurs proper to be added.

FOSIL COAL.—This as an important instrument of manufactures, may, without impropriety, be mentioned among the subjects of this Report.

A copious supply of it would be of great consequence to the iron branch. As an article of household fuel, also, it is an interesting production; the utility of which must increase in proportion to the decrease of wood, by the progress of settlement and cultivation. And its importance to navigation, as an immense article of transportation coastwise, is signally exemplified in Great Britain.

It is known, that there are several coal mines in Virginia, now worked, and appearances of their existence are familiar in a number of places.

The expediency of a bounty on all this species of coal of home production, and of premiums on the opening of new mines, under certain qualifications, appears to be worthy of particular examination. The great importance of the article will amply justify a reasonable expense in this way, if it shall appear to be necessary to, and shall be thought likely to answer the end.

WOOD.—Several manufactures of this article flourish in the United States. Ships are no where built in greater perfection, and cabinet wares, generally, are made little if at all inferior to those of Europe. Their extent is such as to have admitted of considerable exportation.

An exemption from duty of the several kinds of wood ordinarily used in these manufactures seems to be all that is requisite, by way of encouragement. It is recommended by the consideration of a similar policy being pursued in other countries, and by the expediency of giving equal advantages to our own workmen in wood. The abundance of timber proper for ship building in the United States does not appear to be any objection to it. The increasing scarcity and growing importance of that article in the European countries, admonish the United States to commence, and systematically to pursue measures for the preservation of their stock. Whatever may promote the regular establishment of magazines of ship timber, is in various views desirable.

SKINS.—There are scarcely any manufactories of greater importance than of this article. Their direct and very happy influence upon agriculture, by promoting the raising of cattle of different kinds, is a very material recommendation.

It is pleasing, too, to observe the extensive progress they have made in their principal branches; which are so far matured as almost to defy foreign competition. Tanneries in particular are not only carried on as a regular business in numerous instances and in various parts of the country, but they constitute in some places a valuable item of incidental family manufactures.

Representations, however, have been made importing the expediency of further encouragement to the leather branch in two ways; one by increasing the duty on the manufactures of it, which are imported, the other by prohibiting the exportation of bark. In support of the latter it is alleged that the price of bark, chiefly, in consequence of large exportations, has risen within a few years from about three dollars to four dollars and a half per cord.

These suggestions are submitted rather as intimations, which merit consideration, than as matters, the propriety of which is manifest. It is not clear, that an increase of duty is necessary; and in regard to the prohibition desired, there is no evidence of any considerable exportation hitherto; and it is most probable that whatever augmentation of price may have taken place, is to be attributed to an extension of the home demand from increase of manufactures, and to a decrease of the supply in consequence of the progress of settlement, rather than to the quantities which have been exported.

It is mentioned, however, as an additional reason for the prohibition, that one species of the bark usually exported is in some sort peculiar to the country, and the material of a very valuable dye, of great use in some other manufactures, in which the United States have begun a competition.

Report on Manufactures.

There may also be this argument in favor of an increase of duty. The object is of importance enough to claim decisive encouragement, and the progress which has been made, leaves no room to apprehend any inconvenience on the score of supply from such an increase.

It would be of benefit to this branch, if glue which is now rated at five per cent. were made the object of an excluding duty. It is already made in large quantities at various tanneries; and, like paper, is an entire economy of material, which, if not manufactured, would be left to perish. It may be placed with advantage in the class of articles paying fifteen per cent.

GRAIN.—Manufactures of the several species of this article have a title to peculiar favor; not only because they are most of them immediately connected with the subsistence of the citizens, but because they enlarge the demand for the most precious products of the soil.

Though flour may, with propriety, be noticed as a manufacture of grain, it were useless to do it, but for the purpose of submitting the expediency of a general system of inspection throughout the ports of the United States; which, if established upon proper principles, would be likely to improve the quality of our flour everywhere, and to raise its reputation in foreign markets. There are, however, considerations which stand in the way of such an arrangement. Ardent spirits and malt liquors are, next to flour, the two principal manufactures of grain. The first has made a very extensive, the last a considerable progress, in the United States. In respect to both, an exclusive possession of the home market ought to be secured to the domestic manufacturers as fast as circumstances will admit. Nothing is more practicable, and nothing more desirable. The existing laws of the United States have done much toward attaining this valuable object; but some additions to the present duties on foreign distilled spirits and foreign malt liquors, and perhaps an abatement of those on home-made spirits, would more effectually secure it; and there does not occur any very weighty objection to either. An augmentation of the duties on imported spirits would favor as well the distillation of spirits from molasses as that of grain. And to secure to the nation the benefit of a manufacture, even of foreign materials, is always of great, though perhaps of secondary importance. A strong impression prevails in the minds of those concerned in distilleries (including, too, the most candid and enlightened) that greater differences in the rates of duty on foreign and domestic spirits are necessary completely to secure the successful manufacture of the latter; and there are facts which entitle this impression to attention. It is known that the price of molasses, for some years past, has been successively rising in the West India markets, owing, partly, to a competition which did not formerly exist, and partly to an extension of demand in this country; and it is evident that the late disturbances in those islands from which we draw our principal supply must so far interfere with the production of the article as to occasion a material enhancement of price. The destruction and devastation attendant on the insurrection in Hispaniola, in particular, must not only contribute very much to that effect, but may be expected to give it some duration. These circumstances, and the duty of three cents per gallon on molasses, may render it difficult for the distillers of that material to maintain with adequate profit, a competition with the rum brought from the West Indies, the quality of which is so considerably superior. The consumption of Geneva, or gin, in this country, is extensive. It is not long since distilleries of it have grown up among us to any importance. They are now becoming of consequence, but being still in their infancy, they require protection. It is represented that the price of some of the materials is greater here than in Holland, from which place large quantities are brought; the price of labor considerably greater; the capitals engaged in the business there much larger than those which are employed here; the rate of profits at which the undertakers can afford to carry it on much less; the prejudices in favor of imported gin, strong. These circumstances are alleged to outweigh the charges which attend the bringing of the article from Europe to the United States and the present difference of duty, so as to obstruct the prosecution of the manufacture with due advantage. Experiment could, perhaps, alone decide with certainty the justness of the suggestions which are made; but, in relation to branches of manufacture so important, it would seem inexpedient to hazard an unfavorable issue, and better to err on the side of too great, than of too small a difference, in the particular in question. It is, therefore, submitted that an addition of two cents per gallon be made to the duty on imported spirits of the first class of proof, with a proportionable increase on those of higher proof, and that a deduction of one cent per gallon be made from the duty on spirits distilled within the United States, beginning with the first class of proof, and a proportionable deduction from the duty on those of higher proof. It is ascertained that by far the greatest part of the malt liquors consumed in the United States are the produce of domestic breweries. It is desirable, and, in all likelihood, attainable, that the whole consumption should be supplied by ourselves. The malt liquors made at home, though inferior to the best, are equal to a great part of those which have been usually imported. The progress already made is an earnest of what may be accomplished. The growing competition is an assurance of improvement. This will be accelerated by measures tending to invite a greater capital into this channel of employment. To render the encouragement of domestic breweries decisive, it may be advisable to substitute to the present rates of duty eight cents per gallon generally; and it will deserve to be considered, as a guard against invasions, whether there ought not to be a prohibition of their importation, except in casks of considerable capacity. It is to be hoped that such a duty would banish from the market foreign malt liquors of inferior quality, and that the best kind only would continue to be imported, till it should be supplanted by the efforts of equal skill or care at home. Till that period the importation so qualified would be an useful stimulus to improvement; and, in the meantime, the payment of the increased price, for the enjoyment of a luxury, in order to the encouragement of a most useful branch of domestic industry, could not reasonably be deemed a hardship. As a further aid to manufactures of grain, though upon a smaller scale, the articles of starch, hair powder, and wafers, may with great propriety be placed among those which are rated at fifteen per cent. No manufactures are more simple, nor more completely within the reach of a full supply from domestic sources; and it is a policy, as common as it is obvious, to make them the objects either of prohibitory duties or of express prohibition.

FLAX AND HEMP.—Manufactures of these articles have so much affinity to each other, and they are so often blended, that they may with advantage be considered in conjunction. The importance of the linen branch to agriculture, its precious effects upon household industry, the ease with which the materials can be produced at home to any requisite extent, the great advances which have been already made in the coarser fabrics of them, especially in the family way, constitute claims of peculiar force to the patronage of Government. This patronage may be afforded in various ways, by promoting the growth of the materials, by increasing the impediments to an advantageous competition of rival foreign articles, by direct bounties or premiums upon the home manufacture. First, as to promoting the growth of the materials. In respect to hemp, something has been already done by the high duty upon foreign hemp. If the facilities for domestic production were not unusually great, the policy of the duty on the foreign raw material would be highly questionable, as interfering with the growth of manufactures of it. But, making the proper allowances for those facilities, and with an eye to the future and natural progress of the country, the measure does not appear, upon the whole, exceptionable. A strong wish naturally suggests itself that some method could be devised of affording a more direct encouragement to the growth both of flax and hemp, such as would be effectual, and at the same time not attended with too great inconveniences. To this end bounties and premiums offer themselves to consideration; but no modification of them has yet occurred which would not either hazard too much expense or operate unequally in reference to the circumstances of different parts of the Union, and which would not be attended with very great difficulties in the execution. Secondly, as to increasing the impediments to an advantageous competition of rival foreign articles. To this purpose an augmentation of the duties on importation is the obvious expedient; which, in regard to certain articles, appears to be recommended by sufficient reasons. The principal of these articles is sail cloth, one intimately connected with navigation and defence, and of which a flourishing manufactory is established at Boston, and very promising ones at several other places. It is presumed to be both safe and advisable to place this in the class of articles rated at ten per cent. A strong reason for it results from the consideration that a bounty of two pence sterling per ell is allowed in Great Britain upon the exportation of the sail cloth manufactured in that Kingdom. It would likewise appear to be good policy to raise the duty to seven and a half per cent. on the following articles: drillings, osnaburgs, ticklenburgs, dowlas, canvas, brown rolls, bagging, and upon all other linens the first cost of which at the place of exportation does not exceed thirty-five cents per yard. A bounty of twelve and a half per cent., upon an average, on the exportation of such or similar linens from Great Britain encourages the manufacture of them in that country, and increases the obstacles to a successful competition in the countries to which they are sent. The quantities of tow and other household linens manufactured in different parts of the United States, and the expectations which are derived from some late experiments of being able to extend the use of labor-saving machines in the coarser fabrics of linen, obviate the danger of inconvenience from an increase of the duty upon such articles, and authorize a hope of speedy and complete success to the endeavors which may be used for procuring an internal supply. Thirdly, as to direct bounties or premiums upon the manufactured articles. To afford more effectual encouragement to the manufacture, and at the same time to promote the cheapness of the article, for the benefit of navigation, it will be of great use to allow a bounty of two cents per yard on all sail cloth which is made in the United States from materials of their own growth. This would also assist the culture of those materials: An encouragement of this kind, if adopted, ought to be established for a moderate term of years, to invite to new undertakings, and to an extension of the old. This is an article of importance enough to warrant the employment of extraordinary means in its favor.

COTTON.—There is something in the texture of this material which adapts it, in a peculiar degree, to the application of machines. The signal utility of the mill for spinning of cotton, not long since invented in England, has been noticed in another place; but there are other machines scarcely inferior in utility, which, in the different manufactories of this article, are employed either exclusively or with more than ordinary effect. This very important circumstance recommends the fabrics of cotton, in a more particular manner, to a country in which a defect of hands constitutes the greatest obstacle to success. The variety and extent of the uses to which the manufactures of this article are applicable is another powerful argument in their favor. And the faculty of the United States to produce the raw material in abundance, and of a quality which, though alleged to be inferior to some that is produced in other quarters, is, nevertheless, capable of being used with advantage in many fabrics, and is probably susceptible of being carried, by a more experienced culture, to much greater perfection, suggests an additional and a very cogent inducement to the vigorous pursuit of the cotton branch in its several subdivisions. How much has been already done has been stated in a preceding part of this Report. In addition to this, it may be announced that a society is forming with a capital which is expected to be extended to at least half a million of dollars; on behalf of which measures are already in train for prosecuting, on a large scale, the making and printing of cotton goods. These circumstances conspire to indicate the expediency of removing any obstructions which may happen to exist to the advantageous prosecution of the manufactories in question, and of adding such encouragements as may appear necessary and proper. The present duty of three cents per pound on the foreign raw material is undoubtedly a very serious impediment to the progress of those manufactories. The injurious tendency of similar duties, either prior to the establishment, or in the infancy of the domestic manufacture of the article, as it regards the manufacture, and their worse than inutility, in relation to the home production of the material itself, have been anticipated, particularly in discussing the subject of pecuniary bounties. Cotton has not the same pretensions with hemp to form an exception to the general rule. Not being, like hemp, an universal production of the country, it affords less assurance of an adequate internal supply; but the chief object arises from the doubts which are entertained concerning the quality of the national cotton. It is alleged, that the fibre of it is considerably shorter and weaker than that of some other places; and it has been observed, as a general rule, that the nearer the place of growth to the Equator, the better the quality of the cotton. That which comes from Cayenne, Surinam, and Demerara, is said to be preferable, even at a material difference of price, to the cotton of the islands.

While a hope may reasonably be indulged, that with due care and attention, the national cotton may be made to approach nearer than it now does to that of regions somewhat more favored by climate; and, while facts authorize an opinion that very great use may be made of it, and that it is a resource which gives greater security to the cotton fabrics of this country than can be enjoyed by any which depend wholly on external supply, it will certainly be wise, in every view, to let our infant manufactures have the full benefit of the best materials on the cheapest terms. It is obvious that the necessity of having such materials is proportioned to the unskillfulness and inexperience of the workmen employed, who, if inexpert, will not fail to commit great waste where the materials they are to work with are of an indifferent kind. To secure to the national manufacturers so essential an advantage, a repeal of the present duty on imported cotton is indispensable. A substitute for this, far more encouraging to domestic production, will also grant a bounty on the national cotton, when wrought at a home manufactory; to which a bounty on the exportation of it may be added; but either or both would do much more towards promoting the growth of the article than the merely nominal encouragement which it is proposed to abolish. The first would also have a direct influence in encouraging the manufacturer. The bounty which has been mentioned as existing in Great Britain upon the exportation of coarse linens not exceeding a certain value, applies also to certain descriptions of cotton goods of similar value. This furnishes an additional argument for allowing to the national manufacturers the species of encouragement just suggested, and, indeed, for adding some other aid. One cent per yard, not less than of a given width, on all goods of cotton, or of cotton and linen mixed, which are manufactured in the United States, with the addition of one cent per pound weight of the material, if made of national cotton, would amount to an aid of considerable importance both to the production and to the manufacture of that valuable article. And it is conceived that the expense would be well justified by the magnitude of the object. The printing and staining of cotton goods is known to be a distinct business from the fabrication of them. It is one easily accomplished, and which, as it adds materially to the value of the article in its white state, and prepares it for a variety of new uses, is of importance to be promoted. As imported cottons, equally with those which are made at home, may be the objects of this manufacture, it will merit consideration whether the whole or a part of the duty on the white goods ought not to be allowed to be drawn back in favor of those who print or stain them. This measure would certainly operate as a powerful encouragement to the business; and, though it may in a degree counteract the original fabrication of the articles, it would probably more than compensate for this disadvantage in the rapid growth of a collateral branch, which is of a nature sooner to attain to maturity. When a sufficient progress shall have been made, the drawback may be abrogated, and by that time the domestic supply of the articles to be printed or stained will have been extended. If the duty of seven and a half per cent. on certain kinds of cotton goods were extended to all goods of cotton, or of which it is the principal material, it would probably more than counterbalance the effect of the drawback proposed in relation to the fabrication of the article. And no material objection occurs to such an extension. The duty, then, considering all the circumstances which attend goods of this description, could not be deemed inconveniently high; and it may be inferred, from various causes, that the prices of them would still continue moderate. Manufactories of cotton goods not long since established at Beverly, in Massachusetts, and at Providence, in the State of Rhode Island, and conducted with a perseverance corresponding with the patriotic motives which began them, seem to have overcome the first obstacles to success, producing corduroys, velvets, fustians, jeans, and other similar articles, of a quality which will bear a comparison with the like articles brought from Manchester. The one at Providence has the merit of being the first in introducing into the United States the celebrated cotton mill, which not only furnishes materials for that manufactory itself, but for the supply of private families for household manufacture. Other manufactories of the same material, as regular businesses, have also been begun at different places in the State of Connecticut, but all upon a smaller scale than those above mentioned. Some essays are also making in the printing and staining of cotton goods. There are several small establishments of this kind already on foot.

Wool.—In a country the climate of which partakes of so considerable a proportion of Winter as that of a great part of the United States, the woollen branch cannot be regarded as inferior to any which relates to the clothing of the inhabitants. Household manufactures of this material are carried on, in different parts of the United States, to a very interesting extent; but there is only one branch which, as a regular business, can be said to have acquired maturity; this is the making of hats. Hats of wool, and of wool mixed with fur, are made in large quantities in different States; and nothing seems wanting but an adequate supply of materials to render the manufacture commensurate with the demand. A promising essay towards the fabrication of cloths, cassimeres, and other woollen goods, is likewise going on at Hartford, in Connecticut. Specimens of the different kinds which are made, in the possession of the Secretary, evince that these fabrics have attained a very considerable degree of perfection. Their quality certainly surpasses any thing that could have been looked for in so short a time and under so great disadvantages, and conspires, with the scantiness of the means which have been at the command of the directors, to form the eulogium of that public spirit, perseverance, and judgment, which have been able to accomplish so much. To cherish and bring to maturity this precious embryo must engage the most ardent wishes, and proportionable regret, as far as the means of doing it may appear difficult or uncertain. Measures which should tend to promote an abundant supply of wool, of good quality, would probably afford the most efficacious aid that present circumstances permit. To encourage the raising and improving the breed of sheep at home would certainly be the most desirable expedient for that purpose; but it may not be alone sufficient, especially as it is yet a problem whether our wool be capable of such a degree of improvement as to render it fit for the finer fabrics. Premiums would probably be found the best means of promoting the domestic, and bounties the foreign supply; the first may be within the compass of the institution hereafter to be submitted; the last would require a specific Legislative provision. If any bounties are granted, they ought, of course, to be adjusted with an eye to quality as well as quantity. A fund for this purpose may be derived from the addition of two and a half per cent. to the present rate of duty on carpets and carpeting, an increase to which the nature of the articles suggests no objection, and which may at the same time furnish a motive the more to the fabrication of them at home, toward which some beginnings have been made.

SILK.—The production of this article is attended with great facility in most parts of the United States. Some pleasing essays are making in Connecticut, as well toward that as toward the manufacture of what is produced. Stockings, handkerchiefs, ribbons and buttons, are made, though as yet but in small quantities.

A manufactory of lace, upon a scale not very extensive, has been long memorable at Ipswich, in the State of Massachusetts. An exemption of the material from the duty which it now pays on importation, and premiums upon the production to be dispensed under the direction of the institution before alluded to, seem to be the only species of encouragement advisable at so early a stage of the thing.

GLASS.—The materials for making glass are found everywhere. In the United States there is no deficiency of them. The sands and stones called Tarso, which includes flinty and crystalline substances generally, and the salts of various plants, particularly of the sea-weed kali or kelp, constitute the essential ingredients. An extraordinary abundance of fuel is a particular advantage enjoyed by this country for such manufactures. They, however, require large capitals and involve much manual labor.

Different manufactories of glass are now on foot in the United States. The present duty of twelve and a half per cent. on all imported articles of glass amount to a considerable encouragement to those manufactories. If anything in addition is judged eligible, the most proper would appear to be a direct bounty on window glass and black bottles. The first recommends itself as an object of general convenience; the last adds to that character, the circumstance of being an important item in breweries. A complaint is made of great deficiency in this respect.

GUNPOWDER.—No small progress has been of late made in the manufacture of this very important article. It may, indeed, be considered as already established; but its high importance renders its further extension very desirable. The encouragements which it already enjoys, are a duty of ten per cent. on the foreign rival article, and an exemption of salt-petre, one of the principal ingredients of which it is composed, from duty. A like exemption of sulphur, another chief ingredient, would appear to be equally proper. No quantity of this article has yet been produced, from internal sources. The use made of it in finishing the bottoms of ships, is an additional inducement to placing it in the class of free goods. Regulations for the careful inspection of the article would have a favorable tendency.

PAPER.—Manufactories of paper are among those which are arrived at the greatest maturity in the United States, and are most adequate to national supply. That of paper-hangings is a branch in which respectable progress has been made. Nothing material seems wanting to the further success of this valuable branch, which is already protected by a competent duty on similar imported articles.

In the enumeration of the several kinds, made subject to that duty, sheeting and cartridge paper have been omitted. These being the most simple manufactures of the sort, and necessary to military supply, as well as ship-building, recommend themselves equally with those of other descriptions to encouragement, and appear to be as fully within the compass of domestic exertions.

PRINTED BOOKS.—The great number of presses disseminated throughout the Union, seem to afford an assurance that there is no need of being indebted to foreign countries for the printing of the books which are used in the United States. A duty of ten per cent. instead of five, which is now charged upon the article, would have a tendency to aid the business internally.

It occurs as an objection to this, that it may have an unfavorable aspect toward literature, by raising the prices of books in universal use in private families, schools, and other seminaries of learning. But the difference, it is conceived, would be without effect. As to books, which usually fill the libraries of the wealthier classes and of professional men, such an augmentation of prices, as might be occasioned by an additional duty of five per cent. would be too little felt to be an impediment to the acquisition.

And with regard to books which may bespecially imported for the use of particular Seminaries of Learning, and of Public Libraries, a total exemption from duty would be advisable, which would go far toward obviating the objection just mentioned. They are now subject to a duty of five per cent. As to the books in most general family use, the constancy and universality of the demand would insure exertions to furnish them at home, and the means are completely adequate. It may also be expected ultimately, in this as in other cases, that the extension of the domestic manufacture would conduce to the cheapness of the article. It ought not to pass unremarked, that to encourage the printing of books is to encourage the manufacture of paper.

REFINED SUGARS AND CHOCOLATE—Are among the number of extensive and prosperous domestic manufactures. Drawbacks of the duties upon the materials of which they are respectively made, in cases of exportation, would have a beneficial influence upon the manufacture, and would conform to a precedent which has been already furnished in the instance of molasses on the exportation of distilled spirits.

Cocoa, the raw material, now pays a duty of one cent per lb., while chocolate, which is a prevailing and very simple manufacture, is comprised in the mass of articles rated at no more than five per cent. There would appear to be a propriety in encouraging the manufacture by a somewhat higher duty on its foreign rival than is paid on the raw material. Two cents per lb. on imported chocolate would, it is presumed, be without inconvenience.

The foregoing heads comprise the most important of the several kinds of manufactures, which have occurred as requiring, and, at the same time, as most proper for public encouragement; and such measures for affording it as have appeared best calculated to answer the end, have been suggested. The observations which have accompanied this delineation of objects, supercede the necessity of many supplementary remarks. One or two, however, may not be altogether superfluous.

Bounties are in various instances proposed as one species of encouragement. It is a similar objection to them that they are difficult to be managed and liable to frauds. But neither that difficulty nor this danger seems sufficiently great to countervail the advantages of which they are productive, when rightly applied. And it is presumed to have been shown that they are in some cases, particularly in the infancy of new enterprises, indispensable.

It will, however, be necessary to guard with extraordinary circumspection the manner of dispensing them. The requisite precautions have been thought of; but to enter into the detail would swell this Report, already voluminous, to a size too inconvenient. If the principle shall not be deemed inadmissible, the means of avoiding an abuse of it will not be likely to present insurmountable obstacles. There are useful guides from practice in other quarters. It shall, therefore, only be remarked here, in relation to this point, that the bounty which may be applied to the manufacture of an article, cannot with safety extend beyond those manufactories at which the making of the article is a regular trade. It would be impossible to annex adequate precautions to a benefit of that nature, if extended to every private family in which the manufacture was incidentally carried on, and its being a merely incidental occupation, which engages a portion of time that would otherwise be lost, it can be advantageously carried on without so special an aid.

The possibility of diminution of the revenue may also present itself as an object to the arrangements which have been submitted. But there is no truth which may be more firmly relied upon than that the interests of the revenue are promoted by whatever promotes an increase of national industry and wealth. In proportion to the degree of these, is the capacity of every country to contribute to the public treasury; and where the capacity to pay is increased, or even is not decreased, the only consequence of measures which diminish any particular resource, is a change of the object. If, by encouraging the manufacture of an article at home, the revenue which has been wont to accrue from its importation should be lessened, an indemnification can easily be found, either out of the manufacture itself, or from some other object which may be deemed more convenient. The measures, however, which have been submitted, taken aggregately, will, for a long time to come, rather augment than decrease the public revenue.

There is little room to hope that the progress of manufactures will so equally keep pace with the progress of population, as to prevent even a gradual augmentation of the product of the duties on imported articles. As, nevertheless, an abolition in some instances, and a reduction in others of duties which have been pledged for the Public Debt is proposed, it is essential that it should be accompanied with a competent substitute. In order to this, it is requisite that all the additional duties which shall be laid, be appropriated in the first instance, to replace all defalcations which may proceed from any such abolition or diminution. It is evident, at first glance, that they will not only be adequate to this, but will yield a considerable surplus. This surplus will serve,

1st. To constitute a fund for paying the bounties which shall have been decreed.

2d. To constitute a fund for the operations of a Board to be established, for promoting arts, agriculture, manufactures and commerce. Of this institution, different intimations have been given in the course of this Report. An outline of a plan for it shall now be submitted.

Let a certain annual sum be set apart, and placed under the management of Commissioners, not less than three, to consist of certain officers in the Government and their successors in office. Let these Commissioners be empowered to apply the fund confided to them to defray the expenses of the emigration of artists and manufacturers in particular branches of extraordinary importance, to induce the prosecution and introduction of useful discoveries, inventions and improvements, by proportionate rewards, judiciously held out and applied, to encourage by premiums, both honorable and lucrative, the exertions of individuals, and of classes, in relation to the several objects they are charged with promoting, and to afford such other aids to those objects, as may be generally designated by law. The Commissioners to render to the Legislature an annual account of their transactions and disbursements; and all such sums as shall not have been enapplied to the purposes of their trust, at the end of every three years, to revert to the Treasury. It may also be enjoined upon them not to draw out the money, but for the purpose of some specific disbursement. It may moreover be of use, to authorize them to receive voluntary contributions; making it their duty to apply them to the particular objects for which they may have been made, if any shall have been designated by the donors.

There is reason to believe that the progress of particular manufactures has been much retarded by the want of skillful workmen. And it often happens that the capitals employed are not equal to the purposes of bringing from abroad workmen of a superior kind. Here, in cases worthy of it, the auxiliary agency of Government would in all probability be useful. There are also valuable workmen in every branch, who are prevented from emigrating by the want of means. Occasional aids to such persons, properly administered, might be a source of valuable acquisitions to the country.

The propriety of stimulating by rewards the invention and introduction of useful improvements, is admitted without difficulty. But the success of attempts in this way must evidently depend much on the manner of conducting them.

It is probable, that the placing of the dispensation of those rewards under some proper discretionary direction, where they may be accompanied by collateral expedients, will serve to give them the surest efficacy. It seems impracticable to apportion by general rules, specific compensations for discoveries of unknown and disproportionate utility. The great use which may be made of a fund of this nature to procure and import foreign improvements is particularly obvious. Among these, the article of machines would form a most important item.

The operation and utility of premiums have been adverted to, together with the advantages which have resulted from their dispensation, under the direction of certain public and private societies. Of this, some experience has been had in the instance of the Pennsylvania Society for the Promotion of Manufactures and Useful Arts; but the funds of that association have been too contracted to produce more than a very small portion of the good to which the principles of it would have led. It may confidently be affirmed that there is scarcely anything which has been devised, better calculated to excite a general spirit of improvement than the institutions of this nature. They are truly invaluable.

In countries where there is great private wealth, much may be effected by the voluntary contributions of patriotic individuals; but in a community situated like that of the United States, the public purse must supply the deficiency of private resource. In what can it be so useful, as in promoting and improving the efforts of industry?

All which is humbly submitted.

ALEXANDER HAMILTON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

THE PUBLIC LANDS.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE, to whom was referred by the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES the resolution of Congress requesting the President "to cause an estimate to be laid before Congress, at their next session, of the quantity and situation of the lands not claimed by the Indians, nor granted to nor claimed by any citizens of the United States, within the Territory ceded to the United States by the State of North Carolina, and within the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio," makes thereon the following Report:

The Territory ceded by the State of North Carolina to the United States, by deed bearing date the 25th day of February, 1790, is bounded as follows, to wit: Beginning in the boundary between Virginia and North Carolina, that is to say, in the parallel of latitude 36 degrees 30 minutes north from the Equator, on the extreme height of the Stone Mountain, where the said boundary or parallel intersects it, and running thence, along the said extreme height, to the place where Wataugo river breaks through it; thence, a direct course to the top of the Yellow Mountain, where Bright's road crosses the same; thence, along the ridge of the said mountain, between the waters of Doe river and the waters of Rock creek, to the place where the road crosses the Iron Mountain; from thence, along the extreme height of said mountain, to where Nolichucky river runs through the same; thence to the top of the Bald Mountain; thence, along the extreme height of the said mountain, to the Painted Rock, or French Broad river; thence, along the highest ridge of the said mountain, to the place where it is called the Great Iron or Smoky Mountain; thence, along the extreme height of the said mountain, to the place where it is called the Unaka Mountain, between the Indian towns of Cowee and Old Chota; thence, along the main ridge of the said mountain, to the southern boundary of the said State of North Carolina, that is to say, to the parallel of latitude 35 degrees north from the Equator; thence, westwardly, along the said boundary or parallel, to the middle of the river Mississippi; thence, up the middle of said river, to where it is intersected by the first-mentioned parallel of 36 degrees 30 minutes; thence, along the said parallel, to the beginning: which tract of country is a degree and a half of latitude from north to south, and about three hundred and sixty miles, in general, from east to west, as nearly as may be estimated from such maps as exist of that country.

The Indians having claims within the said tract of country are the Cherokees and Chickasaws, whose boundaries are settled by the Treaties of Hopewell, concluded with the Cherokees on the 28th day of November, 1785, and with the Chickasaws on the 10th day of January, 1786, and by the Treaty of Holston, concluded with the Cherokees, July 2, 1791. These treaties acknowledge to the said Indians all the lands westward and southward of the following lines, to wit: Beginning in the boundary between South and North Carolina, where the South Carolina Indian boundary strikes the same; thence, north, to a point from which a line is to be extended to the river Clinch, that shall pass the Holston, at the ridge which divides the waters running into Little river from those running into the Tennessee; thence, up the river Clinch, to Campbell's line, and, along the same, to the top of the Cumberland Mountain; thence, in a direct course, toward the Cumberland river, where the Kentucky road crosses it, as far as the Virginia line, or parallel, aforesaid, of 36 degrees and 30 minutes; thence, westwardly, or eastwardly, as the case shall be, along the said line or parallel, to the point thereof, which is due northeast from another point to be taken on the dividing ridge of Cumberland and Duck rivers, forty miles from Nashville; thence south west, to the point last mentioned, on the said dividing ridge, and along the said dividing ridge north westwardly, to where it is intersected by the said Virginia line or parallel of 36 degrees 30 minutes. So that there remained to the United States the right of pre-emption of the lands westward and southward of the said lines, and the absolute right to those northward thereof, that is to say, to one parcel to the eastward, somewhat triangular, comprehending the counties of Sullivan and Washington, and parts of those of Greene and Hawkins, running about one hundred and fifty miles from east to west, on the Virginia boundary as its base, and between eighty and ninety miles from north to south where broadest, and containing, as may be conjectured, without pretending to accuracy, between seven and eight thousand square miles, or about five millions of acres: And to one other parcel, to the westward, somewhat triangular also, comprehending parts of the counties of Sumner, Davidson, and Tennessee, the base whereof extends about one hundred and fifty miles also, from east to west, on the same Virginia line, and its height from north to south about fifty-five miles, and so may comprehend about four thousand square miles, or upwards of two and a half millions of acres of land.

Within these triangles, however, are the following claims of citizens, reserved by the deed of cession, and consequently forming exceptions to the rights of the United States:

I. Appropriations by the State of North Carolina for their Continental and State officers and soldiers.

II. Grants and titles to grants vested in individuals by the laws of the State.

III. Entries made in Armstrong's office, under an act of that State, of 1783, for the redemption of specie and other certificates.

The claims covered by the first reservation are—

1st. The bounties in land given by the said State of North Carolina to their Continental line, in addition to those given by Congress. These were to be located within a district bounded northwardly by the Virginia line, and southwardly by a line parallel thereto, and fifty-five miles distant; westwardly by the Tennessee; and eastwardly by the meridian of the intersection of the Virginia line and Cumberland river. Grants have accordingly issued for 1,239,498 acres, and warrants for the further quantity of 1,549,726 acres, making, together, 2,789,224 acres.

It is to be noted that the southwestern and southeastern angles of this district, constituting perhaps a fourth or fifth of the whole, are south of the lines established by the treaties of Hopewell and Holston, and consequently in a country wherein the Indian title is acknowledged and guaranteed by the United States. No information is received of the exact proportion of the locations made within these angles.

2d. Bounties in land to Evans's battalion, raised for State purposes. These were to be taken west of Cumberland Mountain. The locations are not yet made.

The second reservation covers the following claims:

1. Lands for the Surveyor General's fees for laying out the military bounties, to be located in the military district. The grants already issued on this account amount to 30,203 acres.

2. Grants to Isaac Shelby, Anthony Bledsoe, and Absalom Tatum, Commissioners for laying out the military bounties; and to guards, chain-carriers, markers, and hunters, who attended them already issued to the amount of 65,932 acres, located in the military district.

3. Entries in Washington county, amounting to 746,362½ acres; for 214,541½ of which, grants have already issued. Of the remaining 531,821½ acres, a considerable proportion were declared void by the laws of the State, and were particularly excluded from the cover of the reservation in the deed of cession by this clause in it, to wit: "Provided, That nothing herein contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, to the making good any entry or entries, or any grant or grants, heretofore declared void by any act or acts of the General Assembly of this State." Still it is to be considered that many of these persons have settled and improved the lands, are willing, as is said, to comply with such conditions as shall be required of other purchasers, form a strong barrier on the new frontier acquired by the treaty of Holston, and are, therefore, objects meriting the consideration of the Legislature.

4. Entries in Sullivan county, amounting to 240,624 acres; for 173,332 acres of which grants have already issued. Of the remaining entries, many are certified void, and others understood to be lapsed, or otherwise voidable under the laws of the State.

5. Certain pre-emption rights, granted to the first settlers of Davidson county, on Cumberland river, amounting to 300,760 acres.

6. A grant of 200,000 acres to Richard Henderson and others, on Powell's and Clinch's rivers, extending up Powell's river in a breadth of not less than four miles, and down Clinch's from their junction in a breadth not less than twelve miles. A great part of this is within the Indian territory.

Among the grants of the State now under recapitulation, as forming exceptions out of the absolute rights of the United States, are not to be reckoned here two grants of 2,000 each to Alexander Martin and David Wilson, adjacent to the lands allotted to the officers and soldiers; nor a grant of 25,000 acres on Duck river to the late Major General Greene; because they are wholly within the Indian territory, as acknowledged by the treaties of Hopewell and Holston.

The extent of the third reservation in favor of entries made in Armstrong's office is not yet entirely known, nor can be until the 20th of December, 1792, the last day given for perfecting them. The sum of certificates, however, which had been paid for these warrants into the Treasury of the State, before the 20th day of May, 1790, reaches, in all probability, near to their whole amount. This was £373,649 6s. 5d. currency of that State, and, at the price of £10 the hundred acres, established by law, shows that warrants had issued for 3,736,493 acres. For 1,762,660 acres of these, grants have passed, which appear to have been located partly in the counties of Greene and Hawkins, and partly in the country from thence to the Mississippi, as divided into Eastern, Middle, and Western Districts. Almost the whole of these locations are within the Indian territory. Besides the warrants paid for as before mentioned, it is known that there are some others outstanding and not paid for; but, perhaps, these need not be taken into account, as payment of them has been disputed, on the ground that the lands being within the Indian territory, cannot now be delivered to the holders of the warrants.

On a review of all the reservations, after making such conjectural allowance as our information authorizes, for the proportion of them, which may be within the Indian boundaries, it appears probable they cover all the ceded lands susceptible of culture and cleared of the Indian title, that is to say, all the habitable parts of the two triangles before mentioned, excepting only the lands south of French Broad and Big Pigeon rivers. These were part of the tract appropriated by the laws of the State to the use of the Indians, whose title being purchased at the late treaty of Holston, they are now free to be disposed of by the United States, and are probably the only lands open to their disposal within this Southwestern Territory which can excite the attention of purchasers. They are supposed to amount to about 200,000 acres, and we are told that three hundred families have already set down upon them without right or license.

The territory of the United States Northwest of the Ohio is bounded on the south by that river, on the east by Pennsylvania, on the north and west by the lines which divide the United States from the dominions of Great Britain and Spain.

The part of this territory occupied by Indians is north and west of the following lines, established with the Wyandots, Delawares, Chippewas, and Ottawas, by the treaty of Fort McIntosh, and with the Shawanese, by that of the Great Miami, to wit: beginning at the mouth of the Cuyahoga, and running up the river to the portage between that and the Tuscaroras branch of the Muskingum; then down the said branch to the forks at the crossing place above Fort Lawrence; then westwardly, towards the portage of the Big Miami, to the main branch of that river; then down the Miami to the fork of that river next below the Old Fort which was taken by the French in 1752; thence due west to the river De la Panse, and down that river to the Wabash. So far, the lines are precisely defined, and the whole country southward of these lines and eastward of the Wabash cleared of the claims of those Indians, as it is also of those of the Pottawatomies and Sacs by the treaty of Muskingum. How far on the other side of the Wabash the southern boundary of the Indians has been defined we know not. It is only understood, in general, that their title to the lower country, between that river and the Illinois, has been formerly extinguished by the French while in their possession. As to that country, then, and what lies still beyond the Illinois, it would seem expedient that nothing be done until a fair ascertainment of boundary can take place by mutual consent between us and the Indians interested.

The country within the Wabash, the Indian line before described, the Pennsylvania line, and the Ohio, contains, on a loose estimate, about 55,000 square miles, or 35,000,000 of acres.

During the British government, great numbers of persons had formed themselves in companies, under different names, such as the Ohio, the Wabash, the Illinois, the Mississippi, or Vandalia Companies, and had covered with their applications a great part of this territory. Some of them had obtained orders, on certain conditions, which, having never been fulfilled, their titles were never completed by grants; others were only in a state of negotiation when the British authority was discontinued. Some of these claims being already under a special reference, by order of Congress, and all of them probably falling under the operation of the same principles, they will not be noticed in the present Report.

The Public Lands.

The claims of citizens to be here stated will be—

I. Those reserved to the States by their deeds of cession.

II. Those which have arisen under the Government of the United States themselves.

Under the first head presents itself the tract of country from the completion of the 41st degree to 42 degrees 2 minutes of north latitude, and extending from the Pennsylvania line before mentioned one hundred and twenty miles westward, not mentioned in the deed of Connecticut, while all the country westward thereof was mentioned to be ceded. About two and a half millions of acres of this may, perhaps, be without the Indian lines before mentioned.

1. A reservation in the deed of Virginia of the possessions and titles of the French and Canadian inhabitants, and other settlers of the Kaskaskias, St. Vincennes, and the neighboring villages, who had professed themselves citizens of Virginia, which rights have been settled by an act of the last session of Congress, entitled "An act for granting lands to the inhabitants and settlers at Vincennes and the Illinois country, in the Territory Northwest of the Ohio, and for confirming them in their possessions." These lands are in the neighborhood of the several villages.

2. A reservation in the same deed of a quantity, not exceeding 150,000 acres of land, for General George Rogers Clark, and the officers and soldiers of his regiment, who were at the reduction of Kaskaskias and St. Vincennes, to be laid off in such place, on the northwest side of the Ohio, as a majority of the officers should choose. They chose they should be laid off on the river adjacent to the rapids, which accordingly has been done.

3. A reservation in the same deed, of lands between the Scioto and Little Miami, to make up to the Virginia troops on Continental establishment the quantity which the good lands in their southern allotment might fall short of the bounties given them by the laws of that State. By a statement of the 16th September, 1788, it appears that 724,045½ acres had been surveyed for them on the southeastern side of the Ohio; that 1,395,385½ acres had been surveyed on the northwestern side; that warrants for 649,649 acres more, to be laid off on the same side of the river, were in the hands of the Surveyor, and it was supposed there might still be some few warrants not yet presented; so that this reservation may be stated at 2,045,034½ acres, or perhaps some small matter more.

III. The claims of individual citizens, derived from the United States themselves, are the following:

1. Those of the Continental Army, founded on the resolutions of Congress of September 16, 1776, August 12, and September 30, 1780, and fixed by the ordinance of May 20, 1785. The resolution of October 22, 1787, and the supplementary ordinance of July 9, 1788, in the seven ranges of townships, beginning at a point on the Ohio, due north from the western termination of a line then lately run, as the southern boundary of Pennsylvania; or, in a second tract of 1,000,000 of acres, bounded east by the seventh range of the said townships, south by the lands of Cutler and Sargent, north by an extension of the northern boundary of the said townships, and going towards the west so far as to include the above quantity; or, lastly, in a third tract of country, beginning at the mouth of the Ohio, and running up the river Mississippi to the river Au Vause; thence up the same till it meets a west line from the mouth of the Little Wabash; thence along that line to the Great Wabash; thence down the same and the Ohio to the beginning. The sum total of the said military claims is 1,851,800 acres.

2. Those of the individuals who made purchases of land at New York, within the said seven ranges of townships, according to the resolutions of Congress of April 21, 1787, and the supplementary ordinance of July 9, 1788; which claims amount to 150,896 acres.

3. The purchase of one million and a half acres of land by Cutler and Sargent, on behalf of certain individuals associated under the name of the Ohio Company. This begins where the Ohio is intersected by the western boundary of the seventh range of townships, and runs due north on that boundary 1,306 chains and 25 links; thence, due west, to the western boundary of the seventeenth range of townships; thence, due south, to the Ohio, and up that river to the beginning; the whole area containing 1,781,760 acres of land, whereof 281,760 acres, consisting of various lots and townships, are reserved to the United States.

4. The purchase by the same Cutler and Sargent, on behalf also of themselves and others. This begins at the northeastern angle of the tract of their purchase before described, and runs due north to the northern boundary of the tenth township from the Ohio; thence, due west, to the Scioto; thence, down the same, and up the Ohio, to the southwestern angle of the said purchase before described, and along the western and northern boundaries thereof to the beginning; the whole area containing 4,901,480 acres of land; out of which, however, five lots, to wit: Nos. 8, 11, 16, 26, and 29, of every township of six miles square, are retained by the United States, and out of the whole are retained the three townships of Gnadenhutzen, Schoenbrun, and Salem; and certain lands around them, as will be hereafter mentioned.

5. The purchase of John Cleves Symmes, bounded on the west by the Great Miami; on the south by the Ohio; on the east by a line which is to begin on the bank of the Ohio, twenty miles from the mouth of the Great Miami, as measured along the several courses of the Ohio, and to run parallel with the general course of the said Great Miami; and on the north by an east and west line so run as to include 1,000,000 of acres in the whole area, whereof five lots, numbered as before mentioned, are reserved out of every township by the United States.

It is suggested that this purchaser, under color of a first and larger proposition to the Board of Treasury, which was never closed, (but, pending that proposition,) sold sundry parcels of land between his eastern boundary, before mentioned, and the Little Miami, and that the purchasers have settled thereon. If these suggestions prove true, the settlers will perhaps be thought to merit the favor of the Legislature, as purchasers for valuable consideration, and without notice of the defect of title.

The contracts for lands, which were at one time under consideration with Messrs. Flint and Parker, and with Colonel Morgan, were never so far prosecuted as to bring either party under any obligation. All proceedings thereon were discontinued at a very early stage, and it is supposed that no further views exist with any other party. These, therefore, are not to be enumerated among existing claims.

6. Three townships were reserved by the ordinance of May 20, 1785, adjacent to Lake Erie, for refugees from Canada and Nova Scotia, and for other purposes, according to resolutions of Congress, made or to be made on that subject. These would, of course, contain 69,120 acres.

7. The same ordinance of May 20, 1785, appropriated the three towns of Gnadenhutzen, Schoenbrun, and Salem, on the Muskingum, for the Christian Indians formerly settled there, or the remains of that Society, with the grounds round about them; and the quantity of the said circumjacent grounds, for each of the said towns, was determined by the resolution of Congress, of September 3, 1788, to be so much as, with the plat of its respective town, would make up 4,000 acres; so that three towns and their circumjacent lands were to amount to 12,000 acres. This reservation was accordingly made out of the large purchase of Cutler and Sargent, which comprehended them. The Indians, however, for whom the reservation was made, have chosen to emigrate beyond the limits of the United States, so that the lands reserved for them still remain to the United States.

On the whole, it appears that the United States may rightfully dispose of all the lands between the Wabash and the Ohio, Pennsylvania, the forty-first parallel of latitude, and the Indian lines described in the treaties of the Great Miami, and Fort McIntosh, with exceptions only of the rights saved by the deed of cession of Virginia, and of all rights legally derived from the Government of the United States; and, supposing the part south of the Indian lines to contain, as before conjectured, about 35,000,000 of acres, and that the claims of citizens before enumerated may amount to between 13,000,000 and 14,000,000, there remains at the disposal of the United States upwards of 21,000,000 of acres in this northwestern quarter.

And though the want of actual surveys of some parts, and of a general delineation of the whole on paper, so as to exhibit to the eye the locations, forms, and relative positions of the rights before described, may prevent our forming a well-defined idea of them at this distance, yet, on the spot, these difficulties exist but in a small degree. The individuals there employed in the details of buying, selling, and locating, possess local informations of the parts which concern them, so as to be able to keep clear of each other's rights; or, if in some instances a conflict of claims should arise, from any want of certainty in their definition, a local Judge will doubtless be provided to decide them without delay, at least provisionally. Time, instead of clearing up these uncertainties, will cloud them the more, by the death or removal of witnesses, the disappearance of lines and marks, change of parties, and other casualties.

TH. JEFFERSON,
Secretary of State.

OBTAINING FRESH FROM SALT WATER.

The SECRETARY OF STATE, to whom was referred by the House of Representatives of the United States, the petition of Jacob Isaacks, of Newport, in Rhode Island, has examined into the truth and importance of the allegations therein set forth, and makes thereon the following Report:

The petition sets forth, that, by various experiments, with considerable labor and expense, he has discovered a method of converting salt water into fresh, in the proportion of eight pints out of ten, by a process so simple that it may be performed on board of vessels at sea, by the common iron caboose, (with small alteration,) by the same fire and in the same time which is used for cooking the ship's provisions; and offers to convey to the Government of the United States a faithful account of his art, or secret, to be used by or within the United States, on their giving to him a reward suitable to the importance of the discovery, and, in the opinion of Government, adequate to his expenses and the time he has devoted to the bringing it into effect.

In order to ascertain the merit of the petitioner's discovery, it becomes necessary to examine the advances already made in the art of converting salt water into fresh.

Lord Bacon, to whom the world is indebted for the first germs of so many branches of science, had observed, that, with a heat sufficient for distillation, salt will not rise in vapor, and that salt water distilled, is fresh. And it would seem that all mankind might have observed, that the earth is supplied with fresh water chiefly by exhalation from the sea, which is in fact an insensible distillation effected by the heat of the sun. Yet this, though the most obvious, was not the first idea in the essays for converting salt water into fresh. Filtration was tried in vain, and congelation could be resorted to only in the coldest regions and seasons. In all the earlier trials by distillation, some mixture was thought necessary to aid the operation by a partial precipitation of the salt, and other foreign matters contained in sea water. Of this kind were the methods of Sir Richard Hawkins, in the sixteenth century; of Glauber, Hauton, and Lister, in the seventeenth century; and of Hales, Appleby, Butler, Chapman, Hoffman, and Dove, in the eighteenth century: nor was there anything in these methods worthy noting on the present occasion, except the very simple still, contrived extempore by Captain Chapman, and made from such materials as are to be found on board every ship, great or small. This was a common pot with a wooden lid of the usual form, in the centre of which a hole was bored to receive perpendicularly a short wooden tube, made with an inch and half auger, which perpendicular tube received at its top, and at an acute angle, another tube of wood also, which descended till it joined a third, of pewter, made by rolling up a dish, and passing it obliquely through a cask of cold water. With this simple machine he obtained two quarts of fresh water an hour, and observed, that the expense of fuel would be very trifling, if the still was contrived to stand on the fire along with the ship's boiler.

In 1763, Dr. Lind, proposing to make experiments of several different mixtures, first distilled rain water, which he supposed would be the purest, and then sea water, without any mixture, which he expected would be the least pure, in order to arrange between these two supposed extremes the degree of merit of the several ingredients he meant to try. "To his great surprise," as he confesses, "the sea water, distilled without any mixture, was as pure as the rain water." He pursued the discovery, and established the fact that a pure and potable fresh water may be obtained from salt water by simple distillation, without the aid of any mixture for fining or precipitating its foreign contents. In 1767, he proposed an extempore still, which, in fact, was Chapman's, only substituting a gun-barrel instead of Chapman's pewter tube, and the hand-pump of the ship to be cut in two obliquely, and joined again at an acute angle, instead of Chapman's wooden tubes bored express; or, instead of the wooden lid and upright tube, he proposed a tea-kettle (without its lid or handle) to be turned bottom upward over the mouth of the pot, by way of still-head, and a wooden tube leading from the spout to a gun-barrel passing through a cask of water, the whole luted with equal parts of chalk and meal moistened with salt water.

With this apparatus of a pot, tea-kettle, and gun-barrel, the Dolphin, a twenty-gun ship, in her voyage round the world, in 1761, from fifty-six gallons of sea water, and with nine pounds of wood and sixty-nine pounds of pit-coal, made forty-two gallons of good fresh water, at the rate of eight gallons an hour. The Dorsetshire, in her passage from Gibraltar to Mahon, in 1766, made nineteen quarts of pure water in four hours, with ten pounds of wood. And the Slambal, in 1773, between Bombay and Bengal, with a hand-pump, gun-barrel, and a pot, of six-gallons of sea water made ten quarts of fresh water in three hours.

In 1771, Dr. Irvin, putting together Lind's idea of distilling without a mixture, Chapman's still, and Dr. Franklin's method of cooling by evaporation, obtained a premium of £5,000 from the British Parliament. He wet his tube constantly with a mop, instead of passing it through a cask of water. He enlarged its bore, also, in order to give it a freer passage to the vapor, and thereby increase its quantity by lessening the resistance or pressure on the evaporating surface. This last improvement was his own, and it doubtless contributed to the success of his models; and we may suppose the enlargement of the tube to be useful to that point at which the central parts of the vapor, passing through it, would begin to escape condensation. Lord Mulgrave used his method in his voyage towards the North Pole, in 1773, making from thirty-four to forty gallons of fresh water a day, without any great addition of fuel, as he says.

M. de Bougainville, in his voyage round the world, used, very successfully, a still which had been contrived in 1763, by Poyissonier, so as to guard against the water being thrown over from the boiler into the pipe by the agitation of the ship. In this, one singularity was that the furnace or fire-box was in the middle of the boiler, so that the water surrounded it in contact. This still, however, was expensive, and occupied much room.

Such were the advances already made in the art of obtaining fresh from salt water, when Mr. Isaacks, the petitioner, suggested his discovery.

As the merit of this could be ascertained by experiment only, the Secretary of State asked the favor of Mr. Rittenhouse, President of the American Philosophical Society, of Dr. Wistar, President of Chemistry in the College of Philadelphia, and Dr. Hutchinson, Professor of Chemistry in the University of Pennsylvania, to be present at the experiments. Mr. Isaacks fixed the pot of a small caboose, with a tin cap and straight tube of tin passing obliquely through a cask of cold water; he made use of a mixture, the composition of which he did not explain, and from twenty-four pints of sea water, taken up about three miles out of the Capes of Delaware at flood tide, he distilled twenty-two pints of fresh water in four hours, with twenty pounds of seasoned pine, which was a little wetted by having lain in the rain.

In a second experiment, of the 21st of March, performed in a furnace and five gallon still at the College, from thirty-two pints of sea water he drew thirty-one pints of fresh water in seven hours and twenty-four minutes, with fifty-one pounds of hickory, which had been cut about six months. In order to decide whether Mr. Isaacks's mixture contributed in any and what degree to the success of the operation, it was thought proper to repeat his experiment under the same circumstances exactly, except the omission of the mixture. Accordingly, on the next day, the same quantity of sea water was put into the same still, the same furnace was used, and fuel from, the same parcel. It yielded, as his had done, thirty-one pints of fresh water in eleven minutes more of time, and with ten pounds less of wood.

On the 24th of March, Mr. Isaacks performed a third experiment. For this, a common iron pot, of three and a half gallons, was fixed in brick-work, and the flue from the hearth wound once round the pot spirally, and then passed off up a chimney. The cap was of tin, and a straight tin tube of about two inches diameter, passing obliquely through a barrel of water, served instead of a worm. From sixteen pints of sea water he drew off fifteen pints of fresh water, in two hours and fifty-five minutes, with three pounds of dry hickory and eight pounds of seasoned pine. This experiment was also repeated the next day, with the same apparatus and fuel from the same parcel, but without the mixture. Sixteen pints of sea water yielded, in like manner, fifteen pints of fresh, in one minute more of time, and with half a pound less of wood. On the whole, it was evident that Mr. Isaacks's mixture produced no advantage, either in the process or result of the distillation.

The distilled water in all these instances was found, on experiment, to be as pure as the best pump water of the city. Its taste, indeed, was not as agreeable, but it was not such as to produce any disgust. In fact we drink, in common life, in many places, and under many circumstances, and almost always at sea, a worse tasted and probably a less wholesome water.

The obtaining fresh from salt water, for ages was considered as an important desideratum for the use of navigators. The process for doing this by simple distillation is so efficacious, the erecting an extempore still with such utensils as are found on board of every ship, is so practicable, as to authorize the assertion that this desideratum is satisfied to a very useful degree. But, though this has been done for upwards of thirty years; though its reality has been established by the actual experience of several vessels which have had recourse to it, yet neither the fact nor process is known to the mass of seamen, to whom it would be the most useful, and for whom it was principally wanted. The Secretary of State is therefore of opinion that, since the subject has been brought under observation, it should be made the occasion of disseminating its knowledge generally and effectually among the sea-faring citizens of the United States. The following is one of the many methods which might be proposed for doing this:

Let the clearance for every vessel sailing from the ports of the United States be printed on paper, on the back whereof shall be a printed account of the essays which have been made for obtaining fresh from salt water, mentioning briefly those which were unsuccessful, and, more fully, those which have succeeded; describing the methods which have been found to answer for constructing extempore stills of such implements as are generally on board of every vessel, with a recommendation, in all cases where they shall have occasion to resort to this expedient for obtaining water, to publish the result of their trial in some gazette on their return to the United States, or communicate it for publication to the office of the Secretary of State, in order that others may, by their success, be encouraged to make similar trials, and be benefited by any improvements or new ideas which may occur to them in practice.

THOMAS JEFFERSON.

PHILADELPHIA, Nov. 21, 1791.

INDIAN HOSTILITIES.

UNITED STATES, January 16, 1792.

SIR: As the circumstances which have engaged the United States in the present Indian War may some of them be out of the public recollection, and others perhaps be unknown, it may appear advisable that you prepare and publish, from authentic documents, a statement of those circumstances, as well as of the measures which have been taken, from time to time, for the re-establishment of peace and friendship.

When the community are called upon for considerable exertions, to relieve a part which is suffering under the hand of an enemy, it is desirable to manifest that due pains have been taken by those intrusted with the administration of their affairs to avoid the evil.

G. WASHINGTON.

The Secretary for the Department of War.

The Causes of the existing Hostilities between the United States and certain Tribes of Indians, Northwest of the Ohio, stated and explained from official and authentic Documents, and published in obedience to the orders of the President of the United States.

A recurrence to the Journals of the United States in Congress assembled, of the early stages of the late war, will evince the public solicitude to preserve peace with the Indian tribes, and to prevent their engaging in a contest in which they were no wise interested.

But though partial treaties or conventions were formed with some of the Northern and Western tribes, in the years 1775 and 1776, yet those treaties were too feeble to resist the powerful impulses of a contrary nature, arising from a combination of circumstances at that time; and accordingly all the various Indian nations (the Oneidas, Tuscaroras, and a few individuals of the Delawares, excepted) lying on our frontiers, from Georgia to Canada, armed against us.

It is yet too recent to have been forgotten, that great numbers of inoffensive men, women, and children, fell a sacrifice to the barbarous warfare practised by the Indians, and many others were dragged into a deplorable captivity.

Notwithstanding that these aggressions were entirely unprovoked, yet as soon as the war ceased with Great Britain, the United States, instead of indulging any resentments against the Indian nations, sought only how to establish a liberal peace with all the tribes throughout their limits.

Early measures were accordingly taken for this purpose. A treaty was held, and a peace concluded, in the year 1784, with the hostile part of the Northern Indians, or Six Nations, at Fort Stanwix.

In January, 1785, another treaty was formed with part of the Western tribes, at Fort McIntosh, on the Ohio, to wit: with the Wyandots, Delawares, Ottawas, and Chippewas.

During the same year, treaties were formed at Hopewell, on the Keowee, with all the powerful tribes of the South, excepting the Creeks, to wit: the Cherokees, the Choctaws, and Chickasaws.

In January, 1786, a treaty was formed with the Shawanese, at the confluence of the Great Miami with the Ohio.

It was not long before certain turbulent and malignant characters residing among some of the northern and western tribes, which had formed the treaties of Fort Stanwix and Fort McIntosh, excited uneasiness and complaints against those treaties. In consequence of representations upon this subject, on the 5th of October, 1787, Congress directed, "That a general treaty should be held with the tribes of Indians within the limits of the United States, inhabiting the country Northwest of the Ohio, and about Lake Erie, as soon after the first of April next as conveniently might be, and at such place and at such particular time as the Governor of the Western Territory should appoint, for the purpose of knowing the causes of uneasiness among the said tribes, and hearing their complaints; of regulating trade, and amicably settling all affairs concerning lands and boundaries, between them and the United States."

On the 2d day of July, 1788, Congress appropriated "the sum of twenty thousand dollars, in addition to fourteen thousand dollars before appropriated, for defraying the expenses of the treaties which had been ordered, or which might be ordered to be held in the present year, with the several Indian tribes in the Northern Department, and for extinguishing the Indian claims; the whole of the said twenty thousand dollars, together with six thousand dollars of the said fourteen thousand dollars, to be applied solely to the purpose of extinguishing the Indian claims to the lands they had already ceded to the United States, by obtaining regular conveyances for the same, and for extending a purchase beyond the limits theretofore fixed by treaty; but that no part of the said sums should be applied for any purpose other than those above mentioned."

Accordingly new treaties were held at Fort Harmar the latter part of the year 1788, and concluded on the 9th day of January, 1789, with a representation of all the Six or Northern Nations, the Mohawks excepted; and with a representation of the following tribes, to wit: the Wyandots, the Delawares, Ottawas, Chippewas, Pottawatomes, and Sacs. By these treaties, nearly the same boundaries were recognised and established by a principle of purchase, as had been stipulated by the former treaties of Fort Stanwix and Fort McIntosh.

Thus careful and attentive was the Government of the United States to settle a boundary with the Indians on the basis of fair treaty, to obviate the dissatisfactions which had been excited, and to establish its claim to the lands relinquished, on the principle of equitable purchase.

It does not appear that the right of the Northern and Western Indians, who formed the several before mentioned treaties to the lands thereby relinquished to the United States, has been questioned by any other tribes; nor does it appear that the present war has been occasioned by any dispute relatively to the boundaries established by the said treaties. But, on the contrary, it appears that the unprovoked aggressions of the Miami and Wabash Indians, upon Kentucky and other parts of the frontiers, together with their associates—a banditti, formed of Shawanese and outcast Cherokees, amounting in all to about one thousand two hundred men—are solely the causes of the war. Hence it is proper that their conduct should be more particularly adverted to.

In the year 1784, when messages were sent to the Wyandots and Delawares, inviting them to meet the Commissioners, first at Cuyahoga, and afterwards at Fort McIntosh, the Miami Indians were also included in the said invitations, but they did not attend.

In the year 1785, these invitations were repeated; but the messengers, upon their arrival at the Miami village, had their horses stolen, were otherwise treated with insolence, and prevented from fulfilling their mission.

In the years 1787 and 1788, new endeavors were used to bring those Indians to treat. They were urged to be present at the treaty appointed to be held at Fort Harmar; but these endeavors proved as fruitless as all the former.

At a Council of the Tribes, convened in 1788, at the Miami river, the Miami and Wabash Indians were pressed to repair to the treaty, with great earnestness, by the chiefs of the Wyandots and Delawares; the Wyandot chiefs particularly presented them with a large belt of wampum, holding one end of it themselves, and offering the other to the hostile Indians, which was refused. The Wyandots then laid it on the shoulders of a principal chief, recommending to him to be at peace with the Americans; but, without making any answer, he leaned himself, and let it fall to the ground; this so displeased the Wyandots, that they immediately left the Council-house.

In the mean time the frontier settlements were disquieted by frequent depredations and murders, and the complaints of their inhabitants (as might be expected) of the pacific forbearance of the Government, were loud, repeated, and distressing—their calls for protection incessant—till at length they appeared determined by their own efforts to endeavor to retaliate the injuries they were continually receiving, and which had become intolerable.

In this state of things it was indispensable for the Government to make some decisive exertion for the peace and security of the frontier.

But notwithstanding the ill success of former experiments, and the invincible spirit of animosity which had appeared in certain tribes, and which was of a nature to justify a persuasion that no impression could be made upon them by pacific expedients, it was still deemed advisable to make one more essay.

Accordingly, in April, 1790, Anthony Gamelin, an inhabitant of Post Vincennes, and a man of good character, was despatched to all the tribes and villages of the Wabash river, and to the Indians of the Miami village, with a message, purporting that the United States were desirous of establishing a general peace with all the neighboring tribes of Indians, and of treating them in all respects with perfect humanity and kindness; and at the same time warning them to abstain from further depredations.

The Indians in some of the villages on the lower part of the Wabash, appeared to listen to him; others manifested a different disposition; others confessed their inability to restrain their young warriors; and all referred the messenger to the Indians at the Miami village. At this village some appeared well disposed, but the chiefs of the Shawanese returned the messages and belts, informing the messenger, however, that they would, after consultation, within thirty nights, send an answer to Post Vincennes. The promised answer was never received. While the messenger was at the Miami village, two negroes were brought in from our settlements, prisoners; and upon his return to L'Angulle, a chief informed him that a party of seventy warriors, from the more distant Indians, had arrived, and were gone against the settlements.

In three days after his departure from the Miami village, a prisoner was there burnt to death. Similar cruelties were exercised at the Ouittanon towns, about the same time; and, in the course of three months, immediately after the last mentioned invitation, upwards of one hundred persons were killed, wounded, and taken prisoners, upon the Ohio, and in the district of Kentucky.

It is to be remarked, that previously to the last invitation, the people of Kentucky, who, in consequence of their injuries, were meditating a blow against the hostile Indians, (as before intimated,) were restrained by the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES from crossing the Ohio, until the effect of the friendly overture, intended to be made, should be known.

It is also to be observed, that the Wyandots and Delawares, after having frequently and fruitlessly endeavored to influence the Miami and Wabash Indians to peace, upon mature conviction, finally declared that force only could effect the object.

As an evidence that the conduct of the hostile Indians has been occasioned by other motives than a claim relatively to boundaries, it is to be observed that their depredations have been principally upon the district of Kentucky, and the counties of Virginia, lying along the south side of the Ohio, a country to which they have no claim.

It appears, by respectable evidence, that from the year 1783, until the month of October, 1790, the time the United States commenced offensive operations against the said Indians, that on the Ohio, and the frontiers on the south side thereof, they killed, wounded, and took prisoners, about one thousand five hundred men, women, and children, besides carrying off two thousand horses, and other property, to the amount of fifty thousand dollars.

The particulars of the barbarities exercised upon many of the prisoners, of different ages and sexes, although supported by indisputable evidence, are of too shocking a nature to be presented to the public. It is sufficient upon this head to observe, that the tomahawk and scalping knife have been the mildest instruments of death. That in some cases torture by fire, and other execrable means, have been used.

But the outrages which were committed upon the frontier inhabitants, were not the only injuries that were sustained; repeated attacks upon detachments of the troops of the United States were at different times made. The following, from its peculiar enormity, deserves recital. In April, 1790, Major Doughty was ordered to the friendly Chickasaws, on public business. He performed this duty in a boat, having with him Ensign Sedam, and a party of fifteen men. While ascending the Tennessee river, he was met by a party of forty Indians, in four canoes, consisting principally of the aforesaid banditti of Shawanese and outcast Cherokees. They approached under a white flag, the well known emblem of peace. They came on board the Major's boat, received his presents, continued with him nearly one hour, and then departed in the most friendly manner; but, they had scarcely cleared his oars, before they poured in a fire upon his crew, which was returned as soon as circumstances would permit, and a most unequal combat was sustained for several hours, when they abandoned their design, but not until they had killed and wounded eleven out of fifteen of the boat's crew. This perfidious conduct, in any age, would have demanded exemplary punishment.

All overtures of peace failing, and the depredations still continuing, an attempt at coercion became indispensable. Accordingly the expedition under Brigadier General Harmar, in the month of October, 1790, was directed. The event is known.

After this expedition, the Governor of the Western Territory, in order that nothing might be omitted to effect a peace without further conflict, did, on his arrival at Fort Harmar, in December, 1790, send through the Wyandots and Delawares conciliatory messages to the Miamies, but still without effect.

The Cornplanter, a war chief of the Senecas, and other Indians of the same tribe, being in Philadelphia in the month of February, 1791, were engaged to undertake to impress the hostile Indians with the consequences of their persisting in the hostilities, and also of the justice and moderation of the United States. In pursuance of this design, Colonel Procter, on the 14th of March, was sent to the Cornplanter, to hasten his departure, and to accompany him to the Miami village; and messages were sent to the Indians, declaratory of the pacific sentiments of the United States towards them. But both Colonel Procter and the

Defeat of General St. Clair.

Cornplanter, although zealously desirous of executing their mission, encountered difficulties of a particular nature, which were insurmountable, and prevented the execution of their orders.

Major General St. Clair, in the month of April, sent messages from Fort Harmar to the Delawares, expressive of the pacific designs of the United States to all the Indian tribes.

A treaty was held at the Painted Post, by Colonel Pickering, in June, 1791, with a part of the Six Nations, at which the humane intentions of the General Government towards them particularly, and the Indian tribes generally, were fully explained.

Captain Hendricks, a respectable Indian residing with the Oneidas, appearing zealously disposed to attempt convincing the hostile Indians of their mistaken conduct, was accordingly sent for that purpose, but was frustrated by unforeseen obstacles in his laudable attempts.

The different measures which have been recited, must evince that, notwithstanding the highly culpable conduct of the Indians in question, the Government of the United States, uninfluenced by the resentment or any false principles which might arise from a consciousness of superiority, adopted every proper expedient to terminate the Indian hostilities, without having recourse to the last extremity; and, after being compelled to resort to it, has still kept steadily in view the re-establishment peace, as its primary and sole object.

Were it necessary to add proofs of the pacific and humane dispositions of the General Government towards the Indian tribes, the treaties with the Creeks and with the Cherokees might be cited as demonstrative of its moderation and liberality.

The present partial Indian war is a remnant of the late general war, continued by a number of separate banditti, who, by the incessant practice of fifteen years, seem to have formed inveterate and incurable habits of enmity against the frontier inhabitants of the United States.

To obtain protection against lawless violence, was a main object for which the present Government was instituted: it is, indeed, a main object of all Governments. A frontier citizen possesses as strong claims to protection as any other citizen. The frontiers are the vulnerable parts of every country; and the obligation of the Government of the United States, to afford the requisite protection, cannot be less sacred in reference to the inhabitants of their Western, than to those of their Atlantic frontier.

It will appear, from a candid review of this subject, that the General Government could no longer abstain from attempting to punish the hostile Indians.

The ill success of the attempts for this purpose, is entirely unconnected with the justice or policy of the measure. A perseverance in exertions to make the refractory Indians at last sensible that they cannot continue their enormous outrages with impunity, appears to be as indispensable, in the existing posture of things, as it will be advisable, whenever they shall manifest symptoms of a more amicable disposition, to convince them, by decisive proofs, that nothing is so much desired by the United States as to be at liberty to treat them with kindness and beneficence.

H. KNOX,

Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Jan. 26, 1792.

DEFEAT OF GENERAL ST. CLAIR.

UNITED STATES, December 12, 1791.

*Gentlemen of the Senate, and
of the House of Representatives:*

It is with great concern that I communicate to you the information received from Major General St. Clair, of the misfortune which has befallen the troops under his command.

Although the national loss is considerable, according to the scale of the event, yet it may be repaired without great difficulty, excepting as to the brave men who have fallen on the occasion, and who are a subject of public as well as private regret.

A further communication will shortly be made of all such matters as shall be necessary to enable the Legislature to judge of the future measures which it may be proper to pursue.

G. WASHINGTON.

A Letter from General St. Clair, dated

FORT WASHINGTON, October 6, 1791.

SIR: I have now the satisfaction to inform you that the Army moved from Fort Hamilton, the name I have given to the fort on the Miami, on the 4th, at eight in the morning, under the command of General Butler.

The order of march and encampment I had regulated before, and on the third returned to this place to get up the militia. They marched yesterday, and consist of but about three hundred men, as you will see by the enclosed abstract of the muster. I have reason to believe, however, that at least an equal number will be up here by the 10th, and I have left orders for their following us. The monthly return should have accompanied this Letter, but it was not ready when I left camp, and has not been forwarded since. I have hitherto found it impossible to reduce the officers commanding corps to punctuality with respect to their returns, but they are mending. Our number, after deducting the garrisons of this place and Fort Hamilton, are about two thousand, exclusive of the militia. I trust, I shall find them sufficient, and should the rest of the militia come on, it will make the matter pretty certain; but the season is now so far advanced, that I fear the intermediate posts, which would, indeed, have been highly necessary, it will be impossible to establish. In that, however, I must be governed by circumstances, of which I will take care that you shall be apprised in due time. Should the enemy come to meet us, which seems to be expected, and be discomfited, there will be no difficulties, but if they expect us at the Miami villages, the business will wear another face, and the intermediate posts become more essential.

Defeat of General St. Clair.

Since the Quartermaster has been here, and got into his geers, which it took him a little time to do, I am very well satisfied with him, and do believe he will answer the description which you was pleased to give me of him; his business seems now to be well arranged.

In order to communicate with some degree of certainty with your office, I have directed Captain Buel, when he arrives, to send a Sergeant and twelve men to a house that has been newly erected, half-way between this place and Lexington, to each of which two men are to be sent off on every Monday morning to carry despatches. Those for the War Office, or any other public letters, to be put into the hands of Mr. Charles Wilkins, merchant of Lexington, who has engaged to forward all I have occasion to send, regularly, once a fortnight; and should you, sir, think proper to use the same route for any of yours, if they are sent to his care, he will forward them to me. I have been led to prefer this channel of communication to that of the river, because it appears to be rather the more certain of two, though it may be a little more tedious, and because desertion continues to prevail among the troops, and the sending small parties to such a distance gives great opportunity to effect it. General Butler informs me that no less than twenty-one went off the night before the Army moved from Fort Hamilton. I am this moment, setting out for the Army, which I hope to overtake to-morrow evening, and will write to you again, as soon after as may be.

With great regard and respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your very humble servant,

ARTHUR ST. CLAIR.

The Hon. H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

A Letter from General St. Clair, dated Camp, 81 miles advanced of Fort Washington, November 1, 1791.

SIR: Since I had the honor to write to you on the 21st instant, nothing very material has happened, and indeed, I am at present so unwell, and have been so for some time past, that I could ill detail it, if it had happened, not that that space of time has been entirely barren of incidents, but as few of them have been of the agreeable kind, I beg you to accept a sort of journal account of them, which will be the easiest for me.

On the 22d, the indisposition that had hung about me for some time, sometimes appearing as a bilious cholic, and sometimes as a rheumatic asthma, to my great satisfaction changed to a gout in the left arm and hand, leaving the breast and stomach perfectly relieved, and the cough, which had been excessive, entirely gone. This day, Mr. Ellis, with sixty militia from Kentucky, joined the Army, and brought up a quantity of flour and beef.

23d. Two men taken in the act of deserting to the enemy, and one for shooting another soldier, and threatening to kill an officer, were hanged upon the grand parade, the whole Army being drawn out; since the Army has halted, the country around this, and a-head for fifteen miles, has been well examined, it is a country which, had we arrived a month sooner in it, and with three times the number of animals, they would have been all fat now.

24th. Named the fort, Jefferson, (it lies in lat. 50. 4. 22 N.) and marched the same Indian path, serving to conduct us about six miles, and encamped on good ground and an excellent position; a rivulet in front and a very large drain, which would at the proper season afford forage for a thousand horses on the left. So ill this day that I had much difficulty in keeping with the Army.

25th. Very hard rains last night, obliged to halt to-day on account of provisions, for though the soldiers may be kept pretty easy in camp under the expectation of provisions arriving, they cannot bear to march in advance, and take none along with them; received a letter from Mr. Hodgson, by express; 1,300 pounds flour will arrive the 27th.

26th. A party of militia, sent to reconnoitre, fell in with five Indians and suffered them to slip through their fingers. In their camp, articles to the value of $22 were found and divided. The Virginia battalion is melting down very fast, notwithstanding the promises of the men to the officers. Thirteen have been discharged by Colonel Darke to-day.

27th. Gave orders for enlisting the levies, with the condition of serving out their time in the present corps. Payamingo arrived in camp with his warriors. I was so unwell, could only see him and bid him welcome; but entered on no business. Considerable dissatisfaction among the levies about their enlistments.

28th. Some clothing sent for to Fort Washington for the recruits arrived; was begun to be distributed, and will have a good effect; but the enlisting the levies does not meet with the encouragement that might have been expected. It is not openly complained of by the officers, but it is certainly privately by some of high rank; and the measure of tempting them with warm clothing, condemned. Mr. Hodgson writes me, that he is sending forward a quantity of woolen overalls and socks, by General Butler's orders. I have ordered them to be deposited at Fort Jefferson. Some few Indians about us, probably those the militia fell in with a day or two ago. Two of the levies were fired upon about three miles off; one killed; two of the militia likewise. One of them got in, and the other missing, supposed to be taken.

29th. Payamingo and his people, accompanied by Captain Sparks, and four good riflemen, going on a scout, they do not propose to return under ten days, unless they sooner succeed in taking prisoners.

30th. The Army moved about nine o'clock, and with much difficulty made seven miles, having left a considerable part of the tents by the way; the provision made by the Quartermaster for that purpose was not adequate—three days' flour issued to the men, to add the horses that carried it to his arrangements—the Indian road still with us; the course of this day N. 25 W.

31st. This morning about sixty of the militia deserted; it was at first reported that one-half of them had gone off, and that their design was to plunder the convoys which were upon the road.

Defeat of General St. Clair.

I detached the first regiment in pursuit of them, with orders to Major Hamtramck to send a sufficient guard back with Benham (a Commissary) whenever he met with them, and follow them about twenty-five miles below Fort Jefferson, or until he met the second convoy, and then return and join the Army. Benham arrived last night; and to-day, November 1st, the Army is halted to give the road-cutters an opportunity of getting some distance a-head, and that I might write to you. I am this day considerably recovered, and hope that it will turn out, what I at first expected it would be, a friendly fit of the gout come to relieve me from every other complaint.

Yesterday I was favored with your's of the 28th and 29th of September. I have enclosed my communications with the old and new contractors, and their answers. My orders from the posts to them are not yet definitive, but they will be very soon. In the mean time, I expect they are both at work.

With great respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

ARTHUR ST. CLAIR.

To the Hon. H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

P. S. Your Letters for General Wilkinson and General Scott, Mr. Jones and Mr. Brown, are sent back; and the public thanks, in the name of the PRESIDENT, presented to General Wilkinson, agreeably to your directions.

Copy of a Letter from Major General St. Clair, to the Secretary for the Department of War.

FORT WASHINGTON, November 9, 1791.

SIR: Yesterday afternoon the remains of the Army under my command got back to this place, and I have now the painful task to give you an account of as warm, and as unfortunate an action as almost any that has been fought, in which every corps was engaged and worsted, except the first regiment, that had been detached upon a service I had the honor to inform you of in my last despatch, and had not joined me.

On the 3d instant, the Army had reached a creek about twelve yards wide running to the southward of west, which I believe to have been the river St. Mary, that empties into the Miami of the lake; arrived at the village about four o'clock in the afternoon, having marched near nine miles, and were immediately encamped upon a very commanding piece of ground in two lines, having the above-mentioned creek in front, the right wing composed of Butler's, Clarke's, and Patterson's battalions, commanded by Major General Butler, formed the first line, and the left wing consisting of Bedinger's and Gaither's battalions, and the second regiment commanded by Colonel Darke formed the second line, with an interval between them of about seventy yards, which was all the ground would allow.

The right flank was pretty well secured by the creek, a steep bank, and Faulkener's corps, some of the cavalry and their picquets cover the left flank; the militia were thrown over the creek, and advanced about one quarter of a mile, and encamped in the same order; there were a few

Indians who appeared on the opposite side of the creek, but fled with the utmost precipitation on the advance of the militia; at this place, which I judged to be about fifteen miles from the Miami village, I had determined to throw up a slight work, the plan of which was concerted that evening with Major Ferguson, wherein to have deposited the men's knapsacks, and every thing else that was not of absolute necessity, and to have moved on to attack the enemy as soon as the first regiment was come up, but they did not permit me to execute either, for on the 4th, about half an hour before sunrise, and when the men had been just dismissed from the parade (for it was a constant practice to have them all under arms a considerable time before day-light) an attack was made upon the militia; those gave way in a very little time, and rushed into camp, through Major Butler's battalion, which, together with part of Clark's, they threw into considerable disorder, and which, notwithstanding the exertions of both those officers, was never altogether remedied, the Indians following close at their heels; the fire, however, of the front line checked them, but almost instantly a very heavy attack began upon that line, and in few minutes it was extended to the second likewise; the great weight of it was directed against the centre of each where the artillery was placed, and from which the men were repeatedly driven with great slaughter; finding no great effect from our fire, and confusion beginning to spread from the great number of men who were falling in all quarters, it became necessary to try what could be done by the bayonet.

Lieutenant Colonel Darke was accordingly ordered to make a charge with part of the second line, and to turn the left flank of the enemy. This was executed with great spirit. The Indians instantly gave way, and were driven back three or four hundred yards; but, for want of a sufficient number of riflemen to pursue this advantage, they soon returned, and the troops were obliged to give back in their turn. At this moment, they had entered our camp by the left flank, having pursued back the troops that were posted there.

Another charge was made here by the second regiment, Butler's and Clark's battalions, with equal effect, and it was repeated several times, and always with success; but in all of them many men were lost, and particularly the officers, which, with some raw troops, was a loss altogether irremediable. In that I just spoke of, made by the second regiment and Butler's battalion, Major Butler was dangerously wounded, and every officer of the second regiment fell, except three, one of which, Mr. Greaton, was shot through the body.

Our artillery being now silenced, and all the officers killed, except Captain Ford, who was badly wounded, more than half of the Army fallen, being cut off from the road, it became necessary to attempt the regaining it, and to make a retreat, if possible. To this purpose, the remains of the Army were formed, as well as circumstances would admit, towards the right of the encampment; from which, by the way of the second line, another charge was made upon the enemy, as if with the design to turn their right flank, but, in fact, to gain the road; this was effected; and, as soon as it was open, the militia took along it, followed by the troops, Major Clark, with his battalion, covering the rear.

The retreat, in those circumstances, was, you may be sure, a very precipitate one: it was, in fact, a flight. The camp and the artillery were abandoned, but that was unavoidable, for not a horse was left alive to have drawn it off, had it otherwise been practicable. But the most disgraceful part of the business is, that the greatest part of the men threw away their arms and accoutrements, even after the pursuit, which continued about four miles, had ceased. I found the road strewed with them for many miles, but was not able to remedy it; for, having had all my horses killed, and being mounted upon one that could not be pricked out of a walk, I could not get forward myself, and the orders I sent forward, either to halt the front, or to prevent the men from parting with their arms, were unattended to. The route continued quite to Fort Jefferson, 29 miles, which was reached a little after sun-setting. The action began about half an hour before sunrise, and the retreat was attempted at half an hour after nine o'clock.

I have not yet been able to get returns of the killed and wounded; but Major General Butler, Lieutenant Colonel Oldham, of the militia, Major Ferguson, Major Hart, and Major Clarke, are among the former. Colonel Sargent, my Adjutant General, Lieutenant Colonel Darke, Lieutenant Colonel Gibson, Major Butler, and the Viscount Malertie, who served me as an aid-de-camp, are among the latter, and a great number of Captains and subalterns in both.

I have now, sir, finished my melancholy tale—a tale that will be felt sensibly by every one that has sympathy for private distress, or for public misfortune. I have nothing, sir, to lay to the charge of the troops but their want of discipline, which, from the short time they had been in service, it was impossible they should have acquired, and which rendered it very difficult, when they were thrown into confusion, to reduce them again to order, which is one reason why the loss has fallen so heavy upon the officers, who did every thing in their power to effect it. Neither were my own exertions wanting; but, worn down with illness, and suffering under a painful disease, unable either to mount or to dismount a horse without assistance, they were not so great as they otherwise would, and perhaps ought, to have been. We were overpowered by numbers, but it is no more than justice to observe, that, though composed of so many different species of troops, the utmost harmony prevailed through the whole Army during the campaign.

At Fort Jefferson, I found the first regiment, which had returned from the service they had been sent upon, without either overtaking the deserters, or meeting the convoy of provisions. I am not certain, sir, whether I ought to consider the absence of this regiment from the field of action as fortunate or otherwise. I incline to think it was fortunate; for I very much doubt whether, had it been in the action, the fortune of the day had been turned: and, if it had not, the triumph of the enemy would have been more complete, and the country would have been destitute of every means of defence.

Taking a view of the situation of our broken troops at Fort Jefferson, and that there were no provisions in the fort, I called on the field officers, viz: Lieutenant Colonel Darke, Major Hamtramck, Major Zeigler, and Major Gaither, together with the Adjutant General, for their advice what would be proper further to be done; and it was their unanimous opinion that the addition of the first regiment, unbroken as it was, did not put the Army on so respectable a footing as it was in the morning, because a great part of it was now unarmed; that it had been then found unequal to the enemy, and, should they come on, which was probable, would be found so again; that the troops could not be thrown into the fort, both because it was too small, and that there were no provisions in it; that provisions were known to be upon the road, at the distance of one, or, at most, two marches; that, therefore, it would be proper to move, without loss of time, to meet the provisions when the men might have the sooner an opportunity of some refreshment, and that a proper detachment might be sent back with it, to have it safely deposited in the fort. This advice was accepted, and the Army was put in motion again at ten o'clock, and marched all night, and the succeeding day met with a quantity of flour; part of it was distributed immediately, part taken back to supply the Army on the march to Fort Hamilton, and the remainder, about fifty horse-loads, sent forward to Fort Jefferson. The next day a drove of cattle was met with for the same place; and I have information that both got in. The wounded who had been left at that place were ordered to be brought here by the return of the horses.

I have said, sir, in a former part of this letter, that we were overpowered by numbers; of that, however, I have no evidence: but the weight of the fire, which was always a most deadly one, and generally delivered from the ground, few of the enemy showing themselves afoot, except when they were charged, and that, in a few minutes, our whole camp, which extended above three hundred and fifty yards in length, was entirely surrounded and attacked on all quarters.

The loss, sir, the public has sustained, by the fall of so many officers, particularly General Butler and Major Ferguson, cannot be too much regretted; but it is a circumstance that will alleviate the misfortune in some measure, that all of them fell most gallantly, doing their duty. I have had very particular obligations to many of them, as well as to the survivors; but to none more than to Colonel Sargent. He has discharged the various duties of his office with zeal, with exactness, and with intelligence; and, on all occasions, afforded me every assistance in his power, which I have also experienced from my Aid-de-camp, Lieutenant Denny, and the Viscount Malertie, who served with me in the station as a volunteer.

With every sentiment of respect and regard, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

ARTHUR St. CLAIR.

The Hon. H. KNOX, Secretary of War.

P. S.—Some orders that had been given to Colonel Oldham over night, and which were of much consequence, were not executed, and some very material intelligence was communicated by Captain Slough to General Butler, in the course of the night before the action, which was never imparted to me, nor did I hear of it until after my arrival here.

List of the killed and wounded officers in the battle of the 4th of November, 1791.

KILLED.

Major General Richard Butler; Colonel Oldham, Kentucky Militia; Majors Ferguson, Clarke, and Hart; Captains Bradford, Phelan, Kirkwood, Price, Van Swearingen, Tipton, Smith, Purdy, Piatt, Guthrie, Cribbs, and Newman; Lieutenants Spear, Warren, Boyd, MacMath, Burgess, Kelso, Read, Little, Happer, and Lickins; Ensigns Cobb, Balch, Chace, Turner, Wilson, Brooks, Beatty, and Purdy; Quartermasters Reynolds and Ward; Adjutant Anderson; Doctor Grasson.

WOUNDED.

Lieutenant Colonels Gibson, Darke, and Sargent, adjutant general; Major Butler; Captains Doyle, Trueman, Ford, Buchanan, Darke, and Slough; Lieutenants Groaton, Davidson, De Butts, Price, Morgan, McCrae, Lysle, and Thompson; Adjutants Whistler and Crawford; Ensign Bines; the Viscount Malertie, volunteer aid-de-camp to Major General St. Clair.

REDUCTION OF THE PUBLIC DEBT.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY, in obedience to the order of the House of Representatives of the 19th instant, respectfully makes the following Report:

At the close of the year 1790 there was a considerable surplus of revenue beyond the objects of expenditure which had required a provision to that period; which surplus, by an act of the 12th of August in that year, was appropriated to the reduction of the Public Debt. The statement (A) herewith submitted will show, in one view, all the sums which, according to the establishments heretofore made, and corresponding appropriations, have required and will require to be defrayed, from the beginning of the year 1791 to the end of the year 1792, amounting together to $7,082,197 74. The statement (B) will also show, in one view, the nett product of all the public revenues for the same period, according to the best calculation and estimate which can now be formed of it, amounting to $7,029,755 26 cents. The statement (C) exhibits a summary of the total annual expenditure of the United States, in conformity to existing establishments, amounting to $3,688,043 50. The statement (B) includes a view of the probable product, during the year 1792, of the existing revenues of the United States, amounting to $3,700,000. From these statements will result substantially the information which is desired by the House of Representatives, as far as it is now in the power of the Secretary to give it. One or two matters, however, may be proper to be added, with a view to greater accuracy. There are certain instances in which the estimates for appropriations have exceeded, and will exceed, the sums actually expended. Hence the apparent excess of the expenditure, as exhibited in the statement, (A) beyond the product of the revenue, as shown in the statement, (B,) will probably not be found real. But the amount of these surplusses or overestimate is not stated, because it is not, and, in some cases, cannot now be ascertained, and it is not likely to be very considerable; and because, if it should do more than counterbalance the excess alluded to, it will be safest to set off the surplus against those contingent demands which from time to time occur. No deduction has been made from the annual interest on account of the Debt purchased. This has proceeded from a supposition that it will be deemed expedient by the Legislature to appropriate inviolably the interest of any part of the Debt which shall be at any time extinguished towards the extinction of the remainder. This point will be more particularly submitted in a Report on the subject of the Public Debt. All which is humbly submitted.

ALEXANDER HAMILTON,

Secretary of the Treasury.

Total of nett revenue for the years 1791 and 1792	- 7,029,755 26

Notes to statement, (B.)

(A.) The produce of these three quarters may be considered as ascertained. Though returns have not been received from all the ports for the entire period, yet so many have been received (including the principal ports) as to have admitted of a calculation, with regard to the rest, not liable to material error. The produce for the year 1790 has served as a guide in respect to ports from which returns have not been received.

(B.) The sum here stated is altogether upon estimate, the time which has elapsed since the end of the quarter not admitting of the proper documents. It exceeds the produce of the same quarter for the preceding year $55,773 19. If the ratio of increase of any preceding quarter during the year 1791 had been applied to this quarter, the sum would have been considerably greater. But it is believed that this would not furnish a just rule. It is understood that the importations for the last quarter of 1790 were much increased to avoid the additional duties which were to take place on the first day of the year 1791. And, though the additional duty on distilled spirits might at first view be expected to add to the product for the quarter in question, yet it is far from certain that this was the effect of it. Extraordinary exertions were made to import distilled spirits prior to July, when the additional duty took effect, which may be supposed to have lessened the quantity afterwards, so as to leave it a question whether this article was more or less productive in that quarter than in the same quarter of the former year. Making allowance for these circumstances, it does not appear probable that the last quarter of 1791 will exceed the last quarter of 1790 in so great a proportion as any of the preceding corresponding quarters.

(C.) This sum is materially short of the originally-estimated product; but, from the returns hitherto received, it does not appear likely to be greater. This is owing partly to a decreased distillation of spirits from foreign materials, in consequence of a sudden rise in the price of molasses, and partly to the obstacles which have retarded the complete execution of the law.

(D.) The sum here estimated cannot, in the nature of the thing, be accurate. It includes a compromise of opposite considerations. First, it contemplates an additional sum for the additional duty on imported spirits, which will be fully operative during the present year. Secondly, it contemplates the possibility that the disturbances in Hispaniola may tend to diminish the supply of several articles which are objects of considerable duties, and may proportionably diminish the revenue. Hence about one-third of the probable increase of the duties on spirits is added to the produce of the year 1791, and the aggregate is taken as the produce of the year 1792, abating two-thirds of that increase as an equivalent for other deficiencies.

(E.) The same disturbances in Hispaniola may be expected to diminish the product of the duties on home-made spirits, by considerably reducing the supply of molasses; which, added to the obstacles already alluded to, (and which it will require yet some time completely to surmount,) cannot fail to render the real product of these duties, in the course of the present year, materially less than the estimated product. Accordingly, an abatement of about one-third is made in the present estimate.

Secretary of the Treasury.

THE PUBLIC DEBT.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Feb. 6, 1792.

SIR: I have the honor to send herewith a Report on the subject of the Public Debt, pursuant to the order of the House of Representatives of the first of November, 1791, and to subsequent references therein mentioned; and to be, with perfect respect, sir, your most obedient and most humble servant,

ALEXANDER HAMILTON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

The Hon. the SPEAKER
of the House of Representatives.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Jan. 23, 1792.

Pursuant to the order of the House of Representatives of the first of November, 1791, directing the Secretary of the Treasury "to report to the House the amount of the subscriptions to the loans proposed by the act making provision for the Public Debt, as well in the debts of the respective States as in the Domestic Debt of the United States, and of the parts which remain unsubscribed, together with such measures as are, in his opinion, expedient to be taken on the subject," the said Secretary respectfully submits the following Report:

I. The whole amount of the Domestic Debt of the United States, principal and interest, which has been subscribed to the loan proposed concerning that Debt, by the act entitled "An act making provision for the Debt of the United States," according to the statement herewith transmitted, marked A, and subject to the observations accompanying that statement, is $31,797,481 22.

Which, pursuant to the terms of that act, has been converted into stock bearing an immediate interest of six per cent. per annum $14,177,450 43

Stock bearing the like interest from the first of January, 1801,	7,088,727 79
Stock bearing an immediate interest of three per cent. per annum - - -	10,531,303 00
Total - - -	$31,797,481 22

Of which there stands to the credit of the Trustees of the Sinking Fund, in consequence of purchases of the Public Debt, made under their direction, the sum of $1,131,364 76.

The unsubscribed residue of the said Debt, according to the statements herewith transmitted, marked B and C, and subject to the observations accompanying the statement C, appears to amount to $10,616,604 65.

Concerning which, some farther arrangement is necessary.

The greatest part of the registered Debt, hitherto unsubscribed, is owned by citizens of foreign countries; most, if not all, of whom appear now disposed to embrace the terms held out by the act above mentioned; extensive orders having been received from those creditors to subscribe to the loan, after the time for receiving subscriptions had elapsed.

A considerable part of the outstanding or floating Debt consists of loan-office certificates, issued between the first of September, 1777, and the first of March, 1778, bearing interest on the nominal sum. Many of the holders of this species of Debt have come in upon the terms of this act, but others have hitherto declined it; alleging that the special nature of their contract gives a peculiarity to their case, and renders the commutation proposed not so fair an equivalent to them as in other instances. They also complain that the act has had, towards them, a compulsory aspect, by refusing the temporary payment of interest unless they should exchange their old for new certificates, essentially varying the nature of their contract.

A resolution of Congress of the 10th of September, 1777, stipulates in favor of this class of creditors, interest upon the nominal instead of the real principal of their Debt, until that principal be discharged. This certainly renders their contract of a nature more beneficial than that of other creditors; but they are, at the same time, liable to be divested of the extra benefit it gives them by a payment of their specie dues; and it may be observed, that they have actually enjoyed, and by accepting the terms offered to them were enabled to realize, advantages superior to other creditors. They have been paid interest by bills on France, from the 10th of September, 1777, to the 1st of March, 1782, while other creditors received their interest in depreciated bills of the old emissions; and the terms of the loan proposed put it in their power to realize the benefit of interest on the nominal amount of their respective debts, at rates from six and twenty-one hundredths nearly to ten and forty-seven one hundredths per cent., on their real or specie capital, down to the last of December, 1790.

It does not, therefore, appear to have been an unreasonable expectation that they, as readily as any other description of public creditors, would have acquiesced in a measure calculated for the accommodation of the Government, under circumstances in respect to which it has been demonstrated, by subsequent events, that the accommodation desired was consistent with the best interest of the public creditors. A large proportion of the parties interested have, indeed, viewed the matter in this light, and have embraced the proposition. It is probable that the progress of things will satisfy the remainder that it is equally their interest to concur, if a farther opportunity be afforded. But it is, nevertheless, for themselves only to judge how far the equivalent proposed is in their case a reasonable and fair one; how far any circumstances in their claim may suggest reasons for moderation on their part; or how far any other motives, public or private, ought to induce an acceptance. And the principles of good faith require that their election should be free.

On this ground, the complaint which regards the withholding of a temporary payment of interest, except on the condition of surrender of the old certificates for new ones, importing a contract substantially different, appears to the Secretary not destitute of foundation. He presumes that the operation of that provision, in the particular case, was not adverted to; or, that an exception would have been introduced as most consonant with the general spirit and design of the act. Accordingly, the further measures which will be submitted will contemplate a method of obviating the objection in question.

From the consideration that an extension of the time for receiving stipulations, upon the terms of the act making provision for the Debt of the United States, is desired by a large proportion of the non-subscribing creditors; and from the further consideration that sufficient experience has not yet been had of the productiveness of a considerable branch of the revenues which have been established, to afford the light necessary to a final arrangement, it is, in the judgment of the Secretary, advisable to renew the proposition for a loan in the Domestic Debt, on the same terms with the one which has been closed, and to allow time for receiving subscriptions to it until the last day of September next, inclusively; making provision for a temporary payment of interest to such who may not think fit to subscribe, for the year 1792, of the like nature with that which was made in the same case for the year 1791—except as to the holders of Loan-office certificates, issued between the 1st of September, 1777, and the 1st of March, 1778; in respect to whom it is submitted as proper to dispense with the obligation of exchanging their old certificates for new, as the condition of their receiving interest in capacity of non-subscribers, and to allow them, without such exchange, to receive the same interest, both for the years 1791 and 1792, as if they had subscribed to the first loan. It will not be materially difficult so to regulate the operation at the Treasury as to avoid, in the particular case, that danger of imposition by counterfeits, which was the motive to the general provision for an exchange of certificates.

II. The amount of the subscriptions in the Debts of the respective States, within the limits of the sum assumed in each, appears by the statement marked D to be $17,072,334 39, subject to the observations accompanying that statement. Consequently, the difference between the aggregate of the sums subscribed, and the aggregate of the sums assumed, is $4,427,665 61.

This difference is to be attributed to several causes, the principal of which are the following: First, that the sums assumed in respect to certain States, exceeded the actual amount of their existing debts. Second, that in various instances a part of the existing Debt was in a form which excluded it from being received without contravening particular provisions of the law—as in the case of certificates issued after the 1st day of January, 1790, in lieu of certificates which had been issued prior to that period, which was reported upon by the Secretary on the 25th day of February last. Third, ignorance of, or inattention to, the limitation of time for receiving subscriptions. It appears that a number of persons lost the opportunity of subscribing from the one or the other of these causes.

A strong desire that a further opportunity may be afforded for subscriptions in the debts of the States, has been manifested by the individuals interested. And the States of Rhode Island and New Hampshire have, by the public acts referred to the Secretary, indicated a similar desire. The affording of such further opportunity may either be restricted within the limit as to amount, which is contemplated by the act itself, or may receive an extension which will embrace the residuary debts of the States.

The first may be considered as nothing more than giving full effect to a measure already adopted. The last appears to have in its favor all the leading inducements to what has been already done. The embarrassments which might arise from conflicting systems of finance are not entirely obviated. The efficacious command of the national resources for national exigencies, is not unequivocally secured. The equalizing of the condition of the citizens of every State, and exonerating those of the States most indebted, from partial burdens which would press upon them in consequence of exertions in a common cause, is not completely fulfilled. until the entire Debt of every State, contracted in relation to the war, is embraced in one general and comprehensive plan. The inconvenience to the United States of disburdening the States, which are still encumbered with considerable debts, would bear no proportion to the inconvenience which they would feel if left to struggle with those debts unaided. More general contentment, therefore, in the public mind may be expected to attend such an exoneration, than the reverse, in proportion as the experience of actual inconvenience would be greater, though only applicable to parts, in the one than in the other case.

With regard to States, parts only of the debts of which have been assumed, and in proportions short of those which have prevailed in favor of States, and other short also of what would have resulted from a due apportionment of the entire sum assumed, the claim to a further assumption is founded on considerations of equal justice, as relative to the measure itself, considered in a separate and independent light.

But there is a further reason of material weight for an immediate general assumption. Moneyed men, as well foreigners as citizens, through the expectation of an eventual assumption, or that in some shape or other a substantial provision will be made for the unassumed residue of the State debts, will be induced to speculate in the purchase of them. In proportion as the event is unsettled, or uncertain, the price of the article will be low, and the present proprietors will be under disadvantage in the sale. The loss to them in favor of the purchasers is to be regarded as an evil; and, as far as it is connected with a transfer to foreigners, at an undervalue, it will be a national evil. By whatsoever authority an ultimate provision may be made, there will be an absolute loss to the community equal to the total amount of such undervalue.

It may appear an objection to the measure, that it will require an establishment of additional funds by the Government of the United States. But this does not seem to be a necessary consequence. The probability is, that without a supplementary assumption, an equal, or very nearly equal augmentation of funds will be requisite to provide for greater balances, in favor of certain States, which would be proportionably diminished by such assumption. The destination, not the quantum of the fund, will, therefore, be the chief distinction between the two cases.

It may also appear an objection to a total assumption, that the magnitude of the object is not ascertained with precision. It is not certainly known what is the sum due in each State, nor has it been possible to acquire the information, owing to different causes. But, though precise data are deficient, there are materials which will serve as guides. From the returns received at the Treasury, assisted by information in other ways, it may be stated, without danger of material error, that the remaining debts of the States, over and above the sums already subscribed, will not exceed the amounts specified in statement D, accompanying this Report; and that, including sums already subscribed, the total amount to be ultimately provided for, in the event of a general assumption, will not exceed $25,403,362 71, which would constitute an addition of $3,903,362 71 to the sum of $21,500,000, already assumed. Should a total assumption be deemed eligible, it may still be advisable to assign a determinate sum for each State, that the utmost limit of the operation may be pre-established; and it is necessary in order to the certainty of a due provision, in proper time, that interest should not begin to be payable, on the additional sums assumed, until after the year 1792. It will occur, that provision has been made for paying to each State, in trust for its non-subscribing creditors, an interest upon the difference between the sum assumed for such State, and that actually subscribed, equal to what would have been payable, if it had been subscribed.

In the event of a further assumption, either within the limits already established, or commensurate with the remaining debts of the States, it is conceived that it will not be incompatible with the provision just mentioned, to retain, at the end of each quarter, during the progress of the further subscription, out of the money directed to be paid to each State, a sum corresponding with the interest upon so much of its debts as shall have been subscribed to that period, paying the overplus, if any, to the State. An absolute suspension of that payment does not appear consistent with the nature of the stipulation included in that provision; for, though the money to be paid to a State be expressly a trust for the non-subscribing creditors, yet, as it cannot be certain beforehand that they will elect to change their condition, the possibility of it will not justify a suspension of payment to the State, which might operate as suspension of payment to the creditors themselves.

A further objection to such a suspension results from the idea that the provision in question appears to have a secondary object, namely: as a pledge for securing a provision for whatever balance may be found due to a State on the general settlement of accounts. The payment directed to be made to a State is "to continue until there shall be a settlement of accounts between the United States and the individual States; and, in case a balance should then appear in favor of a State, until provision shall be made for the said balance." This secondary operation as a pledge or security (consistently with the intent of the Funding Act) can only be superseded in favor of the primary object, a provision for the creditors, and, as far as may be necessary, to admit them to an effectual participation of it. But, as whatever money may be paid to a State is to be paid over to its creditors, proportional deductions may, with propriety, be made from the debts of those creditors who may hereafter subscribe, so as that the United States may not have to pay twice for the same purpose.

If it shall be judged expedient, either to open again, or extend the assumption, it will be necessary to vary the description of the debts, which may be subscribed, so as to comprehend all those which have relation to services or supplies during the war, under such restrictions as are requisite to guard against abuse.

In the original proposition for an assumption of the State debts, and in the suggestions now made on the same subject, the Secretary has contemplated, and still contemplates, as a material part of the plan, an effectual provision for the sale of the vacant lands of the United States. He has considered this resource as an important mean of sinking a part of the Debt, and facilitating ultimate arrangements concerning the residue. If supplementary funds shall be rendered necessary by an additional assumption, the provision will most conveniently be made at the next session of Congress, when the productiveness of the existing revenues, and the extent of the sum to be provided for will be better ascertained.

There is a part of the Public Debt of the United States which is a cause of some perplexity to the Treasury. It is not comprehended within the existing provision for the Foreign debt, which is confined to loans made abroad; and it is questionable whether it is to be regarded as a portion of the Domestic debt. It is not only due to foreigners, but the interest upon it is payable, by express stipulation, in a foreign country; whence it becomes a matter of doubt, whether it be at all contemplated by the act making provision for the Debt of the United States. The part alluded to is that which is due to certain foreign officers who served the United States during the late war. In consequence of a resolution of Congress, directing their interest to be paid to them in France, the certificates which were issued to them specify that "in pursuance of, and compliance with, a certain resolution of Congress of the third day of February, 1784, the said interest is to be paid annually, at the house of Monsieur Le Grand, banker, in Paris." Interest has accordingly been paid to them at Paris, down to the 31st of December, 1788, by virtue of a special resolution of Congress, of the 20th of August in that year; since which period, no payment has been made.

It has been heretofore suggested, as the opinion of the Secretary, that it would be expedient to cause the whole of this description of debt to be paid off, among other reasons, because it bears an interest at six per centum per annum, payable abroad, and can be discharged with a saving. The other reasons alluded to are of a nature both weighty and delicate, and too obvious, it is presumed, to need a specification. Some recent circumstances have served to strengthen the inducements to the measure; but, if it should finally be deemed inadvisable, it is necessary, at least, that provision should be made for the interest, which is now suspended, under the doubt that has been stated, and from the want of authority to remit it pursuant to the contract. The amount of this debt, with the arrears of interest to the end of the year 1791, is $220,646 81.

IV. The act making provision for the Debt of the United States has appropriated the proceeds of the Western lands as a fund for the discharge of the Public Debt. And the act making provision for the reduction of the Public Debt has appropriated all the surplus of the duties on imports and tonnage, to the end of the year 1790, to the purpose of purchasing the Debt at the market price, and has authorized the President to borrow the further sum of $2,000,000 for the same object.

These measures serve to indicate the intention of the Legislature, as early and as fast as possible, to provide for the extinguishment of the existing Debt. In pursuance of that intention, it appears advisable that a systematic plan should be begun for the creation and establishment of a Sinking Fund.

An obvious basis of this establishment, which may be immediately contemplated, is the amount of the interest on so much of the Debt as has been or shall be, from time to time, purchased or paid off, or received in discharge of any debt or demand of the United States, made payable in public securities, over and above the interest of any new debt, which may be created in order to such purchase, or payment.

The purchases of the Debt already made have left a sum of interest in the Treasury, which will be increased by future purchases, certain sums payable to the United States in their own securities, will, when received, have a similar effect. And there is ground to calculate on a saving upon the operations which are in execution with regard to the Foreign debt. The sale of the Western lands, when provision shall be made for it, may be expected to produce a material addition to such a fund.

It is, therefore, submitted that it be adopted as a principle, that all interest which shall have ceased to be payable, by any of the means above specified, shall be set apart and appropriated in the most firm and inviolable manner, as a fund for sinking the Public Debt, by purchase or payment; and that the said fund be placed under the direction of the officers named in the second section of the act making provision for the reduction of the Public Debt, to be by them applied towards the purchase of the said Debt, until the annual produce of the said fund shall amount to two per cent. of the entire portion of the Debt which bears a present interest of six per centum, and thenceforth to be applied towards the redemption of that portion of the Debt, according to the right which has been reserved to the Government.

It will deserve the consideration of the Legislature, whether this fund ought not to be so vested as to acquire the nature and quality of a proprietary trust, incapable of being diverted without a violation of the principles and sanctions of property.

A rapid accumulation of this fund would arise from its own operation; but it is not doubted that the progressive development of the resources of the country, and a reduction of the rate of interest, by the progress of public credit, already exemplified in a considerable degree, will speedily enable the Government to make important additions to it, in various ways. With due attention to preserve order and cultivate peace, a strong expectation may be indulged, that a reduction of the Debt of the country will keep pace with the reasonable hopes of its citizens.

All which is humbly submitted.

ALEXANDER HAMILTON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

The amount of stock funded at the Treasury to 30th September, 1791, has been ascertained with accuracy; but, at that time, many subscriptions had been made, which have not yet been adjusted for want of proper powers of attorney, and other documents. It is, therefore, probable that, on settlement of all the Loans, the amount will be found somewhat different from what is now represented.

The sums funded at the several Loan Offices, it is presumed, are ascertained with accuracy; but, as the loans had not been adjusted in all instances when the returns were made, some immaterial differences will probably hereafter appear.

C.

Estimate of the Outstanding Debt, on the 30th of September, 1791, viz:

The amount of the Domestic Debt of the United States, as stated by the Secretary of the Treasury, in his Report of the 9th of January, 1790, to the House of Representatives, relative to a provision for the support of the public credit, is as follows:

Loans.

Liquidated and Loan Office debt, as per schedule C	-	-	-	$27,383,917	67

					38,716,619
Balance outstanding	-	-	-		3,697,466

NOTE.—The balance above stated to be outstanding, probably exceeds the real sum. In the original estimate, the old emission bills were computed at forty for one; but they have been provided for, at one hundred for one. There are also Loan Office certificates, which were sent to public officers, to be applied to the public service, and which were supposed to have been so applied, but which have since, upon settlements of their accounts at the Treasury, been returned and cancelled.

In addition to this, payments in public securities are expected to be made into the Treasury, which will thereupon be cancelled. And it is presumable that, in the course of the war, sums have been lost and destroyed, which are included in the estimate; but, as there is some arrearage of interest not included in the calculation, and as there are certain claims on the Treasury, the event or amount of which is not yet determined, it is not possible now to make a precise estimate of the difference between the sum computed to be outstanding, and what will be really found so.

NOTES.

1. The sums marked a, in the column of remaining debts, are inserted upon recent official communications.

2. Those marked b, are founded upon official statements some time since received, and reported to the House of Representatives, on the 9th of January, 1790, adding interest for the subsequent period.

3. Those marked c, are founded on informal information, but such as is deemed substantially authentic and accurate.

The estimate for Rhode Island includes a sum not ascertained, which has been cancelled in consequence of former laws of the State, enjoining the creditors to bring in their certificates, and receive payment in paper money, but has been revived by a late law of the State, directing the sums paid to be liquidated, according to a certain scale, and deducted from the original amount.

4. That marked d, is founded on a report of a committee of the 11th November, 1791, to the House of Delegates of Virginia, compared with a former return to the Treasury, and other information.

5. That marked e, is founded upon a statement of the Comptroller of North Carolina, of the 20th of May, 1790.

6. That marked f, is founded on a statement of the Treasurer of Georgia, of the 30th of April, 1790, compared with other information.

7. The sums expressed in round numbers are not meant to be understood as precisely accurate, but as very near the truth.

8. The Foreign, as well as the Domestic Debt of the States, is included.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 25, 1792.

ALEXANDER HAMILTON, Secretary of the Treasury.

SPIRITS, FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC.

In obedience to the orders of the House of Representatives, of the first and second days of November last, the first directing the Secretary of the Treasury to report to the House such information as he may have obtained respecting any difficulties which may have occurred in the execution of the act "repealing, after the last day of June next, the duties heretofore laid upon distilled spirits imported from abroad, and laying others in their stead; and also upon spirits distilled within the United States, and for appropriating the same," together with his opinion thereupon. The second directing him to report to the House whether any and what alterations in favor of the spirits which shall be distilled from articles of the growth or produce of the United States, or from foreign articles within the same, can, in his opinion, be made in the act for laying duties upon spirits distilled within the United States, consistently with its main design, and with the maintenance of the public faith. The said Secretary respectfully submits the following Report:

From the several petitions and memorials which have been referred to the Secretary, as well as from various representations which have been made to him, it appears that objections have arisen in different quarters against the above-mentioned act, which have, in some instances, embarrassed its execution, and inspired a desire of its being repealed; in others, have induced a wish that alterations may be made in some of its provisions. These objections have reference to a supposed tendency of the act—1st. To contravene the principles of liberty; 2dly. To injure morals; 3dly. To oppress by heavy and excessive penalties; 4thly. To injure industry and interfere with the business of distilling.

As to the supposed tendency of the act to contravene the principles of liberty, the discussions of the subject which have had place in and out of the Legislature supersede the necessity of more than a few brief general observations.

It is presumed that a revision of the point cannot in this respect weaken the conviction which originally dictated the law.

There can surely be nothing in the nature of an internal duty on a consumable commodity more incompatible with liberty than in that of an external duty on a like commodity. A doctrine which asserts that all duties of the former kind (usually denominated excises) are inconsistent with the genius of a free Government is too violent and too little reconcilable with the necessities of society to be true. It would tend to deprive the Government of what is in most countries a principal source of revenue, and, by narrowing the distribution of taxes, would serve to oppress particular kinds of industry. It would throw, in the first instance, an undue proportion of the public burden on the merchant and on the landholder. This is one of those cases in which names have an improper influence, and in which prepossessions exclude a due attention to facts. Accordingly, the law under consideration is complained of, though free from the features which have served in other cases to render laws on the same subject exceptionable. And though the differences have been pointed out, they have not only been overlooked but the very things which have been studiously avoided in the formation of the law are charged upon it, and that, too, from quarters where its operation would, from circumstances, have worn the least appearance of them.

It has been heretofore noticed that the chief circumstances which, in certain excise laws, have given occasion to the charge of their being unfriendly to liberty, are not to be found in the act which is the subject of the Report, namely: 1st, a summary and discretionary jurisdiction in the excise officers, contrary to the course of the common law, and an abridgement of the right of trial by jury; and, secondly, a general power in the same officers to search and inspect indiscriminately all the houses and buildings of the persons engaged in the business to which the tax relates.

As to the first particular, there is nothing in the act even to give color to a charge of the kind against it, and accordingly it has not been brought. But as to the second, a very different power has been mistaken for it, and the act is complained of as conferring that very power of indiscriminate search and inspection. The fact, nevertheless, is otherwise. An officer, under the act in question, can inspect or search no house or building, or even apartment of any house or building, which has not been previously entered and marked by the possessor as a place used for distilling or keeping spirits. And even the power so qualified is only applicable to distilleries from foreign materials, and in cities, towns, and villages, from domestic materials; that is, only in cases in which the law contemplates that the business is carried on upon such a scale as effectually to separate the distillery from the dwelling of the distiller. The distilleries scattered over the country, which form much the greatest part of the whole, are in no degree subject to discretionary inspection and search.

The true principles of the objection which may be raised to a general discretionary power of inspection and search is, that the domicile or dwelling of a citizen ought to be free from vexatious inquisition and intrusion. This principle cannot apply to a case in which it is put in his own power to separate the place of his business from the place of his habitation, and by designating the former visible public marks, to avoid all intermeddling with the latter. A distillery seldom forms a part of the dwelling of its proprietor, and, even where it does, it depends on him to direct and limit the power of visiting and search, by marking out the particular apartments which are so employed.

But the requisition upon the distiller to set marks on the building or apartments which he makes use of in his business is one of the topics of complaint against the law. Such marks are represented as a dishonorable badge. And thus a regulation designed as much to conform with the feelings of the citizen as for the security of the revenue is converted into matter of objection.

It is not easy to conceive what maxim of liberty is violated by requiring persons who carry on particular trades, which are made contributory to the revenue, to designate by public marks the places in which they are carried on. There can certainly be nothing more harmless or less inconvenient than such a regulation. The thing itself is frequently done by persons of various callings, for the information of customers; and why it should become a hardship or grievance, if required for a public purpose, can with difficulty be imagined.

The supposed tendency of the act to injure morals seems to have relation to the oaths, which are in a variety of cases required, and which are liable to the objection that they give occasion to perjuries. The necessity of requiring oaths is, whenever it occurs, matter of regret. It is certainly desirable to avoid them as often and as far as possible. But it is more easy to desire than to find a substitute. The requiring of them is not peculiar to the act in question. They are a common appendage of revenue laws, and are among the usual guards of those laws, as they are of public and private rights in Courts of Justice. They constantly occur in jury trials, to which the citizens of the United States are so much and so justly attached. The same objection, in different degrees, lies against them in both cases. Yet it is not perceivable how they can be dispensed with in either. It is remarkable that both the kinds of security to the revenue which are to be found in the act, the oaths of parties and the inspection of officers, are objected to. If they are both to be abandoned, it is not easy to imagine what security there can be for any species of revenue which is to be collected from articles of consumption. If precautions of this nature are inconsistent with liberty, and immoral, as there are very few indirect taxes which can be collected without them, the consequence must be, that the entire or almost entire weight of the public burdens must, in the first instance, fall upon fixed and visible property, houses and lands, a consequence which would be found, in experiment, productive of great injustice and inequality, and ruinous to agriculture.

It has been suggested by some distillers that both the topics of complaint which have been mentioned might be obviated by a fixed rate of duty, adjusted according to a ratio compounded of the capacity of each still, and the number and capacities of the cisterns employed with it; but this and every similar method are objected to by other distillers, as tending to great inequality arising from unequal supplies of the material at different times and at different places, from the different methods of distillation practised by different distillers, and from the different degrees of activity in the business which arise from capitals more or less adequate.

The result of an examination of this point appears to be, that every such mode, in cases in which the business is carried on upon an extensive scale, would necessarily be attended with considerable inequalities, and, upon the whole, would be less satisfactory than the plan which has been adopted.

It is proved by the fullest information that, in regard to distilleries which are rated in the law according to the capacity of each still, the alternative of paying according to the quantity actually distilled is viewed in many parts of the United States as essential to the equitable operation of the duty. And it is evident that such an alternative could not be allowed, but upon the condition of the party rendering upon oath an account of the quantity of spirits distilled by him, without entirely defeating the duty.

As to the charge that the penalties of the act are severe and oppressive, it is made in such general terms, and so absolutely without the specification of a single particular, that it is difficult to imagine where it points. The Secretary, however, has carefully reviewed the provisions of the act in this respect, and he is not able to discover any foundation for the charge. The penalties it inflicts are in their nature the same with those which are common in revenue laws, and in their degree comparatively moderate. Pecuniary fines, from fifty to five hundred dollars, and forfeiture of the article in respect to which there has been a failure to comply with the law, are the severest penalties inflicted upon delinquent parties, except in a very few cases. In two, a forfeiture of the value of the article is added to that of the article itself; and, in some others, a forfeiture of the ship or vessel and of the wagon or other instrument of conveyance, assistant in a breach of law, is likewise involved.

Spirits, Foreign and Domestic.

Penalties like these for wilful and fraudulent breaches of an important law cannot truly be deemed either unusual or excessive. They are less than those which secure the laws of impost, and as moderate as can promise security to any object of revenue which is capable of being evaded.

There appears to be but one provision in the law which admits of a question whether the penalty prescribed may not partake of severity. It is that which inflicts the pains of perjury on any person who shall be convicted of "wilfully taking a false oath or affirmation, in any of the cases in which oaths or affirmations are required by the act. Precedents in relation to this particular vary. In many of them the penalties are less severe than for perjury in Courts of Justice; in others they are the same. The latter are generally of the latest date, and seem to have been the result of experience.

The United States have in other cases pursued the same principle as in the law in question; and the practice is certainly founded on strong reasons.

1st. The additional security which it gives to the revenue cannot be doubted. Many who would risk pecuniary forfeitures and penalties would not encounter the more disgraceful punishment annexed to perjury.

2d. There seems to be no solid distinction between one false oath in violation of law and right and another false oath in violation of law and right.

A distinction in the punishments of different species of false swearing is calculated to beget false opinions concerning the sanctity of an oath; and, by countenancing an impression that a violation of it is less heinous in the cases in which it is less punished, it tends to impair in the mind that scrupulous veneration for the obligation of an oath which ought always to prevail, and not only to facilitate a breach of it in the cases which the laws have marked with less odium, but to prepare the mind for committing the crime in other cases.

So far is the law under consideration from being chargeable with particular severity, that there are to be found in it marks of more than common attention to prevent its operating severely or oppressively. The 43d section of the act contains a special provision (and one which it is believed is not to be found in any law enacted in this country prior to the present Constitution of the United States) by which forfeitures and penalties incurred without an intention of fraud or wilful negligence may be mitigated or remitted. This mild and equitable provision is an effectual guard against suffering or inconvenience in consequence of undesigned transgressions of the law.

The 30th section contains a provision in favor of persons who, though innocent, may accidentally suffer by seizures of their property, (as in the execution of the revenue laws sometimes unavoidably happens,) which is perhaps entirely peculiar to the law under consideration. Where there has even been a probable cause of seizure, sufficient to acquit an officer, the jury are to assess whatever damages may have accrued from any injury to the articles seized, with an allowance for the de-tion of it at the rate of six per centum per annum of the value, which damages are to be paid out of the public Treasury.

There are other provisions of the act which mark the scrupulous attention of the Government to protect the parties concerned from inconvenience and injury, and which conspire to vindicate the law from imputations of severity or oppression.

The supposed tendency of the act to injure industry, and to interfere with the business of distilling, is endeavored to be supported by some general and some special reasons, both having relation to the effect of the duty upon the manufacture. Those of the first kind affirm generally that duties on home manufactures are impolitic, because they tend to discourage them; that they are particularly so when they are laid on articles manufactured from the produce of the country, because they have then the additional effect of injuring agriculture; that it is the general policy of nations to protect and promote their own manufactures, especially those which are wrought out of domestic materials; that the law in question interferes with this policy.

Observations of this kind admit of an easy answer. Duties on manufactures tend to discourage them or not, according to the circumstances under which they are laid, and are impolitic or not, according to the same circumstances. When a manufacture is in its infancy, it is impolitic to tax it; because the tax would be both unproductive and would add to the difficulties which naturally impede the first attempts to establish a new manufacture, so as to endanger its success. But when a manufacture, as in the case of distilled spirits, in the United States, is arrived at maturity, it is as fit an article of taxation as any other. No good reason can be assigned why the consumer of a domestic commodity should not contribute something to the public revenue, when the consumer of a foreign commodity contributes to it largely; and, as a general rule, it is not to be disputed that duties on articles of consumption are paid by the consumers.

To the manufacture itself the duty is no injury, if an equal duty be laid on the rival foreign article. And when a greater duty is laid upon the latter than upon the former, as in the present instance, the difference is a bounty on the domestic article, and operates as an encouragement of the manufacture. The manufacturer can afford to sell his fabric the cheaper, in proportion to that difference, and is so far enabled to undersell and supplant the dealer in the foreign article.

The principle of the objection would tend to confine all taxes to imported articles, and would deprive the Government of resources which are indispensable to a due provision for the public safety and welfare; contrary to the plain intention of the Constitution, which gives express power to employ those resources when necessary: a power which is found in all Governments, and is essential to their efficiency, and even to their existence.

Duties on articles of internal production and manufacture form in every country the principal sources of revenue. Those on imported articles can only be carried to a certain extent, without defeating their object; by operating either as prohibitions, or as bounties upon smuggling. They are moreover in some degree temporary; for as the growth of manufactures diminishes the quantum of duty on imports, the public revenue, ceasing to arise from that source, must be derived from articles which the national industry has substituted for those previously imported. If the Government cannot then resort to internal means for the additional supplies, which the exigencies of every nation call for, it will be unable to perform its duty or even to preserve its existence. The community must be unprotected, and the social compact be dissolved.

For the same reasons that a duty ought not to be laid on an article manufactured out of the produce of the country (which is the point most insisted upon) it ought not to be laid upon the produce itself, nor consequently upon the land, which is the instrument of that produce; because taxes are laid upon land as the fund out of which the income of the proprietor is drawn, or, in other words, on account of its produce. There ought, therefore, on the principle of the objection, to be neither taxes on land, nor the produce of land, nor on articles manufactured from that produce. And if a nation should be in a condition to supply itself, with its own manufactures, there could then be very little or no revenue, of course there must be a want of the essential means of national justice and national security.

Positions like these, however well meant by those who urge them, refute themselves, because they tend to the dissolution of Government, by rendering it incapable of providing for the objects for which it is instituted.

However true the allegation that it is and ought to be the prevailing policy of nations to cherish their own manufactures, it is equally true that nations in general lay duties for the purpose of revenue on their own manufactures; and it is obvious to a demonstration that it may be done without injury to them. The most successful nations in manufactures have drawn the largest revenues from the most useful of them. It merits particular attention, that ardent spirits are an article, which has been generally deemed and made use of, as one of the fittest objects of revenue, and to an extent in other countries, which bears no comparison with what has been done in the United States.

The special reasons alluded to are of different kinds:

I. It is said, that the act in question by laying a smaller additional duty on foreign spirits, than the duty on home-made spirits, has a tendency to discourage the manufacture of the latter.

This objection merits consideration, and as far as it may appear to have foundation, ought to be obviated. The point, however, seems not to have been viewed in all its aspects in a correct light.

Before the present Constitution of the United States began to operate, the regulations of the different States, respecting distilled spirits were very dissimilar. In some of them duties were laid on foreign spirits only, in others, on domestic as well as foreign. The absolute duty in the former instances, and the difference of duty in the latter, was upon an average, considerably less than the present difference in the duties on foreign and home-made spirits. If to this be added the effect of the uniform operation of the existing duties throughout the United States, it is easy to infer that the situation of our own distilleries is in the main much better, as far as they are affected by the laws, than it was previous to the passing of any act of the United States upon the subject. They have, therefore, upon the whole, gained materially under the system which has been pursued by the National Government.

The first law of the United States on this head laid a duty of no more than eight cents per gallon on those of Jamaica proof. The second increased the duty on foreign spirits to twelve cents per gallon of the lowest proof, and by certain gradations to fifteen cents per gallon of Jamaica proof. The last act places the duty at twenty cents per gallon of the lowest proof, and extends it by the like gradations, to twenty-five cents per gallon of Jamaica proof, laying also a duty of eleven cents per gallon on home-made spirits distilled from foreign materials of the lowest proof, with a like gradual extension to fifteen cents per gallon of Jamaica proof; and a duty of nine cents per gallon on home-made spirits distilled from domestic materials of the lowest proof, with the like gradual extension to thirteen cents per gallon of Jamaica proof.

If the transition had been immediate from the first to the last law, it could not have failed to have been considered as a change in favor of our own distilleries, as far as the rate of duty is concerned. The mean duty on foreign spirits by the first law was nine cents, by the last the mean extra duty on foreign spirits is in fact about eleven cents, as it regards spirits distilled from foreign materials, and about thirteen, as it regards spirits distilled from domestic materials. In making this computation it is to be adverted to, that the four first degrees of proof mentioned in the law correspond with the different kinds of spirits usually imported, while the generality of those made in the United States are of the lowest class of proof.

Spirits from domestic materials derived a double advantage from the last law, that is, from the increased rate of duty on foreign imported spirits, and from a higher rate of duty on home-made spirits of foreign materials.

But the intervention of the second law has served to produce in some places a different impression of the business than would have happened without it. By a considerable addition to the duties on foreign spirits, without laying anything on those of home manufacture, it has served to give to the last law the appearance of taking away a part of the advantages previously secured to the domestic distilleries. It seems to have been overlooked, that the second act ought in reality to be reviewed only as an intermediate step to the arrangement finally contemplated by the Legislature; and that, as part of a system, it has upon the whole operated in favor of the national distilleries. The thing to be considered is the substantial existing difference in favor of the home manufacture, as the law now stands.

The advantage, indeed, to the distillation of spirits from the produce of the country arising from the difference between the duties on spirits distilled from foreign and those distilled from domestic materials, is exclusively the work of the last act, and is an advantage which has not been properly appreciated by those distillers of spirits from home produce, who have complained of the law as hurtful to their manufacture.

Causes entirely foreign to the law itself have also assisted in producing misapprehension. The approximation of the price of home-made spirits to that of foreign spirits, which has of late taken place, and which is attributed to the operation of the act in question is in a great degree owing to the circumstances, which have tended to raise the price of molasses in the West India market, and to an extra importation of foreign spirits prior to the first of July last, to avoid the payment of the additional duty which then took place.

It is stated in the petition from Salem, that previous to the last act, the price of domestic to foreign spirits was as 1s. 9d. to 3s. 4d., of the money of Massachusetts, per gallon, and that since that act it has become as 3s. 3d. to 4s. 2d.

It is evident that a rise from 1s. 9d. to 3s. 3d. per gallon, which would be equal to twenty cents, is not to be attributed wholly to a duty of eleven cents. Indeed if there were a concurrence of no other cause, the inference would be very different from that intended to be drawn from the fact, for it would evince a profit gained to the distiller of more than eighty per cent. on the duty.

It is, however, meant to be understood, that this approximation of prices occasions a greater importation and consumption of foreign, and a less consumption of domestic spirits than formerly. How far this may or may not be the case, the Secretary is not now able to say with precision; but no facts have come under his notice officially, which serve to authenticate the suggestion. And it must be considered as possible, that representations of this kind, are rather the effect of apprehension than of experience. It would even be not unnatural, that a considerable enhancement of the prices of the foreign article should have led to a greater consumption of the domestic article, as the cheapest of the two, though dearer itself than formerly.

But while there is ground to believe that the suggestions which have been made on this point, are in many respects inaccurate and misconceived, there are known circumstances, which seem to render advisable, some greater difference between the duties on foreign and on home-made spirits. These circumstances have been noticed in the Report of the Secretary on the subject of manufactures, and an alteration has been proposed by laying two cents in addition upon imported spirits of the lowest proof, with a proportional increase on the higher proofs, and by deducting one cent from the duty on the lowest proof of home-made spirits, with a proportional diminution in respect to the higher proofs.

This alteration would bring the proportion of the duties nearly to the standard, which the petitioner, Hendrick Doyer, who appears likely to be well informed on the subject, represents as the proper one to enable the distillation of geneva to be carried on with the same advantage as before the passing of the act. He observes that the duty on home-made geneva being nine cents, the additional duty on foreign ought to have been twelve cents. By the alteration proposed, the proportion will be as ten to eight, which is little different to that of twelve to nine.

It is worthy of remark, that the same petitioner states, that previous to the passing of the act of which he complains, he "could sell his geneva sixteen and a quarter per cent. under the price of Holland geneva, but that he cannot do it at present, and in future, lower than fourteen per cent." If, as he also states, the quality of his geneva be equal to that of Holland, and if his meaning be as it appears to be, that he can now afford to sell his geneva lower by fourteen per cent. than the geneva of Holland, it will follow that the manufacture of that article is in a very thriving train, even under the present rate of duties. For a difference of fourteen per cent. in the price is capable of giving a decided preference to the sale of the domestic article.

II. It is objected that the duty, by being laid in the first instance upon the distiller, instead of the consumer, makes a larger capital necessary to carry on the business, and in this country, where capitals are not large, puts the national distiller under disadvantages.

But this inconvenience, as far as it has foundation, in the state of things, is essentially obviated by the credits given. Where the duty is payable upon the quantity distilled, a credit is allowed, which cannot be less than six, and may extend to nine months. Where the duty is charged on the capacity of the still, it is payable half yearly. Sufficient time is, therefore, allowed to raise the duty from the sale of the article, which supersedes the necessity of a greater capital. It is well known, that the article is one usually sold for cash or at a short credit. If these observations are not applicable to distilleries in the interior country, the same may be said in a great degree of the objection itself. The course of the business in that quarter, renders a considerable capital less necessary than elsewhere. The produce of the distiller's own farm, or of the neighboring farms, brought to be distilled upon shares or compensations in the article itself, constitute the chief business of the distilleries in the remote parts of the country. In the comparatively few instances, in which they may be prosecuted as a regular business, upon a large scale, by force of capital, the observations which have been made will substantially apply.

The collection of the duty from the distiller has, on the other hand, several advantages. It contributes to equality, by charging the article in the first stage of its progress, which diffuses the duty among all classes alike. It the better secures the collection of the revenue, by confining the responsibility to a smaller number of persons, and simplifying the process. And it avoids the necessity of so great a number of officers as would be required in a more diffuse system of collection, operating immediately upon purchasers and consumers. Besides, that the latter plan would transfer, whatever inconveniencies may be incident to the collection, from a smaller to a greater number of persons.

III. It is alleged that the inspection of the officers is injurious to the business of distilling, by laying open its secrets or mysteries.

Different distillers, there is no doubt, practice in certain respects different methods in the course of their business, and have different degrees of skill. But it may well be doubted whether in a business so old and so much diffused as that of the distillation of spirits, there are at this day secrets of consequence to the possessors.

There will at least be no hazard in taking it for granted, that none such exist in regard to the distillation of rum from molasses or sugar, or of the spirits from grain usually called whiskey, or of brandies from the fruits of this country. The cases in which the allegations are made with most color apply to geneva, and perhaps to certain cordials.

It is probable, that the course of the business might and would always be such, as in fact to involve no inconvenience on this score. But as the contrary is affirmed, and as it is desirable to obviate complaint as far as it can be done, consistently with essential principles and objects, it may not be unadvisable to attempt a remedy.

It is to be presumed, that if any secrets exist, they relate to a primary process, particularly the mixture of the ingredients; this, it is supposable, cannot take a greater time each day, than two hours. If, therefore, the officers of inspection were enjoined to forbear their visits to the part of the distillery commonly made use of for such process, during a space not exceeding two hours in each day to be notified by the distiller, there is ground to conclude that it would obviate the objection.

IV. The regulations for marking of casks and vessels, as well as houses and buildings, also furnish matter of complaint. This complaint, as it regards houses and buildings, has been already adverted to; but there is a light in which it is made that has not yet been taken notice of.

It is said that the requiring the doors of the apartments as well as the outer door of each building to be marked, imposes unnecessary trouble. When it is considered how little trouble or expense attends the execution of this provision, in the first instance, and that the marks once set will endure for a great length of time, the objection to it appears to be without weight.

But the provision, as it relates to the apartments of buildings, has for its immediate object the convenience of the distillers themselves. It is calculated to avoid the very evil of an indiscriminate search of their houses and buildings, by enabling them to designate the particular apartments which are employed for the purposes of their business, and to secure all others from inspection and visitation.

The complaint, as it respects the marking of casks and vessels, has somewhat more foundation. It is represented (and upon careful inquiry appears to be true) that through long-established prejudice, home-made spirits of equal quality with foreign, if known to be home-made, will not command an equal price. This particularly applies to geneva. If the want of a distinction between foreign and home-made spirits were an occasion of fraud upon consumers, by imposing a worse for a better commodity, it would be a reason for continuing it; but as far as such a distinction gives operation to a mere prejudice, favorable to a foreign and injurious to a domestic manufacture, it furnishes a reason for abolishing it.

Though time might be expected to remove the prejudice, the progress of the domestic manufacture, in the interval, might be materially checked. It appears, therefore, expedient to remove this ground of complaint by authorizing the same marks and certificates, both for foreign and for home-made geneva. Perhaps, indeed, it may not be unadvisable to vest somewhere a discretionary power to regulate the forms of certificates, which are to accompany, and the particular marks, which are to be set upon casks and vessels containing spirits, generally, as may be found convenient in practice. Another source of objection with regard to the marking of casks is, that there is a general prohibition against defacing or altering the marks, and a penalty upon doing it, which prevents the using of the same casks more than once, and occasions waste, loss, and embarrassment.

It is conceived, that this prohibition does not extend to the effacing of old marks and placing of new ones by the officers of the revenue, or in their presence and by their authority. But as real inconveniencies would attend a contrary construction, and there is some room for question, it appears desirable that all doubt should be removed, by an explicit provision to enable the officer to efface old marks and substitute new ones, when casks have been emptied of their former contents, and are wanted for new use.

V. The requisition to keep an account from day to day of the quantity of spirits distilled is represented both as a hardship and impossible to be complied with. But the Secretary is unable to perceive that it can justly be viewed either in the one or in the other light. The trouble of setting down in the evening the work of the day, in a book prepared for and furnished to the party, must be inconsiderable, and the doing of it would even conduce to accuracy in business.

The idea of impracticability must have arisen from some misconception. It seems to involve a supposition that something is required different from the truth of the fact. Spirits distilled are usually distinguished into high wines, proof spirits, and low wines. It is certainly possible to express each day the quantity of each kind produced, and where one kind is converted into another, to explain it by brief notes, showing in proper columns the results in those kinds of spirits which are ultimately prepared for sale.

A revision is now making of the forms at first transmitted, and it is not doubted that it will be easy to obviate the objection of impracticability. On full reflection the Secretary is of opinion, that the requisition in this respect is a reasonable one, and that it is of importance to the due collection of the revenue, especially in those cases, where, by the alternative allowed in favor of country distilleries, the oath of a party is the only evidence of the quantity produced. It is useful in every such case to give the utmost possible precision to the object which is to be attested.

VII. It is alleged as a hardship, that distillers are held responsible for the duties on spirits which are exported, till certain things difficult to be performed, are done, in order to entitle the exporter to the drawback.

This is a misapprehension. The drawback is at all events to be paid in six months, which is as early as the duty can become payable, and frequently earlier than it does become payable. And the Government relies on the bond of the exporter for a fulfilment of the conditions upon which the drawback is allowed. An explanation to the several collectors of this point, which has taken place since the complaint appeared, will have removed the cause it. The same explanation will obviate another objection founded on the supposition that the bond of the distiller and that of the exporter are for a like purpose. The latter is merely to secure the landing of the goods in a foreign country, and will often continue depending after every thing relative to duty and drawback has been liquidated and finished.

VII. It is an article of complaint that no drawback is allowed in case of shipwreck when spirits are sent from one port to another in the United States. There does not occur any objection to a provision for making an allowance of that kind, which would tend to alleviate misfortune and give satisfaction.

VIII. The necessity of twenty-four hours' notice, in order to the benefit of drawback on the exportation of spirits, and the prohibition to remove them from a distillery after sun-set, except in the presence of an officer, are represented as embarrassments to business.

The length of notice required appears greater than is necessary. It is not perceived, that any inconvenience could arise, from reducing the time to six hours. But it is not conceived to be necessary or expedient to make an alteration in the last mentioned particular. The prohibition is of real consequence to the security of the revenue. The course of business will readily adapt itself to it, and the presence of an officer in extraordinary cases will afford due accommodation.

IX. It is stated as a hardship, that there is no allowance for leakage and wastage in the case of spirits shipped from one State to another. The law for the collection of the duties on imports and tonnage allows two per cent. for leakage on spirits imported. A similar allowance on home-made spirits at the distillery, does not appear less proper.

X. It is mentioned as a grievance, that distillers are required to give bond with surety for the amount of the duties, and that the sufficiency of the surety is made to depend on the discretion of the chief officer of inspection. The requiring of sureties can be no more a hardship on distillers than on importing merchants, and every other person to whom the public afford a credit. It is a natural consequence of the credit allowed; and a very reasonable condition of the indulgence which, without this precaution, might be imprudent, and injurious to the United States.

The party has his option to avoid it by prompt payment of the duty, and is even entitled to an abatement, which may be considered as a premium if he elects to do so.

As to the second point, if sureties are to be given, there must be some person on the part of the Government to judge of their sufficiency, otherwise the thing itself would be nugatory; and the discretion cannot be vested more conveniently for the party than in the chief officer of inspection for the survey. A view has now been taken of most, if not of all, the objections of a general nature, which have appeared. Some few of a local complexion remain to be attended to.

The representation, signed Edward Cook, chairman, as on behalf of the four most western counties of Pennsylvania, states, that the distance of that part of the country from a market for its produce leads to a necessity of distilling the grain, which is raised, as a principal dependence of its inhabitants; which circumstance and the scarcity of cash combine to render the tax in question unequal, oppressive, and particularly distressing to them.

As to the circumstance of equality, it may safely be affirmed to be impracticable to devise a tax which shall operate with exact equality upon every part of the community. Local and other circumstances will inevitably create disparities more or less great. Taxes on consumable articles have, upon the whole, better pretensions to equality than any other. If some of them fall more heavily on particular parts of the community, others of them are chiefly borne by other parts. And the result is an equalization of the burden as far as it is attainable. Of this class of taxes it is not easy to conceive one which can operate with greater equality than a tax on distilled spirits. There appears to be no article, as far as the information of the Secretary goes, which is an object of more equal consumption throughout the United States.

In particular districts a greater use of cider may occasion a smaller consumption of spirits; but it will not be found on a close examination that it makes a material difference. A greater or less use of ardent spirits, as far as it exists, seems to depend more on relative habits of sobriety or intemperance than on any other cause.

As far as habits of less moderation, in the use of distilled spirits, should produce inequality anywhere, it would certainly not be a reason with the Legislature either to repeal or lessen a tax which, by rendering the article dearer, might tend to restrain too free an indulgence of such habits.

It is certainly not obvious how this tax can operate particularly unequal upon the part of the country in question. As a general rule it is a true one, that duties on articles of consumption fall on the consumers, by being added to the price of the commodity. This is illustrated in the present instance by facts. Previous to the law laying a duty on home-made spirits the price of whiskey was about thirty-eight cents; it is now about fifty-six cents. Other causes may have contributed in some degree to this effect, but it is evidently to be ascribed chiefly to the duty.

Unless, therefore, the inhabitants of the countries, which have been mentioned are greater consumers of spirits, than those of other parts of the country, they cannot pay a greater proportion of the tax. If they are, it is their interest to become less so. It depends on themselves by diminishing the consumption to restore equality.

The argument, that they are obliged to convert their grain into spirits in order to transportation to distant markets, does not prove the point alleged. The duty on all they send to those markets will be paid by the purchasers. They will still pay only upon their own consumption.

As far as an advance is laid upon the duty, or as far as the difference of duty between whiskey and other spirits tend to favor a greater consumption of the latter, they as greater manufacturers of the article, supposing this fact to be as stated, will be proportionably benefited.

The duty on home-made spirits from domestic materials, if paid by the gallon, is nine cents. From the communications which have been received, since the passing of the act, it appears that paying the rate annexed to the capacity of the still, and using great diligence, the duty may be in fact reduced to six cents per gallon. Let the average be taken at seven and a half cents, which is probably higher than is really paid.

Generally speaking, then, for every gallon of whiskey which is consumed, the consumer may be supposed to pay seven and a half cents; but for every gallon of spirits distilled from foreign materials, the consumer pays at least eleven cents, and for every gallon of foreign spirits at least twenty cents. The consumer, therefore, of foreign spirits pays nearly three times the duty, and the consumer of home-made spirits from foreign materials nearly fifty per cent. more duty, on the same quantity, than the consumer of spirits from domestic materials, exclusive of the greater price in both cases, which is an additional charge upon each of the two first mentioned classes of consumers.

When it is considered that 8-21 parts of the whole quantity of spirits consumed in the United States are foreign, and 7-21 parts are of foreign materials, and that the inhabitants of the Atlantic and Midland countries are the principal consumers of these more highly taxed articles, it cannot be inferred that the tax under consideration bears particularly hard on the inhabitants of the Western country.

This may serve as an exemplification of a general proposition of material consequence, namely, that, if the former description of citizens are able from situation to obtain more for their produce than the latter, they contribute proportionally more to the revenue. Numerous other examples in the confirmation of this might be adduced.

As to the circumstance of scarcity of money, as far as it can be supposed to have foundation, it is as much an objection to any other tax as the one in question. The weight of the tax is not certainly such as to involve any peculiar difficulty. It is impossible to conceive that nine cents per gallon on distilled spirits, which is stating it at the highest, can, from the magnitude of the tax, distress any part of the country, which has an ability to pay taxes at all, enjoying too the unexampled advantage of a total exemption from taxes on houses, lands, or stock.

The population of the United States being about four millions of persons, and the quantity of spirits annually consumed between ten and eleven millions of gallons, the yearly proportion to each family, if consisting of six persons, which is a full ratio, would be about sixteen gallons, the duty upon which would be less than one dollar and a half. The citizen who is able to maintain a family, and who is the owner or occupier of a farm, cannot feel any inconvenience from so light a contribution, and the industrious poor, whether artisans or laborers, are usually allowed spirits or an equivalent in addition to their wages.

The Secretary has no evidence to satisfy his mind, that a real scarcity of money will be found, on experiment, a serious impediment to the payment of the tax anywhere. In the quarter where this complaint has particularly prevailed, the expenditures for the defence of the frontier would seem alone sufficient to obviate it. To this it is answered, that the contractors for the supply of the Army operate with goods and not with money. But this still tends to keep at home whatever money finds its way there. Nor is it a fact, if the information of the Secretary be not materially erroneous, that the purchases of the contractors of flour, meat, &c., are wholly with goods. But if they were, the Secretary can aver, that more money has, in the course of the last year, been sent into the Western country from the Treasury, in specie, and bank bills which answer the same purpose, for the pay of the troops and militia, and for Quartermaster's supplies, than the whole amount of the tax in the four Western counties of Pennsylvania and the district of Kentucky is likely to equal in four or five years. Similar remittances are likely to be made in future.

Hence the Government itself furnishes, and in all probability will continue to furnish, the means of paying its own demands, with a surplus which will sensibly foster the industry of the parties concerned, if they avail themselves of it, under the guidance of a spirit of economy and exertion.

Whether there be no part of the United States, in which the objection of want of money may truly exist, in a degree to render the payment of the duty seriously distressing to the inhabitants, the Secretary is not able to pronounce. He can only express his own doubt, of the fact, and refer the matter to such information as the members of any district so situated, may have it in their power to offer to the Legislative body.

Spirits, Foreign and Domestic.

Should the case appear to exist, it would involve the necessity of a measure in the abstract very ineligible, that is, the receipt of the duty in the article itself.

If an alternative of this sort were to be allowed, it would be proper to make it the duty of the party paying, to deliver the article at the place in each county where the office of inspection is kept, and to regulate the price according to such standard, as would induce a preference of paying in cash, except from a real impracticability of obtaining it.

In regard to the petition from the district of Kentucky, after what has been said with reference to other applications, it can only be necessary to observe that the exemption which is sought by that petition, is rendered impracticable by an express provision of the Constitution, which declares, that all duties, imposts and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

In the course of the foregoing examination of the objections which have been made to the law, some alterations have been submitted for the purpose of removing a part of them. The Secretary will now proceed to submit such farther alterations as appear to him advisable, arising either from the suggestions of the officers of the revenue, or from his own reflections.

I. It appears expedient to alter the distinction respecting distilleries from domestic materials in cities, towns and villages, so as to confine it to one or more stills worked at the same distillery, the capacity or capacities of which together do not fall short of four hundred gallons.

The effectual execution of the present provisions respecting distilleries from home materials in cities, towns, and villages, would occasion an inconvenient multiplication of officers, and, would in too great a degree exhaust the product of the duty in the expense of collection. It is also probable that the alteration suggested would also conduce to public satisfaction.

II. The present provisions concerning the entering of stills are found by experience not to be adequate, and in some instances not convenient.

It appears advisable, that there shall be one office of inspection for each county, with authority to the supervisor to establish more than one, if he shall judge it necessary for the accommodation of the inhabitants; and that every distiller or person having or keeping a still, shall be required to make entry of the same, at some office of inspection for the county, within a certain determinate period in each year. It will be proper also to enjoin upon every person, who, residing within the county, shall procure a still, or who removing into a county, shall bring into it a still, within twenty days after such procuring or removal, and before he or she begins to use the still, to make entry at the office of inspection. Every entry, besides describing the still, should specify in whose possession it is, and the purpose for which it is intended, as whether for sale or for use in distilling; and in the case of a removal of the person from another place into the county, shall specify the place from which the still shall have been brought. A forfeiture of the still ought in every case in which an entry is required, to attend an omission to enter.

This regulation, by simplifying the business of entering stills, would render it easier to comprehend and comply with what is required, would furnish the officers with a better rule for ascertaining delinquencies, and, by avoiding to them a considerable degree of unnecessary trouble, will facilitate the retaining of proper characters in the offices of collectors.

III. It is represented that difficulties have in some instances arisen concerning the persons responsible for the duty. The apparent, not being always the real proprietor, an opportunity for collusion is afforded; and without collusion the uncertainty is stated as a source of embarrassment.

It also sometimes happens, that certain itinerant persons without property, complying with the preliminary requisitions of the law as to entry, &c., erect and work stills for a time, and before a half-yearly period of payment arrives, remove and evade the duty.

It would tend to remedy these inconveniences, if possessors and proprietors of stills were made jointly and severally liable, and if the duty were made a specific lien on the still itself; if also the proprietor of the land, upon which any still may be worked should be made answerable for the duty, except where it is worked by a lawful and bona fide tenant of the land of an estate, not less than for a term of one year, or unless such proprietor can make it appear, that the possessor of the still was during the whole time, without his privity or connivance, an intruder or trespasser on the land; and if, in the last place, any distiller about to remove from the division in which he is, should be required previous to such removal to pay the tax for the year, deducting any prior payments, or give bond with approved surety, conditioned for the payment of the full sum for which he or she should be legally accountable to the end of the year, to the collector of the division to which the removal shall be, rendering proof thereof under the hand of the said collector, within six months after the expiration of the year.

As well with a view to the forfeiture of the stills for non-entry, as to give effect to a specific lien of the duty (if either or both of these provisions should be deemed eligible) it will be necessary to enjoin it upon the officers of the revenue to identify by proper marks the several stills which shall have been entered with them.

IV. The exemptions granted to stills of the capacity of fifty gallons and under, by the 36th section of the law, appear from experience to require revision. Tending to produce inequality, as well as to frustrate the revenue, they have excited complaint. It appears at least advisable, that the obligation to enter, as connected with that of paying duty, should extend to stills of all dimensions, and that it should be enforced in every case by the same penalty.

V. The 28th section of the act makes provision for the seizure of spirits unaccompanied with marks and certificates in the cases in which they are required; but as they are required only in certain cases, and there is no method of distinguishing the spirits, in respect to which they are necessary, from those in respect to which they are not necessary, the provision becomes nugatory, because an attempt to enforce it would be oppressive. Hence not only a great security for the due execution of the law is lost, but seizures very distressing to unoffending individuals must happen, notwithstanding great precaution to avoid them.

It would be, in the opinion of the Secretary, of great importance to provide, that all spirits whatsoever in casks or vessels of the capacity of twenty gallons and upwards should be marked and certified, on pain of seizure and forfeiture, making it the duty of the officers to furnish the requisite certificates gratis to distillers and dealers in all cases, in which the law shall have been complied with.

In those cases in which an occasional recurrence to the officers for certificates might be inconvenient, blanks may be furnished, to be accounted for. And it may be left to the parties themselves, in the like cases, to mark their own casks or vessels, in some simple manner, to be defined in the law. These cases may be designated generally. They will principally relate to dealers, who, in the course of their business, draw off spirits from larger to smaller casks; and to distillers, who pay according to the capacities of their stills.

As a part of a regulation of this sort, it will be necessary to require, that within a certain period, sufficiently long to admit of time to know and comply with the provision, entry shall be made, by all dealers and distillers, of all spirits in their respective possessions, which shall not have been previously marked and certified according to law, in order that they may be marked and certified as old stock.

The regulations here proposed, though productive of some trouble and inconvenience in the outset, will be afterwards a security, both to individuals and to the revenue.

VI. At present spirits may not be imported from abroad in casks of less capacity than fifty gallons. The size of these casks is smaller than is desirable, so far as the security of the revenue is concerned; and there has not occurred any good objection to confining the importation to larger casks, that is to say, to casks of not less than ninety gallons. Certainly, as far as respects rum from the West Indies, it may be done without inconvenience, being conformable to the general course of business. The result of examination is, that the exception as to this particular in favor of gin may be abolished. Should any alteration on this subject take place, it ought not to begin to operate till after the expiration of the year.

VII. There is ground to suppose that the allowance of drawback, without any limitation as to quantity, has been abused. It is submitted, that none be made on any less quantity than one hundred and fifty gallons.

VIII. There is danger that facility may be given to illicit importations, by making use of casks which have been once regularly marked, and the certificates which have been issued with them, to cover other spirits than those originally contained in such casks. Appearances which countenance suspicion on this point, have been the subjects of representation from several quarters.

The danger may be obviated, by prohibiting the importation in such marked casks, on pain of forfeiture both of the spirits and of any ship or vessel in which they may be brought. A prohibition of this sort does not appear liable to any good objection.

IX. The duty of sixty cents per gallon of the capacity of a still, was founded upon a computation that a still, of any given dimensions, worked four months in the year—which is the usual period of country distillation—would yield a quantity of spirits which, at the rate of nine cents per gallon, would correspond with sixty cents per gallon of the capacity of the still. It will deserve consideration, whether it will not be expedient to give an option to country distillers, at the annual entry of their stills, to take out a license for any portion of the year which they may respectively think fit, and to pay at the rate of twelve and a half cents per gallon of the capacity per month, during such period. This to stand in lieu of the alternative of paying by the gallon, distilled. It would obviate in this case the necessity of accounting upon oath, and would leave it in the power of each distiller to cover the precise time he meant to work his still, with a license, and to pay for that time only. A strict prohibition to distil at any other time than that for which the license was given, would be of course necessary to accompany the regulation, as far as regarded any such licensed distiller.

The only remaining points which have occurred, a proper to be submitted to the consideration of the Legislature, respect the officers of the revenue.

It is represented, that in some instances, from the ill humor of individuals, the officers have experienced much embarrassment, in respect to the filling of stills with water, to ascertain their capacity—which, upon examination, is found the most simple and practicable mode. The proprietors have, in some instances, not only refused to aid the officers, but have even put out of their way the means by which the filling might be conveniently accomplished.

It would conduce to the easy execution of the law, and to the very important purpose of retaining and procuring respectable characters as collectors, if the proprietors and possessors of stills were required to aid them in the execution of this part of their duty, or to pay a certain sum as a compensation for the doing of it.

The limits assigned in the law respecting compensations, are found, in practice, essentially inadequate to the object.

This is so far the case, that it becomes the duty of the Secretary to state that greater latitude in this particular is indispensable to the effectual execution of the law.

In the most productive divisions, the commissions of the collectors afford but a moderate compensation. In the greatest part of them, the compensation is glaringly disproportioned to the service; in many of them it falls materially short of the expense of the officer.

It is believed, that in no country whatever has the collection of a similar duty been effected within the limit assigned. Applying in the United States to a single article only, and yielding consequently a less total product than where many articles are comprehended, the expense of collection must of necessity be proportionally greater.

It appears to the Secretary, that seven and a half per cent. of the total product of the duties on distilled spirits, foreign as well as domestic, and not less, will suffice to defray the compensations to officers, and other expenses incidental to the collection of the duty. This is to be understood as supplemental to the present custom-house expenses.

It is unnecessary to urge to the House of Representatives, how essential it must be to the execution of the law, in a manner effectual to the purposes of the Government and satisfactory to the community, to secure, by competent though moderate rewards, the diligent services of respectable and trustworthy characters.

All which is humbly submitted.

ALEXANDER HAMILTON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

REPORT ON THE SINKING FUND.

IN SENATE, NOVEMBER 7, 1791.

The Vice President of the United States and President of the Senate, the Chief Justice, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Attorney General, respectfully report to the Congress of the United States of America—

That, pursuant to the act entitled "An act making provision for the reduction of the Public Debt," and in conformity to two resolutions agreed upon by them, one on the 15th day of January, and another on the 15th of August last, and severally approved by the President of the United States they have caused purchases of the said Debt to be made, through the agency, respectively, of Samuel Meredith, Treasurer of the United States; William Seton, Cashier of the Bank of New York; Benjamin Lincoln, Collector of the District of Boston and Charlestown; and William Heth, Collector of the District of Bermuda Hundred, to the amount of $852,677 46, for which there have been paid $540,924 14, in specie, as will more particularly appear by the several documents (Nos. 1 to 8) herewith submitted as part of this report, and which specify the places where, the times when, the prices at which, and the persons of whom the said purchases have been made.

That, though the statements of William Seton and Benjamin Lincoln have not yet passed through the forms of settlement, it appears, by the document No. 8, being a certified transcript from the books of the Treasury, that the amount of the stock by them respectively reported to have been purchased has been duly transferred to the said books.

That the purchases now and heretofore reported amount, in the whole, to $1,131,364 76, for which there have been paid $699,163 38, in specie.
Signed in behalf of the Board,

JOHN ADAMS.

ADDITIONAL SUPPLIES FOR 1792.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 16, 1792.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY, pursuant to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 8th instant directing the said Secretary to report to the House his opinion of the best mode of raising the additional supplies requisite for the ensuing year, respectfully submits the following Report :

The sum which is estimated to be necessary for carrying into effect the purposes of the act for making further and more effectual provision for the protection of the frontiers of the United States, beyond the provision made by the act making appropriations for the support of Government, for the year 1792, is $675,950 08. The returns which have been received at the Treasury subsequent to the Secretary's Report of the 23d of January last, (among which are those of some principal ports,) afford satisfactory ground of assurance that the quarter ending the last of December was considerably more productive than it was supposed likely to prove; authorizing a reliance that the revenues to the end of the year 1791 will yield a surplus of $150,000, which may be applied in part of the sum of $675,950 08, above stated to be necessary. Provision remains to be made for the residue of this sum, viz: $525,950 08. Three expedients occur to the option of the Government for providing this sum: one, to dispose of the interest to which the United States are entitled in the Bank of the United States. This, at the present market price of Bank stock, would yield a clear gain to the Government much more than adequate to the sum required. Another, to borrow the money, upon an establishment of funds, either merely commensurate with the interest to be paid, or affording a surplus which will discharge the principal by instalments within a short term. The third is, to raise the amount by taxes. The first of these three expedients appears to the Secretary altogether inadvisable. First. It is his present opinion that it will be found, in various respects, permanently the interest of the United States to retain the interest to which they are entitled in the Bank; but, secondly, if this opinion should not be well founded, it would be improvident to dispose of it at the present juncture, since, upon a comprehensive view of the subject, it can hardly admit of a doubt that its future value, at a period not very distant, will be considerably greater than its present, while the Government will enjoy the benefit of whatever dividends shall be declared in the interval; and, thirdly, whether it shall be deemed proper to retain or dispose of this interest the most useful application of the proceeds will be as a fund for extinguishing the Public Debt. A necessity of applying it to any different object, if it should be found to exist, would be matter of serious regret. The second expedient would, in the judgment of the Secretary, be preferable to the first; for this, the following reason, if there were no other, is presumed to be conclusive, viz: that the probable increase of the value of the stock may itself be estimated as a considerable, if not a sufficient fund, for the repayment of the sum which might be borrowed. If the measure of a Loan should be thought eligible, it is submitted as most advisable to accompany it with a provision sufficient not only to pay the interest, but to discharge the principal within a short period. This will at least mitigate the inconvenience of making an addition to the Public Debt. But the result of mature reflection is, in the mind of the Secretary, a strong conviction that the last of the three expedients which have been mentioned is to be preferred to either of the other two. Nothing can more interest the national credit and prosperity than a constant and systematic attention to husband all the means previously possessed for extinguishing the present Debt, and to avoid, as much as possible, the incurring of any new debt. Necessity alone, therefore, can justify the application of any of the public property, other than the annual revenues, to the current service, to the temporary and casual exigencies of the country, or the contracting of an additional debt, by loans, to provide for those exigencies. Great emergencies, indeed, might exist in which loans would be indispensable. But the occasions which will justify them must be truly of that description. The present is not of such a nature; the sum to be provided is not of magnitude enough to furnish the plea of necessity. Taxes are never welcome to a community; they seldom fail to excite uneasy sensations, more or less extensive. Hence a too strong propensity in the Governments of nations to anticipate and mortgage the resources of posterity, rather than encounter the inconveniences of a present increase of taxes. But this policy, when not dictated by very peculiar circumstances, is of the worst kind. Its obvious tendency is, by enhancing the permanent burdens of the people, to produce lasting distress, and its natural issue is in national bankruptcy. It will be happy if the councils of this country, sanctioned by the voice of an enlightened community, shall be able to pursue a different course. Yielding to this impression, the Secretary proceeds to state, for the consideration of the House, the objects which have occurred to him as most proper to be resorted to for raising the requisite sum by taxes. From the most careful view which he is able to take of all the circumstances that, at the present juncture, naturally enter into consideration, he is led to conclude that the most eligible mode in which the necessary provision can at this time be made is by some additional duties on imported articles. This conclusion is made with reluctance, for reasons which were noticed upon a former occasion, and from the reflection that frequent and unexpected alterations in the rates of duties, on the objects of trade, by inducing uncertainty in mercantile speculations and calculations, are really injurious to commerce and hurtful to the interests of those who carry it on. The stability of the duties to be paid by the merchants is in fact of more consequence to them than their quantum, if within reasonable bounds. It were, therefore, much to have been wished that so early a resort to new demands on that class of citizens could have been avoided, and especially that they could have been deferred until a general tariff could have been maturely digested upon principles which might with propriety render it essentially stationary. But while there are these motives to regret, there are others of a consoling tendency, some of which indicate that an augmentation of duties, at the present juncture, may have the effect of lessening some public evils and producing some public benefits. It is a pleasing fact, if the information of the Secretary be not very erroneous, that the improved state of the credit of this country enables our merchants to procure the supplies which they import from abroad upon much more cheap and advantageous terms than heretofore—a circumstance which must alleviate to them the pressure of somewhat higher rates of duty, and must contribute, at the same time, to reconcile them to burdens which, being connected with an efficacious discharge of the duty of Government, are of a nature to give solidity and permanency to the advantages they enjoy under it. It is certain, also, that a spirit of manufacturing prevails at this time in a greater degree than it has done at any antecedent period; and, as far as an increase of duties shall tend to second and aid this spirit, they will serve to promote essentially the industry, the wealth, the strength, the independence, and the substantial prosperity of the country. The returns for one year ending with the 30th of September last, (an abstract of which is in preparation, to be communicated to the Legislature,) evince a much increased importation during that year, greater, far, than can be referred to a naturally increasing demand from the progress of population, and announce a probability of a more than proportional increase of consumption, there being no appearance of an extraordinary abundance of goods in the market. If, happily, an extension of the duties shall operate as a restraint upon excessive consumption, it will be a salutary mean of preserving the community from future embarrassment, public and private. But if this should not be the case, it is at least prudent in the Government to extract from it the resources necessary for current exigencies, rather than postpone the burden to a period when that very circumstance may cause it to be more grievously felt. These different considerations unite, with others which will suggest themselves, to induce, in the present state of things, a preference of taxes on imported articles, to any other mode of raising the sum required. It is therefore respectfully submitted that the existing duties on the articles hereafter enumerated be repealed, and that, in place of them, the following be laid, viz:

ARTICLES AD VALOREM.

China wares; looking-glass, window, and other glass, and all manufactures of glass, black quart bottles excepted; muskets; pistols; swords, cutlasses, hangers, and other fire and side arms; starch; hair powder; wafers; and glue—15 per cent. ad valorem.

Cast, slit, and rolled iron, and generally all manufactures of iron, steel, tin, pewter, copper, brass, or of which either of these metals is the article of chief value, not being otherwise particularly enumerated; cabinet wares; leather, tanned and tawed, and all manufactures of leather, or of which leather is the article of chief value, not being otherwise particularly enumerated; medicinal drugs, except those commonly used in dyeing; hats, caps, and bonnets, of every sort; gloves and mittens; stockings; millinery, ready made; artificial flowers, feathers, and other ornaments for women's head dresses; fans; dolls, dressed and undressed; toys; buttons of every kind; carpets and carpeting, mats, and floor cloths; sail cloth; sheathing and cartridge paper; all powders, pastes, balls, balsams, ointments, oils, waters, washes, tinctures, essences, liquors, or other preparation or composition, commonly called sweet-scents, odors, perfumes, or cosmetics; all dentrifice, powders, tinctures, preparations, or compositions whatsoever, for the teeth or gums; printed books, except those specially imported for a college, academy, or other public or incorporated seminary of learning or institution, which shall be wholly exempted from duty—10 per cent. ad valorem.

The foregoing duties to be permanently established, and to be appropriated, in the first place to the payment of the interest of the Public Debt; in the second, to such other grants and appropriations as have been heretofore made: and, in the third, to the purposes of the act for making further and more effectual provision for the protection of the frontiers of the United States. An addition of two and a half per cent. ad valorem to be made to the duty on all goods heretofore rated at five per cent. ad valorem. This addition to be temporary, and accordingly to be so established as that it shall not continue longer than till the present Indian war shall terminate, and the expenses of carrying it on shall have been defrayed, which will of course include the reimbursement of any sums that may have been borrowed by way of anticipation of the product of the duties. It is represented that the present duty on salt operates unequally, from the considerable difference in weight, in proportion to quantity of different kinds of salt, a bushel weighing from about fifty-six to upward of eighty weight. It would have an equalizing effect, if the bushel were defined by weight; and, if fifty-six pounds were taken as the standard, a valuable accession to the revenue would result. This regulation is, therefore, submitted as a resource upon the present occasion, the rate of duty to remain as it is. It will be a reasonable accommodation to trade, if it is made a part of this arrangement, to extend the credit for the duty on salt to a longer term. It is an article which, from the circumstances of its importation, frequently lies on hand for a considerable time; and, in relation to the fisheries, is usually sold upon a credit of several months.

Some remarks may be proper in regard to the proposed duties. Those on spirits and wines may appear high; they are doubtless considerable; but there are precedents elsewhere of much higher duties on the same articles. And it is certainly in every view justifiable to make a free use of them for the purpose of revenue. Wines, generally speaking, are the luxury of classes of the community who can afford to pay a considerable duty upon them. It has appeared advisable to adhere to the idea of a specific duty, per quantity, on all the species of wines in most common consumption in the country, and those most susceptible of precise designation, as affording greatest certainty to the revenue, and to adopt a general ad valorem rate for other kinds proportioned to the specific duties; this rate is forty per cent. The distinction has proceeded from the difficulty of a precise enumeration of all the other kinds of wine which are and may be imported, and of such an adjustment of specific rates as will bear some reasonable proportion to the value of the article. The present lowest rate of duty on wines amounts to two hundred and three hundred per cent. on the value of certain kinds, which may be considered as equivalent to a prohibition. While, therefore, ideas of proportion will be better consulted than heretofore, by the proposed arrangement, it is probable that the revenue will be benefited, rather than injured, by a reduction of the duties on low-priced wines. The considerations which render ardent spirits a proper object of high duties have been repeatedly dwelt upon. It may be added, that it is a familiar and a just remark that the peculiarly low price of ardent spirits in this country is a great source of intemperance. To bring the price of the article more nearly to a level with the price of it in other markets, by an increase of duty, while it will contribute to the advancement of the revenue, cannot but prove, in other respects, a public benefit. The rates proposed will be still moderate, compared with examples in other countries; and the article is of a nature to enable the importer, without difficulty, to transfer the duty to the consumer. A discrimination is suggested in respect to duties on spirits distilled from grain. To this there have been two inducements: one, that the difference in the duty is conformable to the difference between the cost of the grain spirits usually imported and that of West India rum; another, that it is, in a particular manner, the interest of the United States to favor the distillation of its own grain in competition with foreign spirits from the same material. In the second division of spirits, the first class of proof is dropped, because none of it comes from the West Indies, and because any other spirits usually imported, which may be of so low a proof, are higher priced even than some of the higher proofs of West India spirits. The dropping of that class of proof, therefore, in this case is favorable to the revenue and favorable to equality. Several of the other specific duties which are proposed, besides the inducements to them as items of revenue, are strongly recommended by considerations which have been stated in the Report of the Secretary on the subject of manufactures. The same report states inducements to a fifteen per cent. duty on some of the articles which are mentioned as proper to be comprised under that rate. With regard to china and glass, there are two weighty reasons for a comparatively high duty upon them. The use of them is very limited, except by the wealthier classes; and both their bulk and liability to damage in transportation are great securities against evasions of the revenue. It will, however, merit consideration whether, for the accommodation of importers, a longer term of credit ought not to be allowed on these articles. A duty of two cents per pound on cocoa is less, in proportion to the value, than the present duty on coffee; as an extensive article of consumption, it is a productive one of revenue. The duty on playing cards can give rise to no question except as to practicability of a safe collection. In order to this, it will be proper to superadd certain precautions, which will readily occur in regulating the details of a bill for the purpose. A similar attention will be requisite in regard to the duties on wines. The employment of marks and certificates may advantageously be extended to this article. The rate of ten per cent. ad valorem, it is hoped will not be deemed immoderate in relation to the articles to which it is proposed to apply it. It is difficult to assign rules for what ought to be considered as a just standard. But, after the best consideration which the Secretary has been able to bestow upon it, he cannot discover that any real inconvenience is likely permanently to result from the extension of that rate to the cases proposed. The addition of two and a half per cent. to the duty on the mass of articles now rated at five will constitute an important, though not an excessive augmentation. Nevertheless, it is proposed that it shall be only temporary; and there is reasonable ground of expectation that the cause for having recourse to it will not be of very long continuance. It will not have escaped the observation of the House that the duties which were suggested in the Secretary's report on that subject, as encouragements to manufactures, are for the most part included among the objects of this report. It may tend to avoid future embarrassment if such abatements and drawbacks as shall be deemed expedient, with a view to promoting manufactures, shall accompany the establishment and appropriation of whatever further duties may be laid for the object in contemplation. And it may be found convenient to qualify the appropriation of the surplus which is to be applied to that object, so as to let in such other appropriations during the session as occurrences may suggest. An estimate of the additional revenue which may be expected from the proposed duties is subjoined. It will occur to the House that the credit allowed for the duties will require an anticipation of their product by a temporary loan, for which provision in the law will be requisite. All which is humbly submitted.

ALEXANDER HAMILTON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

DEFEAT OF GENERAL ST. OLAIR.

Mr. FITZSIMONS, from the committee appointed to inquire into the causes of the failure of the late expedition under Major General St. Clair, reported that the committee had proceeded to examine all the papers furnished by the Executive Department relative thereto, sundry papers and accounts furnished by the Treasury and War Departments, with explanations of the same by the Heads of those Departments in person, to hear the testimony of witnesses upon oath, and written remarks by General St. Clair, upon the facts established by the whole evidence; and that, as the result of their inquiries, the committee had agreed to the following Report:

The contract for the supplies of the Army on the route from Fort Pitt, was made by Theodosius Fowler, with the Secretary of the Treasury, and bears date the 28th day of October, 1790; that, at the same time, a bond, in the penalty of one hundred thousand dollars, with Walter Livingston and John Cochran securities thereto, was entered into for the due execution of the contract; that on the 3d day of January, 1791, the contract was wholly transferred from the said Fowler to William Duer, a copy of which transfer was lodged in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury; that, by Letter from the Secretary of War, bearing date the 25th of February, 1791, addressed to William Duer, it appears that he was considered as the contractor; that no correspondence appears to have taken place subsequently to that time between Theodosius Fowler and either the Treasury or War Departments; that on the 6th day of March, 1791, a contract was entered into by William Duer with the Secretary of War for supplying the troops with provisions until their arrival at Fort Pitt; and at Fort Pitt a bond was at the same time entered into by the said William Duer for the due execution of the said contract, in the penalty of four thousand dollars, without any security whatsoever; that the act making provision for the defence of the frontiers received the signature of the President of the United States the 3d of March, 1791; that General St. Clair was appointed Commander-in-Chief of the Army destined for the expedition on the 4th day of the same month, and on the 28th left Philadelphia, for Fort Pitt, at which place he arrived the 16th day of April, and from thence proceeded to Lexington, and from thence to Fort Washington, where he arrived on the 15th day of May.

At the time of the arrival of the General at Fort Washington, the garrison there consisted of 75 non-commissioned officers and privates fit for duty; the garrison at Fort Harmar, of 45; at Fort Steuben, of 61; at Fort Knox, of 83; and on the 15th day of July, the whole of the first United States regiment, amounting to 299 non-commissioned officers and privates, arrived at Fort Washington, under orders from the Commander-in-Chief. General Butler was appointed the second in command in the month of March, and immediately proceeded to make the necessary arrangements for the recruiting service; that he arrived in Baltimore, in the State of Maryland, the 20th of April, and continued there till the 30th of the same month; that he arrived at Carlisle, in the State of Pennsylvania, on the 9th of May; and at Fort Pitt on the 22d of the same month. It appears that no moneys for purchasing supplies were furnished at Carlisle, which was the place of rendezvous for the enlisted soldiery, on the 9th of May; and that Mr. Smith, agent for the contractor, was actively engaged in furnishing supplies for the troops, on credit.

It appears, by letters from John Kean, another of the contractor's agents, that no moneys had been received by him on the 8th of May; and it appears that on the 23d of March, there was advanced to William Duer, upon the last-mentioned contract, from the Treasury, the sum of fifteen thousand dollars; that there was advanced upon the first-mentioned contract, the sum of seventy thousand dollars, in the following sums, and at the following dates, to wit: March 22, ten thousand dollars; April 7, fifteen thousand dollars; April 25, fifteen thousand dollars; May 7, twenty thousand dollars; July 20, ten thousand dollars.

It appears from the correspondence of General Butler to the Secretary of War, from the 9th of May to the 9th of June, repeated complaints were made of fatal mismanagements and neglects in the Quartermaster's and Military Stores Department, particularly as to tents, knapsacks, camp-kettles, cartridge boxes, pack-saddles, &c., all of which articles were deficient in quantity, and bad in quality; the pack-saddles, particularly, were made in Philadelphia, which, with the transportation, amounted to more than double the price at which they might have been procured at Fort Pitt, and were found, upon examination, to be unfit for use; the arms sent forward appear not to have been duly examined, and arrived at Fort Pitt extremely out of order, and many totally unfit for use: which circumstances rendered repairs absolutely necessary, and added to the delay of the troops at Fort Pitt.

It appears that a great proportion of the powder supplied for the use of the Army, was not of good quality, though an experiment was made by Major Ferguson, at Fort Pitt, with a howitz, who reported in favor of the quality of the powder. On the 9th of June, General Neville, another of the contractor's agents, informed General Butler that he had not at that time received any moneys from the contractors for the purchase of provisions, &c. for the troops, and was obliged to supply them on credit; that the country furnished provisions in abundance at a cheap rate when money was had for the purchase; that shortly after this information was communicated to General Butler, at his request four hundred dollars were advanced to General Neville by the Quartermaster, for the purchase of provisions for the troops.

The troops arrived at Fort Pitt in the following order, to wit: May 16, Captain Slough, 69 men; May 18, Captain Powers, 78 men; May 19, Captain Cribbs, 40 men; same day, Captain Guthrie, 23 men; May 25, Captain Armstrong, 76 men; same day, Captain Kirkwood, 67 men; May 28, Captain Snowden, 101 men; June 2, Captain Sparks, 83 men; June 3, Captain Butler, 61 men; same day, Captain Brock, 82 men; same day, Captain Van Swearingen, 88 men; June 5, Captain Pike, 73 men; total, including officers and privates, 842 men: and left that place in the following order: Major Ferguson, with Captain Armstrong's company, about the 1st of June; Captain Snowden, with the troops under his command, on the — day of —; Major Gaither, with about 500 men, 12th of July; and on the 22d of August, the last of the troops, under the command of Captain Phelon, and General Butler, with the Quartermaster General, on the 26th of August.

It appears that General Butler had orders from the Department of War to protect the frontiers with the troops under his command; and that the delays in sending forward the troops from Fort Pitt, arose partly from that circumstance, and partly from the temporary want of supplies of provisions and other necessaries, and from the want of the necessary boats for their transportation, which were not in readiness as soon as the troops were. It appears that General Butler acted with ability, activity, and zeal, in his command at Fort Pitt, and that the delays of the troops there cannot be imputed to his want of judgment or his want of exertion. The troops met with considerable difficulties and delays in going down the river, from the low state of the water, and arrived at Fort Washington in the following order: Captain Munford, from North Carolina, with about 50 men, on the — day of —; Major Ferguson, with Captain Armstrong's company, on the — day of —; Major Gaither, with the troops under his command, on the — day of —; Colonel Darke, with the troops under his command, on the — day of —; and the Kentucky militia, on the — day of —.

The Army, consisting of about 2,000 non-commissioned officers and privates, moved from Fort Washington, by orders from the Commander-in-Chief, to a place about five or six miles from thence, called Ludlow's Station, where they continued till the 17th day of September; at which time, the whole Army amounted to about 2,300 non-commissioned officers and privates fit for duty; that the price of rations at Fort Washington, agreeably, to contract, was 6½-90ths of a dollar per ration; the price of rations at Ludlow's Station was 15¼-90ths of a dollar per ration; that the inducements of the Commander-in-Chief to this movement appear to have been, to furnish green forage for the horses and beef cattle for the Army, to instruct the soldiery in field exercise and other necessary discipline, and to deprive them of the means of intoxication, which were very plentifully supplied at Fort Washington, and used to an excessive degree by the soldiery, to correct the excessive use of which the most rigid attention to discipline was found incompetent.

Mr. Hodgdon was appointed Quartermaster General in the month of March, and continued at Philadelphia until the 4th of June; he then proceeded to Fort Pitt, where he arrived the 10th of the same month. No sufficient causes have appeared to the committee to justify this delay, and his presence with the Army appears to have been essentially necessary previously to that time; the duties of the Commander-in-Chief were much increased in consequence of the absence of the Quartermaster General, and after a continued expectation of his arrival at Fort Washington, for more than six weeks, the Commander-in-Chief gave him express orders, by letter, to repair to camp without delay. The receipt of the letter is acknowledged, but the orders contained therein were neither answered nor obeyed, and his arrival at camp was not until the tenth of September. The Commander-in-Chief, until that time, in addition to the duties of his office, discharged those of the Quartermaster General: and the military stores furnished by that Department were so deficient, from mismanagement and neglect, that many things essential to the movements of the Army, were either wholly made or repaired at Fort Washington, and even the tools for the artificers to work with, the Quartermaster particularly informed the Commander-in-Chief, that two complete traveling forges were sent forward, and upon examination, both of them were found to be without an anvil. Many other things, equally necessary, were either wholly omitted, or unfit for their intended use.

There were six hundred and seventy-five stand of arms at Fort Washington, the first of June, and most of them totally out of repair. The Commander-in-Chief appears to have been correct and attentive in all his communications with the Secretary of War, and to have discharged the various duties which devolved upon him with ability, activity, and zeal.

The Army moved from Ludlow's Station, on the seventeenth day of September, and arrived at the place where Fort Hamilton is now erected on the — day of —; they employed about fifteen days building that fort, and then proceeded on their march to the place where Fort Jefferson is now erected, forty-four miles distant from Fort Hamilton, where they arrived on the — day of October, and commenced their march from that place on the twenty-fourth of the same month; that the Army at this time consisted of — non-commissioned officers and privates fit for duty. At this time the Army had not more than three days supply of flour, and were sometimes at one-fourth, and sometimes at one-half allowance of that article, the deficiencies of which allowance were made up by increasing the quantity of beef, with which they were plentifully supplied. The Army was delayed five or six days on the march from Fort Jefferson for the want of provisions, and the season was so far advanced that sufficient green forage for the horses, could not be procured, from which circumstance many of the horses were totally lost, and others rendered unfit for service.

The orders to the Commander-in-Chief to proceed with the expedition, were express and unequivocal, so much so, as in the opinion of the Committee, to preclude the Commander-in-Chief from exercising any discretion relatively to that object

On the 31st of October, about sixty of the Kentucky militia deserted in a body, the first regiment consisting of about three hundred effective men was detached with a view to cover a convoy of provisions which was expected, and which it was supposed was in danger from the deserted militia and to prevent further desertions. On the 3d of November, after detaching the first regiment, the Army consisted of about fourteen hundred effective men, and on the morning of the 4th, about half an hour after sunrise, a general attack was commenced and in a few minutes thereafter nearly the whole Army was surrounded by the enemy; the action continued about four hours during which several charges were made by part of the Army, which caused the enemy to give way, but produced no good effect; the attack was unexpected, the troops having been just dismissed from the morning parade; it commenced upon the militia who were in advance of the main Army, and who fled through the main Army, without firing a gun: this circumstance threw the troops into some disorder, which, it appears, they never completely recovered during the action; the fire of the Army was constant, but not well directed; and it appears that a part of the troops behaved as well as could be expected from their state of discipline, and the manner and suddenness of the attack. The Commander-in-Chief appears to have been cool and deliberate in the whole of the action, and the officers in general active and intrepid. The whole order of march, as far as the Committee are capable of expressing an opinion, appears to have been judicious, and the ground for action well chosen. The retreat was disorderly in the extreme; after it commenced, no orders were obeyed, if any were given, the men having lost all regard to discipline, or control; all the precaution appears to have been taken for the safety and comfort of the wounded, which the circumstances of the case would admit of.

The Committee have had no competent evidence before them to ascertain the number of the enemy in action; there were various conjectures as to the number, from different persons, from five hundred the lowest to one thousand or twelve hundred the highest.

Mr. Barton, a witness examined by the Committee, conversed with a chief at Niagara who was in the action, and was by him informed that the number of the enemy in action was one thousand and forty, and that six hundred more had convened, but were engaged in hunting, at the time of the action. He was also informed that the enemy had not collected in any considerable numbers until a few days before the action; this information appears to be corroborated by some other circumstances sufficient to induce a belief of the fact in the Committee.

The contractor for supplies, agreeably to the terms of contract, was to furnish horses, &c., for the transportation of the supplies; in this condition of the contract there was a total failure, which compelled the Commander-in-Chief to direct between six and seven hundred horses to be purchased by Israel Ludlow, one of the contractor's agents; to draw bills on Mr. Duer, the acting contractor, for payment, which bills endorsed by the Commander-in-Chief, to the amount of about seventeen thousand dollars, were protested by the contractor and paid at the Treasury. The persons employed by the agents of the contractor to drive the horses, appear to have been totally unacquainted with that business, and from the want of bells, hobbles, and other necessaries of that kind, as well as from other gross mismanagement, many of the horses were lost, and others rendered unfit for service; from which causes there were not pack-horses sufficient to transport the necessary quantity of flour from Fort Washington, for the use of the Army on their march; this circumstance retarded the execution of the expedition.

The officers, agreeably to the terms of contract, had an election of drawing the whole of the rations to which their rank entitled them, or of receiving the contract price of them in cash; the contractor's agents not being furnished with money for this purpose, gave rise to a general order by which the officers were directed to receive a certificate from the contractor's agent, called a due bill, of one of which bills the following is a copy:

"Due Major H. Gaither one hundred and seventy-three complete rations, on the route to Miami village, as appears from Mr. Wilson's certificate.

MATT. EARNEST, for WIL. DUER.

"FORT WASHINGTON, November 27, 1790."

This due bill issued upon the officer's signing some acknowledgment of satisfaction for his whole retained rations, which acknowledgment of satisfaction forms a voucher for settlement to the contractor, with the Treasury Department; and the officer is refused payment for these due-bills at the Pay Office. All casualties, by which these evidences of debt become lost or destroyed, are the gain of the contractor and the loss of the officer.

It is suggested by the Secretary of the Treasury, though not with positive certainty that a sufficient sum will be found due from the Treasury to the contractors upon a final settlement, to cover all these debts to the officers; the general order, which had the operation before stated, continued in force about five or six weeks, and was abolished about the 19th of October. The privates of the levies received but three dollars pay each, from the time of their respective enlistments to the time of their respective discharges, and were actually discharged without further pay or settlement; notes of discharge were given them, specifying the time of their service and bearing endorsements that some advancements had been made to them in account, without stating the amount, the object of which is suggested to have been to prevent transfers; the intended effect was not produced by the measure; the notes were sold for trifling considerations; the real sums due on the notes were various, from ten to twenty-five dollars, and they were frequently sold for five dollars, or one gallon of whiskey; the moneys for the pay of the levies, did not leave Philadelphia till 4th December, nor arrive at Fort Washington till 3d of January, 1792. Some time after the last enlisted levies were known to be entitled to their discharges; two reasons were assigned by the Secretary of War for this delay of payment, the one because there was no regular Paymaster in the Army, and the difficulties of transmitting moneys to the Army at so great a distance, in consequence of the want of such an officer; the other because it was supposed the Army would be at that time at the Miami village, so far advanced in the wilderness as not to admit of the practicability of discharging the levies, the total defeat of the Army not having been previously counted upon.

The clothing for the levies appears to have been of a very inferior quality, particularly coats, hats, and shoes, the last of which, in many cases, lasted not more than four days, and better clothing was furnished upon their enlisting into the regular service, which was for a time countenanced by the Commander-in-Chief.

Various modes appear to have been pursued by the officers in enlisting the levies, which occasion great uneasiness and some confusion; a considerable part of the Virginia battalion was so enlisted that the terms of their enlistments appear to have expired the first of November; the orders to the recruiting officers appear not to have been sufficiently explicit upon this point, whether the terms of enlistment were to commence at the time of enlistment, or at the arrival at a place of rendezvous. The militia were principally substitutes, and totally ungovernable, and regardless of military duty or subordination. It appears that the Commander-in-Chief had it in contemplation to commence the expedition at least one month earlier than it was commenced, with the few he then had, which was not very different from the real force in action; but was prevented for the want of the Quartermaster and contractor, and in consequence of the extreme deficiencies and derangement of the business of their Departments, the person sent forward by the Quartermaster being totally incompetent to the business; and the contractor's agents not being sufficiently supplied with money to enable them to execute their duties.

It appears to the Committee that in the wilderness where vegetables are not to be had, and the duties of the soldier uncommonly hard, the rations allowed by law, if completely supplied, are insufficient. This circumstance, with others, produced discontent and desertion among the soldiers.

It appears to the Committee that there were appropriated for the use of the War Department, for the year 1791, the sum of $652,761 61, and that there have been advanced by the Treasury to the War Department, upon that appropriation, $575,906 57, to wit:

And that the Treasury has always been in readiness to make the requisite advances, upon the request of the Secretary of War. It does not appear to the Committee in what manner and to what amount these advancements have been disbursed, the accounts not having been yet settled at the Treasury; nor was it possible, from the nature of the case, that they could at this time have received any conclusive or satisfactory information on that point.

From the foregoing state of facts, the Committee suggest the following as the principal causes, in their opinion, of the failure of the late expedition under Major General St. Clair.

The delay in furnishing the materials for, and in passing the act for the protection of the frontiers, the time after the passing of which was hardly sufficient to complete and discipline an Army for such an expedition, during the summer months of the same year.

The delays consequent upon the gross and various mismanagements and neglects in the Quartermaster's and Contractor's Departments, the lateness of the season at which the expedition was undertaken, the green forage having been previously destroyed by the frost, so that a sufficiency of subsistence for the horses necessary for the Army could not be procured.

The want of discipline and experience in the troops.

The Committee conceive it but justice to the Commander-in-Chief, to say, that in their opinion, the failure of the late expedition can in no respect be imputed to his conduct, either at any time before or during the action; but that as his conduct in all the preparatory arrangements, was marked with peculiar ability and zeal, so his conduct during the action furnished strong testimonies of his coolness and intrepidity.

The Committee suggest, as reasons for leaving the numbers of the troops at particular periods, and the dates of some facts, blank, the want of sufficient time to complete the Report with minuteness, and in some instances the want of the necessary evidence.

The said Report being read,

Resolved, That this House will, early in the next session, proceed to take the same into consideration.

COURT OF INQUIRY ON GEN. HARMAR.

Proceedings of a Court of Inquiry, held at the special request of Brigadier General JOSEPH HARMAR, to investigate his conduct as Commanding Officer of the Expedition against the Miami Indians, 1790, the same having been transmitted by Major General ST. CLAIR to the Secretary of the United States for the Department of War.

FORT WASHINGTON, September 24, 1791.

SIR: I have the honor to enclose to your Excellency the Proceedings of the Court of Inquiry which sat, agreeably to the General Order of the 14th instant, "to inquire into the personal conduct of Brigadier General HARMAR, Commanding Officer on the late expedition against the Miami Indians."

The Court have taken the utmost pains to investigate the subjects committed to them, and have expected that some persons would have attended from Kentucky on the occasion, as mentioned in your Excellency's Letter of the 15th. Finding no personal evidence come forward from that quarter, this day closed their proceedings, and present to your Excellency their opinion, as specially directed.

There are some depositions handed in, but as they are not authenticated under the seal of any Court of Record, or by the Prothonotary of any county, the Court conceive they can only subjoin them to the proceedings for information to your Excellency, as they have been to the Court. They are numbered 1, 2, 3, and 4.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your Excellency's most obedient servant,

RICHARD BUTLER,

Major General, President.

His Excellency Maj. Gen. ARTHUR ST. CLAIR.

Proceedings of a Court of Inquiry held at Fort Washington, September 15, 1791, agreeably to the Order of the 14th instant, of which the following is a copy:

"A Court of Inquiry, of which Major General BUTLER is appointed President, and Lieutenant Colonels GIBSON and DARKE members, will sit to-morrow at 12 o'clock, at the southeast block-house, Fort Washington."

Major General RICHARD BUTLER, President.

Lieutenant Colonels GEORGE GIBSON, and WILLIAM DARKE, Members.

After Orders.

HEADQUARTERS, September 14.

Lieutenant WARREN, of the Second United States Regiment, is appointed to record the proceedings of the Court of Inquiry directed to sit at Fort Washington by the orders of this day.

W. SARGENT, Adjutant General.

The Court met, agreeably to the above order, and were duly sworn according to law.

The following Letter was read from his Excellency Major General St. Clair, directed to Major General Butler, President of the Court of Inquiry:

FORT WASHINGTON, September 15, 1791.

SIR: The Court of which you are appointed President is ordered for the purpose of inquiring into the conduct of Brigadier General Harmar, the Commanding Officer upon the late expedition against the Miami Indians.

In the course of your investigations, all the circumstances of the campaign from the time the Army departed until it returned to Fort Washington are to be taken into consideration. These will embrace the personal conduct of the General; the organization of the Army; the orders of march, encampment, and battle; the motives which influenced the detachments of the 14th, the 19th, and 21st of October; and whether the said detachments were duly supported, and, if not, the reasons which prevented the said support. The Articles of War specify that Courts of Inquiry shall not give their opinion on the merits of any case, excepting they shall be specially thereto required. This seems to be one of the cases in which an opinion is requisite; you will, therefore, please, sir, to take the opinion of the Court on all and every of the points above specified, and convey the same to me when the inquiry shall be closed.

Some witnesses have been expected from Kentucky. Whether they will attend or not, I cannot inform the Court; but the principal officers of the militia who served in the Army of General Harmar have had notice that the Court would meet this day. I have heard from none of them, excepting Lieutenant Colonel Trotter, who writes to me that his attendance is doubtful; that Colonel Hall is gone to the Atlantic States, and he believes Colonel McMullen likewise.

Brigadier General Harmar being called upon for his evidences, furnished the Court with a list of persons; whereupon, the Court ordered them to be summoned to attend.

The Court then adjourned to meet at 3 o'clock P. M.

THREE O'CLOCK, P. M.

The Court met agreeably to adjournment.

The gentlemen who were summoned not being ready to give in their evidences, the Court adjourned to meet at 9 o'clock to-morrow morning.

SEPTEMBER 16.

The Court met agreeably to adjournment, and Major Ferguson being called in and sworn, deposed as follows: That, sometime about the 15th July, it was determined to carry on an expedition against the Miami villages. One thousand militia from Kentucky, and five hundred from Pennsylvania, with what could be collected of the 1st United States regiment, and one company of artillery, was to form the Army. The militia from Kentucky began to assemble at Fort Washington about the middle of September. Those were very ill equipped, being almost destitute of camp kettles and axes; nor could a supply of these essential articles be procured. Their arms were generally very bad, and unfit for service. That, as he was the Commanding Officer of Artillery, they came under his inspection, in making what repairs the time would permit; and, as a specimen of their badness, he informed the Court that a rifle was brought to be repaired without a lock, and another without a stock. That he asked the owners what induced them to think that those guns could be repaired at that time, and they gave him for answer that they were told in Kentucky that all repairs would be made at Fort Washington. Many of the officers told him that they had no idea of their being half the number of bad arms in the whole District of Kentucky as were then in the hands of their men. As soon as the principal part of the Kentucky militia arrived, the General began to organize them. In this, he had many difficulties to encounter.

Colonel Trotter aspired to the command, (although Colonel Hardin was the eldest officer,) and in this he was encouraged both by men and officers, who openly declared unless Colonel Trotter commanded them, they would return home. After two or three days, the business was settled, and they were formed into three battalions, under the command of Colonel Trotter, and Colonel Hardin had the command of all the militia. As soon as they were arranged, they were mustered, crossed the Ohio, and on the 26th marched and encamped about ten miles from Fort Washington. The last of the Pennsylvania militia arrived on the 25th of September. These were equipped nearly as the Kentuckians, but were worse armed, several were without any. The General ordered all the arms in store to be delivered to those who had none, and those whose guns could not be repaired. Amongst the militia were a great many hardly able to bear arms, such as old infirm men and young boys. They were not such as might be expected from a frontier country, viz: the smart active woodsmen, well accustomed to arms, eager and alert to revenge the injuries done them and their connexions. No; there were a great number of them substitutes, who probably had never fired a gun. Major Paul, of Pennsylvania, told him (Major Ferguson) that many of his men were so awkward that they could not take their gunlocks off to oil them and put them on again, nor could they put their flints so as to be useful; and even of such materials the numbers came far short of what was ordered, as may be seen by the returns.

That, on the 31st September, the General, with the Continental troops, marched from Fort Washington to join Colonel Hardin, who had advanced into the country for the sake of food for the cattle and to open the road for the artillery. On the 3d October the whole Army joined, and were arranged in order of march, encampment, and battle. These would appear by the Orderly-Book, with this difference in the encampment, the space they were to occupy when in order of battle, which was to be open, was always to be filled up with their fires, nor were any intervals to be left between battalions. This was done to prevent in some measure the cattle and horses from getting out of camp; and the sentinels round camp had orders not to let the cattle or horses pass out after dark, just before which time they were brought within their fires. Those precautions, aided by the care and industry of Mr. Wells and his assistants, succeeded well in preventing loss of cattle. He (deponent) was informed there were only two oxen lost from the time the whole Army took up the line of march until it returned to Fort Washington; but he was sorry to say, it was not the case with the pack-horses, the generality of the people employed in that department were ignorant of their duty, indolent, and inactive; nor was it in the power of the General to remedy these defects. The shortness of the time for assembling and organizing the Army put it out of his power to look about and select fit characters; he was of course obliged to take those that offered. After he was in the woods, it was out of his power to exchange them for better, and punishments for neglect of duty were out of the question. The principles upon which the horses were employed induced the drivers who were chiefly parties in the business to lose and otherwise destroy them, rather than return them to their owners. By this means, the proprietors had a high appraisalment paid them for their horses and daily pay for services until they were lost. By adding to the above the negligence of sentinels, he accounted for the number of horses lost, which, in his opinion, it was out of General Harmar's power to prevent.

After the Army was arranged, they continued their march, without any material occurrence, until the 13th, when the horse fell in with two Indians, and took one of them prisoner, who informed them that the Indians were not in force at the Maumee village. This day they reached a place called the French Store, at which place a Frenchman, who was then with the General as a guide, had lived. He informed that the village was about ten leagues distant. From this place, on the morning of the 14th, Colonel Hardin was detached, with six hundred men, to endeavor to surprise the Miami village. The Army moved at the same time, and, although it rained the whole day, they continued their march with diligence until late. The horse were ordered to be tied up this night, to enable the Army to move early the next day, which it did. This diligence of the Army on its march induced him to believe the General was endeavoring to guard against any disaster that might happen to Colonel Hardin, which he was of opinion would have been in his power; for Colonel Hardin had not gained more than four miles of the Army on the first day's march.

On the 17th, the army arrived at the Miami village. Here were evident signs of the enemy having quitted the place in the greatest confusion. Indian dogs and cows came into their camp this day, which induced the belief that the families were not far off. A party of three hundred men, with three days' provisions, under the command of Colonel Trotter, was ordered (as he understood) to examine the country around their camp, but, contrary to the General's orders, returned the same evening. This conduct of the Colonel's did not meet the General's approbation, and Colonel Hardin, anxious for the character of his countrymen, wished to have the command of the same detachment for the remaining two days, which was given him. This command marched on the morning of the 19th, and was the same day shamefully defeated. Colonel Hardin told him (deponent) that the number which attacked him did not exceed one hundred and fifty; and that, had his people fought, or even made a show of forming to fight, he was certain the Indians would have run. But, on the Indians firing, which was at a great distance, the militia ran, numbers throwing away their arms; nor could he ever rally them. Major Ray confirmed the same. He did not know what influenced the detachment on the 21st; but, from the enemy being flushed with success on the 19th, it became necessary, if in his power, to give them a check, to prevent the Army from being harassed on its return, which they might have done, will readily be granted by every one who has the least knowledge of the Indians, and an Army encumbered with cattle and pack-horses, much worn down; and, although the detachment was not so fortunate, as was reasonably to have been expected, yet he firmly believed it prevented the savages from annoying their rear, as they never made their appearance after. With respect to supporting that detachment, which consisted of four hundred chosen troops, he always believed them superior to one hundred and fifty Indians, the greatest number yet discovered, had it not been for misconduct and disobedience of orders by the officers who were on the command. He understood that Major Ray's battalion had been advanced to cover them, which was as many as could possibly have been spared, taking into view that those in camp could not be depended on, and many were without arms, having thrown them away. To support the whole Army was impracticable, the pack-horses being weak and greatly reduced in numbers; the artillery horses very much reduced, and unable to undergo much more fatigue, but at the certain loss of the artillery; as it was, they were obliged to send to Fort Washington for horses to assist in hauling it in. The march of the Army was regular and well conducted as was possible to be done with militia. With respect to the General's conduct, report says that he was intoxicated all the campaign, and unable to execute the important duties of his station. He (deponent) had mentioned his commanding the artillery, which was posted at the head of the centre column, and here the General chiefly was during the march. Of course he had an opportunity of seeing and being with him through the day. In the morning he received his orders from him, and, when they halted to encamp, he chiefly pointed out the ground where the artillery should be posted. His duty called him often to his tent before they marched in the morning, and after they halted in the evening; in short, had he been given to drunkenness, he had as good an opportunity of seeing it as any other officer in the Army. Yet he declared, that, from their leaving Fort Washington until their return, he never saw General Harmar intoxicated, or so as to render him unfit for the execution of any duties. In him, and his abilities as an officer, he placed the greatest confidence, never doubting in his orders, but obeying with cheerfulness, being conscious they were the production of experience and sound judgment.

Court of Inquiry on General Harmar.

Question first by the Court. What were your reasons for thinking punishment for neglect of duty out of the question?

Answer. The state of the Army being such that it obliged the General not to do anything that would tend to irritate the militia.

Question by the Court. Is it your opinion that the organization of the Army was a judicious one; such, alone, as was well calculated for the security of the troops?

Answer. It is my opinion that it was the most judicious organization that could be made, and calculated for the interest of the United States.

Question by the Court. Is it your opinion that the order of encampment was a judicious one, and that the extrema parts were so disposed as were calculated to give security to the Army and its appendages?

Answer. I think no better disposition could have been made.

Question by the Court. Do you think the order of battle calculated, so as to have been easy of execution and easily formed?

Answer. I think it was the best that could have been formed, and well calculated for covering the appendages of the Army?

Question by the Court. Do you know the General's motives for making the detachments of the 14th, 19th, and 21st October?

Answer. I do not know the General's motives for making the detachment of the 14th, but I suppose it was for the purpose of surprising the Maumee village, as we had taken an Indian the day before, who gave us information that the Indians were in great confusion there, and that they were not in force, and very much divided in their councils. We expected to surprise them before they separated.

Question by the Court. What were the movements of the Army after that detachment was made?

Answer. We continued our march next day until an express arrived to inform us that the Indians had evacuated the village, when we halted.

Question by the Court. What was the distance between the main body and the detachment?

Answer. About four miles.

Question by the Court. Do you think that the Army was within supporting distance when the detachment was made?

Answer. On the first day we were.

Question by the Court. Do you know what induced the General to make the detachment of the 19th?

Answer. The day preceding that on which the detachment was made, Indian dogs, and cattle came into our camp, which led us to believe the Indians were near us, more especially as they had left their village in such haste. I suppose it was for the purpose of examining the country around the camp. A detachment of three hundred men, under the command of Colonel Trotter, with three days' provision, was made on the 18th, with orders to continue out three days, but which, nevertheless, returned into camp the same evening. The General appeared displeased at their disobedience of orders. Colonel Hardin, wishing to retrieve the character of the militia, asked the General's permission to take out the same detachment on the 19th, which was granted.

Question by the Court. What motives led Colonel Hardin at such a distance as fifteen miles from camp?

Answer. I understood that he got on the trails of the Indians, and that he had discovered an Indian on horseback about one mile from where he fell in with their main body.

Question by the Court. Upon hearing of the defeat of that detachment, did you understand that the General ordered any support?

Answer. I don't know that he did; the first intelligence of the defeat was brought us by those who were defeated, late in the evening.

Question by the Court. Do you know the motives for the detachment of the 21st, either from the General himself, or any of his confidential officers?

Answer. I do not know from the General; but it was my opinion, as well as that of other officers, that the defeat of the 19th had so panic-struck the Army, that had the Indians attacked on the retreat it might have been lost, which induced the General to send the detachment in the rear.

Question by the Court. Had the General ordered another detachment upon the ground where the defeat of the 19th happened, do you think the militia would have gone, or would they have mutinied?

Answer. I am rather inclined to think they would not have gone.

Question by the Court. With respect to the general conduct of General Harmar, in the course of the campaign, is it your opinion that it was judicious, and in every respect commendable?

Answer. I do think it was perfectly so; I have the greatest confidence in, and good opinion of, his military abilities.

Captain Strong being sworn, deposed: That he knew of no circumstance during the whole campaign that could in his opinion affect the military character of the General; that the organization of the Army appeared to his judgment extremely judicious, and such he believed was the general opinion of the officers; that the order of the march seemed to him no less judicious and military in all parts; that the order of encampment and battle met, if he mistook not, with the approbation of every officer able to judge of it; that the motives which influenced the detachments of the 14th, 19th, and 21st October, appeared to him to be a question that could only be answered by the General, or perhaps by his confidential officers, or those more immediately attached to his person; that he had reason to believe that those detachments were not properly supported, but it was his opinion, at the same time, that the fault lay not with the General, who had given orders in each case that were not complied with, at least until it was too late.

Question by the Court. With respect to support in the action of the 21st, was there any support ordered that you know of?

Court of Inquiry on General Harmar.

Answer. I was present when the order was given to Major Ray to move with his battalion to support Major Wyllys.

Question by the Court. Do you know what distance they marched for that purpose, or how long they were gone from the Army?

Answer. I do not recollect perfectly how long, but I think it was not long.

Question by General Harmar. Is it your opinion that the making the detachment under Major Wyllys was attended with good consequences to the Army, or not?

Answer. I think it was attended with useful consequences to the Army.

The Court then adjourned to 3 o'clock, P. M.

THREE O'CLOCK, P. M.

The Court met agreeably to adjournment.

Lieutenant Hartshorn was sworn, and deposed: That he knew of no circumstance during the whole campaign that could, in his opinion, affect the military conduct of the General; that the organization of the Army appeared to his judgment extremely judicious, and such, he believed, was the general opinion of the officers; that the order of march seemed to him no less judicious and military in all its parts; that the order of encampment and battle met, if he mistook not, with the approbation of every officer able to judge of it; that the motives which influenced the detachments of the 14th, 19th, and 21st of October, appeared to him to be a question that could only be answered by the General, and perhaps by his confidential officers, or those more immediately attached to his person; that, as to the question of support, he had reason to believe the detachment was not properly supported, but it was his opinion, at the same time, that the fault lay not with the General, who had given orders in each case that was not complied with, at least until it was too late.

Question by the Court. Do you know, sir, in the course of the campaign, from the time the Army left Fort Washington until its return to that place, any circumstance that could militate against the military character of the General?

Answer. I know of none.

Question by the Court. Do you know of any unnecessary delays?

Answer. None at all; far from it; every thing was done to get forward the Army.

Question by the Court. Does any instance of inebriety in the General come within your knowledge, during the course of the campaign?

Answer. I know of none.

Question by the Court. So far as you are a judge of the organization of the Army, do you think it was proper and judicious?

Answer. So far as I could judge, I think it was extremely judicious.

Question by the Court. Had you any conversation with the officers of the Army on the subject of the organization of the Army?

Answer. I had; and with those who I think were judges, who thought it to be very good.

Question by the Court. Did the arrangement of march appear to be so connected as to be able to support each other in case of attack?

Answer. I think it did, and seemed no less judicious and military in all its parts.

Question by the Court. Did the extreme parts of the encampment appear to be so formed as to be competent to cover the main body of the Army in case of attack by the enemy?

Answer. Perfectly so.

Question by the Court. Was you in the first engagement of the Army?

Answer. I was in the action of the 19th of October.

Question by the Court. Was you in the detachment of the 14th?

Answer. I was not.

Question by the Court. Did the order of battle, on the 19th, appear to you to be a judicious one?

Answer. I think it was not a judicious one.

Question by the Court. Who was the officer who commanded the troops in that action?

Answer. Colonel Hardin.

Question by the Court. In what manner did you attack the enemy; was it in columns, or did you display in any regular order?

Answer. We were attacked in front of columns.

Question by the Court. When you were attacked, were you ordered to display, or form in any regular order?

Answer. No.

Question by the Court. In what manner did you oppose the enemy when you were attacked?

Answer. By endeavoring to form the line to charge them.

Question by the Court. What troops came within your notice that attempted to form when charged?

Answer. Not more than thirty Federal troops and ten militia.

Question by the Court. How many militia had you?

Answer. I don't know.

Question by the Court. What became of the rest of the militia?

Answer. They gave way and ran.

Question. Do you think that if the militia in that action had been properly formed, and in time, that they would have been sufficient to have beat the enemy?

Answer. They were.

Question by the Court. Do you know the motives for making the detachment on the 14th?

Answer. It was supposed for the purpose of gaining the Maumee village before the Indians left it, as we were informed they were preparing to leave it.

Question by the Court. Is that your own opinion?

Answer. It is, and was the general opinion in camp.

Question by the Court. What was the result of the action of the 19th; were the Continental troops and the ten militia defeated?

Answer. They were cut to pieces, except six or seven.

Question by the Court. Do you know from headquarters, or from any principal officers of the Army, what were the motives for making the detachment of the 19th?

Court of Inquiry on General Harmar.

Answer. It was for the purpose of overtaking a party of Indians, whose trails had been discovered.

Question by the Court. Was there any attempt made to support that detachment from the main body?

Answer. Not that I know of.

Question by the Court. What was the distance between the main body of the Army and the detachment attacked?

Answer. Fourteen or fifteen miles.

Question by the Court. From the conduct of the militia, do you think that the General had a right to expect any great support from them, if he had been attacked?

Answer. I don't think he had.

Question by the Court. Was you in the action of the 21st?

Answer. I was not.

Question by the Court. Do you know the motives for making the detachment of the 21st?

Answer. It was for the purpose of seeing if any Indians were in the village.

Question by General Harmar. Did you not think that the detachment sent back under Major Wyllys competent to engage any body of the enemy?

Answer. It was sufficient for any body of Indians in that country.

Question by General Harmar. To what cause was it owing that the detachment did not succeed so perfectly as I could have wished for?

Answer. Because they did not obey your orders, they did not march at the time they were directed.

Question by General Harmar. Upon the first intelligence, do you recollect any support I ordered?

Answer. I recollect you ordered a battalion, I think under Major Ray.

Ensign Morgan being sworn, deposed as followeth: That, as he did not join the Army under the command of General Harmar until the 13th October, he was unacquainted with its progress until that time, when the Army appeared in good order; as he was an Ensign, and carried the standard every fourth or fifth day after his joining the Army, he was frequently near the General, and always observed, as far as he could judge, the greatest propriety of conduct; as to the organization of the Army, the order of march, encampment, and battle, they are perfectly explained in the general orders; as to the motives which influenced the General in sending out the different detachments of the 14th, 19th, and 21st, he was unacquainted; the opinion he took up concerning the one of the 14th, was, that the General finding the Army discovered, resolved to make a push for the towns before they were abandoned, and, as he could not do it with his whole Army, formed the detachment on the 14th under Colonel Hardin; the motive for the detachment of the 19th, he was utterly unacquainted with; that of the 21st, as he supposed, was to pick up any straggling Indians who might have come to the towns, to see what they had been about, but without an idea of the Indians being in force.

Question by the Court. Do you think that the party of militia that were attached to Major Wyllys' detachment was sufficient to have defeated the Indians if they had done their duty?

Answer. If they had been together, I think they were.

Question by the Court. What time did you return to the Army from the action of the 21st?

Answer. About 5 o'clock, P. M.; the action commenced soon after day-light.

Question by the Court. Did you see anything of the detachment under Major Ray on your return?

Answer. I saw only a party three miles from the camp, under Captain Craig, that were going to our support.

Question by the Court. What was the disposition of the militia after they returned to the Army; were they well affected to the service and orderly?

Answer. I think they were very disorderly, and very inattentive to their duty, and some appearances of mutiny among them, with both officers and men, and turned out upon one occasion, particularly, to oppose a punishment that had been ordered by the General.

Question by the Court. Do you remember any thing of General Harmar's ordering his cannon to fire upon them?

Answer. I remember that General Harmar once said, that if the militia behaved again in so scandalous a manner, that he would order his cannon to fire on them.

Ensign Britt being sworn, deposed: That, with respect to the personal conduct of General Harmar, he knew that he was indefatigable in making arrangements for the execution of the plans which had been formed for the expedition; and he also knew that the difficulties were great which the General had to encounter in organizing the militia, and in endeavoring to establish that harmony which was wanting in their commanding officers, Colonels Hardin and Trotter, which he accomplished apparently to their satisfaction; that he was at all times diligent in attending to the conduct of the officers in the different departments of the Army, and that he was always ready to attend to such occurrences as were consequent to the same, and the necessary exertions to have his orders carried into execution were not wanting; but that there were great deficiencies on the part of the militia, either owing to the want of authority in some of their officers, or from their ignorance or inattention; that the generality of them scarcely deserved the name of anything like soldiers; that they were mostly substitutes for others, who had nothing to stimulate them to do their duty; that, as to the dispositions for the order of march, form of encampment, and order of battle, they were matters which he, being a young officer, could say little about; he presumed they would answer for themselves; that the General's motives for detaching Colonel Hardin on the 14th October, when they were told they were but ten leagues from the Indian towns, he supposed to be, from information they received by a prisoner who was taken on the 13th; that the Indians at the

Maumee village were in great consternation and confusion, and the prospects were, they might be easily defeated if found in that situation; that, in order to support this detachment, the horses of the Army were ordered to be tied up at night, so that the whole Army might be ready to march early in the morning, which was done accordingly; and that, when Colonel Hardin reached the village, the main body was not more than five or six miles in his rear; that the detachment under Colonel Trotter was ordered to reconnoitre for three days the neighborhood, to endeavor to find out the savages, who had fled from their towns; that this party returned the evening of the same day they started, and next morning Colonel Hardin marched with the same party and fell in with the Indians; that an engagement ensued, in which he was routed, owing to the cowardly behaviour of the militia under his command; that the motives which he conceived led to detaching the party under Major Wyllys, on the 21st, were that the Indians, having avoided engaging the whole Army, would collect at their towns, and harass the rear and flanks as much as possible on its return, and a stroke at them before they could assemble in large bodies, would prevent their doing it with much effect; that the party accordingly met with the Indians, and a battle followed, in which numbers were killed on both sides; that the moment the news of this arrived in camp, Major Ray, with his battalion of Kentucky militia, was ordered to march to the support of Major Wyllys, but that he did not proceed far before he returned.

Question by the Court. Did you, at any time in the course of the campaign, perceive that General Harmar was intoxicated?

Answer. I did not; I lived in the General's family, and should have known it, had anything of that kind happened.

Doctor Allison being sworn, deposed: That the organization of the Army, the orders of march, encampment, and battle, were questions which would be more amply answered by a reference to the Orderly Book, than they could be from the mere relation of an individual, or from any other official information; that, as to the motives which influenced the detachments of the 14th, 19th, and 21st October, those were questions which, if answered at all, must be merely speculative opinions, which it was not always prudent to divulge, nor would they, in his judgment, be admitted as evidence, or even perused by any tribunal, and therefore were nugatory; as he had not the honor of being in the Cabinet, it was utterly out of his power to give any other; that, as soon as the news arrived of the misfortune of the third detachment, a reinforcement was immediately ordered by the General, but whether it actually set out, or what induced it to return, he could not say, or whether sufficiently strong, he did not conceive himself a judge; his situation as surgeon prevented a minute attention to every, or indeed any of the arrangements of the Army; yet, as far as they came within his view or knowledge, they were judicious and uniform; that every attention was paid to the Army, by the General, in every situation; that every step was taken by him that prudence and military knowledge could suggest, the circumstances of the Army would permit, or that necessity required.

Lieutenant Denny being sworn, deposed: That General Harmar began his preparations for the campaign soon after the 15th July, and that every day was employed in the most industrious manner; that the calculations for provisions, horses, and stores were immediately made out, and orders given accordingly; that great exertions were used by Captain Ferguson to get in readiness the artillery and military stores; and, indeed, every officer was busily engaged, under the eye of the General, in fitting out necessary matter for the expedition, but particularly the Quartermaster—not a moment's time appeared to be lost; 15th and 16th September, the Kentucky militia arrived, but instead of seeing active riflemen, such as is supposed to inhabit the frontiers, they saw a parcel of men, young in the country, and totally inexperienced in the business they came upon, so much so that many of them did not even know how to keep their arms in firing order; indeed, their whole object seemed to be nothing more than to see the country, without rendering any service whatever. A great many of their guns wanted repairs; and, as they could not put them in order, our artificers were obliged to be employed; a considerable number came without any guns at all; Kentucky seemed as if she wished to comply with the requisitions of Government as ineffectually as possible, for it was evident that about two-thirds of the men served only to swell their numbers—19th September, a small detachment of Pennsylvania militia arrived, and the 25th of September Major Doughty, with two companies of Federal troops, joined them from Muskingum. Governor St. Clair had arrived from New York the 22d, and the remains of the Pennsylvania militia came on the 25th. The militia last mentioned were similar to the other—too many substitutes. The General lost no time in organizing them, though he met with many difficulties—the Colonels were disputing for the command, and the one most popular was least entitled to it. The General's design was to reconcile all parties, which he accomplished after much trouble. The Kentuckians composed three battalions, under Majors Hall, McMullen, and Ray, with Lieutenant Colonel Commandant Trotter at their head. The Pennsylvanians were formed into one battalion under Lieutenant Colonel Trubey and Major Paul, the whole to be commanded by Colonel John Hardin, subject to the orders of General Harmar. That, on the 26th of September, the militia marched on the route towards the Indian towns; the 30th, the General having got forward all the supplies that he expected, he moved out with the Federal troops, formed into two small battalions under the immediate command of Major Wyllys and Major Doughty, together with Captain Ferguson's company of artillery, and three pieces of ordnance. On the 3d of October, General Harmar joined the advanced troops early in the morning; the remaining part of the day was spent in forming the line of march, the order of encampment and battle, and explaining the same to the militia field officers. General Harmar's orders will show the several formations. On the 4th, the Army took up the order of march, as is described in the orders. On the 5th, a reinforcement of horsemen and mounted infantry joined from Kentucky. The dragoons were formed into two troops; the mounted riflemen made a company, and this small battalion of light troops were put under the command of Major Fontaine. The whole of General Harmar's command, then, may be stated thus:

3 battalions of Kentucky militia	}	1,133
1 do Pennsylvania militia
1 do light troops, mounted militia
2 do Federal troops -
Total	-	- 1,453

The line of march was certainly one of the best that could be adopted, and great attention was paid to keep the officers with their commands in proper order, and the pack-horses, &c., as compact as possible. The order of encampment appeared well calculated both for defence and to preserve the horses and cattle from being lost; however, notwithstanding every precaution taken, and repeated orders given to the horse-masters to hopple well their horses, and directions to officers and men not to suffer any to pass through the lines, many of them, owing to the carelessness of the militia, and the scarcity of food, (though great attention was paid in the choice of ground,) broke loose and strayed through the lines after night, and even passed the chain of sentries which encircled the camp, and were lost. Patrols of horsemen were ordered out every morning by day-light to scour the neighboring woods, and to bring in any horses that might have broke through the lines, and a standing order directed the pickets to turn out small parties and drive in every horse. This was done, he believed, to expedite the movement of the Army. There was no less attention paid to securing the cattle; every evening when the Army halted, the guard, which was composed of a commissioned officer and thirty or thirty-five men, built a yard always within the chain of sentries, and sometimes in the square of encampment, and placed a sufficient number of sentries round the enclosure, which effectually preserved them; there was not more than two or three head lost during the whole of the campaign.

On the 13th of October, early in the morning, a patrol of horsemen captured a Shawnee Indian. On the 14th of October, Colonel Hardin was detached with six hundred light troops to push for the Miami village; he believed that this detachment was sent forward in consequence of the intelligence gained of the Shawnee prisoner, which was that the Indians were clearing out as fast as possible, and that if they did not make more haste, the towns would be evacuated before their arrival. As it was impossible for the main body of the Army, with all their train, to hasten their march much, the General thought proper to send on Colonel Hardin, in hopes of taking a few before they would all get off. This night the horses were all ordered to be tied up, that the Army might start by day-light, on purpose to keep as near Colonel Hardin as possible; the distance to the Indian towns, when the detachment marched ahead, was about thirty-five miles. On the 15th, every exertion was used to get forward the main body this day: they found that the advanced party had gained but very few miles. On the 16th, in the evening, met an express from Colonel Hardin, who had got into the village, informing the General that the enemy had abandoned every place. On the 17th, about noon, the Army arrived at the Omeé towns. On the 18th Colonel Trotter was ordered out with three hundred men, militia and regulars, to reconnoitre the country, and to endeavor to make some discoveries of the enemy; he marched but a few miles, when his advanced horsemen came upon two Indians, and killed them; the Colonel was contented with this victory, and returned to camp. Colonel Hardin was displeased because Colonel Trotter did not execute his orders, and requested the General to give him the command of the party; it was granted, and accordingly Hardin marched next morning; but he believed he had not two-thirds of his number when two miles from camp; for to his certain knowledge, many of the militia left him on the march, and returned to their companies; whether he knew it or not he could not tell, but that he proceeded on, with a determination to trace some fresh signs of the enemy; he believed the plan was merely to gain some knowledge of the savages. He at length came upon a party, not exceeding one hundred, but was worsted; owing entirely, as he was informed, to the scandalous behaviour of the militia, many of whom never fired a shot, but ran off at the first noise of the Indians, and left the few regulars to be sacrificed; some of them never halted until they crossed the Ohio. The Army, in the mean time, was employed burning and destroying the houses and corn, shifting their position from one town to another; that, on the 21st of October, the Army having burned five villages, besides the capital town, and consumed or destroyed near twenty thousand bushels of corn in ears, took up the line of march on the route back to Fort Washington, and encamped about eight miles from the ruins; that, about 9 o'clock, P. M., the General ordered out four hundred choice men, militia and regulars, under the command of Major Wylls, to return to the towns, intending to surprise any parties that might be assembled there, supposing that the Indians would collect to see how things were left. The General had felt the enemy, knew their strength, and calculated much upon the success of this enterprise; that it was the general opinion the force of the savages was nothing equal to this detachment, and, unless by some such means, there was no possibility of getting any advantage of them; however, the best laid plan was in some measure defeated by the disobedience of the militia, who ran in pursuit of small parties, and left Major Wylls unsupported; the consequence was, that the Major with most part of the regulars were killed, and our loss was equal if not greater than the savages; that the intention of this detachment was evident to all the Army, and would have answered the fullest expectations, provided a due obedience had been observed on the part of the militia; to provide against disobedience of orders was what he believed no one would think of; and, had it not been the case, the Major in his opinion might have returned crowned with laurels; that the main body waited for the return of this detachment; but, to their mortification, about 11 o'clock A. M. of the 22d, a fellow who ran back from the field, gave them information of Major Wyllys' misfortune; General Harmar immediately despatched Major Ray with his battalion to the assistance of the parties, but the Major did not get the length, before he met Colonel Hardin returning to camp with his wounded. He was led to believe that about this time the General lost the confidence he had in the militia; those of them among the dead were of the best men; that the effective strength was very much reduced by sickness and otherwise; the regular troops did not furnish more than two hundred; they were in his opinion very insufficient; and he was also clearly of opinion, that had the enemy made an attack upon their camp that evening, or the morning following, the militia were so panic-struck that very few of them would have stood; the consequences that would have happened startled every person with horror; the sick and wounded, and all the stores, artillery, &c., would have fallen a prey to the savages; that this was also the opinion of several of the principal officers, who advised General Harmar of the danger of attempting to return to the town, from the time it would take up, and the probability that the delay would give the savages time to collect from distant quarters. He observed, that the 22d of October was employed in fixing biers for the wounded, and in making repairs. He also observed, that the frost had destroyed the food early on their march out, and that the horses of the Army were now become very much reduced; so much so, that it was utterly impossible for the main body to perform any thing rapidly, and to get back upon the road, which they had so lately passed, was attended with difficulty; he said that the greatest attention was paid, the little Army was kept compact, and vigilance was the word from all who had any reputation to lose; that the militia on their return began to be refractory, showing great signs of a revolt, discharging their pieces in open defiance of the General's orders; some of them, however, were detected and punished, which gave umbrage, and was afterwards the cause of many ill-natured reports, spread without any foundation, to injure the General's reputation. He further observed, that the Army returned by slow marches back to Fort Washington; that General Harmar's conduct during the campaign was observed to be sober, steady, and attentive to the service; and, as his duty required him to be frequently near the General, should certainly have discovered it had he been at any time intoxicated, as has been reported. Every evening, as duty as the Army halted, the General made his remarks for that day, and issued orders for the movement and arrangements for the next, and every morning he was found among the first prepared for the field.

September 19, three o'clock, P. M.—The Court having met again, adjourned to to-morrow morning, 9 o'clock.

Septembrr 20th.—The Court having met, according to adjournment:

Major Ziegler being sworn, deposed: That some time had elapsed before the different corps and battalions could be organized, on account of rank; the militia officers disputing for the command; and after a good deal of exertion by General Harmar, they commenced their march on the 30th September, 1790—the militia under Colonel Hardin, having been sent on a few days before; and on the 3d October they joined the militia, and took up their line of march, and encamped as mentioned in the General's orders. He observed that the orders of march and encampment, motions, &c., &c., were such as would have done honor to the first officers either in America or Europe. All necessary precautions were observed to gain the point General Harmar set out for. On the 14th of October he was ordered to advance, with Colonel Hardin, commanding fifty rank and file of the Federal troops, being part of six hundred men. At 10 o'clock they took up their march, and before they left the ground the rest of the Army was ordered to parade and follow them; he remembered to have seen the Army from an eminence, as he inclined towards the left, with the column to which he was attached. The 15th, at about 3 o'clock, P. M., they arrived at the Miami villages, and at the same time Colonel Hardin sent an express to General Harmar, to inform him that the villages were evacuated. It was his opinion that the motive for this manœuvre was in consequence of a Shawanese, whom they took a few days before, and who acquainted the General that the Indians were ready to move away. The Army arrived the 17th, in the forenoon; and that day, as well as the rest, they were all busy in destroying the Indian corn, &c. He further observed, that on the 18th, Colonel Trotter was detached, with three hundred men of the militia, including thirty Federal troops, but that the Colonel returned the same day, without bringing any information; and that on the morning following, Colonel Hardin took the command of the same party, and advanced to procure some knowledge of the enemy; and on his discovering the enemy, those which were in the rear would not come up and support those engaged in front, and very few of those in front stopped, but ran, and the militia fled in a shameful manner, and the few Federal troops not supported, fell a sacrifice. The Major said, that a sergeant of militia behaving very improperly at that time, could not be brought to trial, on account of a brother of his being a Captain, and who made parties that would have been attended with bad consequences, should he be punished, as his brother declared he would raise some men and bid defiance. That on the 21st October, 1790, after they had destroyed a great quantity of corn and five or six villages, they took up their line of march towards Fort Washington; and at night, Major Wyllys was detached with four hundred choice men, in hopes to surprise a body that might be at the ruins: this party was supposed to be sufficiently strong for any number of the enemy embodied. Major Wyllys marched in three columns, with intention to join with the right and left columns at the Miami village, but that the column under the command of Major M'Mullen fell in with a small party of Indians; they followed them, and disobeyed the orders of Major Wyllys in pursuing them and leaving the others unsupported, and so was the left wing; which would not have been if they had joined them, as he supposed it to be sufficiently strong for that party.

He also remembered very well being on picket, or commanding one of the wings as Captain es Carré, when the first men arrived with the intelligence that their party had gained ground, and at that very instant General Harmar ordered Major Ray with his battalion to the assistance of those engaged, lest that information should not prove true, but he went but two miles or two and a half, then meeting the scattered detachment returned, to the great surprise of General Harmar; that the success of the detachment was defeated, in a great measure, by the militia running ahead, and leaving Major Wyllys unsupported. The Army remained this day in dressing and fixing the wounded. The militia behaving so bad in several instances, destroyed every confidence the General had in them, otherwise, he would have returned with the Army, but, as things were situated, it would have been running too great a hazard. The Army returned back to Fort Washington. Nothing appeared wanting on the part of the General. Every attention was paid to the Army to guard against surprise. The Major observed that there had been very injurious reports spread about General Harmar, but, if he was to be credited, he knew of nothing that could be alleged against him, or that could possibly injure his reputation in any respect. The good of the service appeared to be his constant study.

Question by the Court. I think, sir, you said that on the 15th, at three o'clock, P. M., you arrived at the Miami village, what did you do after your arrival there? were the militia in good order?

Answer. When we arrived we were very much fatigued, having marched twenty-eight miles that day, I directed that my own men should not go thirty yards from camp. The militia like a rabble strolled into the neighboring villages, in parties of thirty or forty after plunder, such was the situation that one hundred and fifty warriors might have beat us off the ground.

Question by the Court. Did you see any desire in the militia to return to the ground where Major Wyllys was defeated, or do you suppose they would have gone had they been ordered to go?

Answer. I suppose they would not have gone; they appeared to be panic-struck.

Question by the Court. Are you of opinion that the personal conduct of the General was regular, steady, and tended to the good of the service?

Answer. Undoubtedly so, and very much to the credit of the General.

Question by the Court. From your long knowledge of services do you think that from the complexion of the troops General Harmar had to organize, that the formation of the Army was judicious?

Answer. I think it was.

Question. Do you think that the order of march and encampment, were calculated to secure every part of the Army and its appendages?

Answer. Yes, very much so.

Question by the Court. From your experience, do you think that the order of battle directed by General Harmar, was judicious?

Answer. Yes, perfectly so.

Captain Doyle being sworn, deposed: That previous to the campaign going out last Fall, every day was employed in the most industrious manner; on the arrival of the Kentucky militia they were all much disappointed; that instead of seeing complete riflemen, many were armed with old muskets, much out of repair; the General immediately ordered them repaired with all expedition. He referred the Court as to the line of march, to the General's Orderly Book, and informed the Court, that the personal conduct of the General through the campaign was uniform and steady, and that had the General's orders been strictly obeyed, he was confident he must come home with honor. As to what influenced the General to make detachments he could not say; he was in the detachment on the 14th October, and that the behaviour of the militia in that detachment, was very disgraceful; they ran from town to town in pursuit of plunder, contrary to orders, and on the arrival of General Harmar at the town, two-thirds of them dispersed in the same manner; the General ordered cannon to be fired, merely to collect them, and he at the same time harangued the officers, informing them of the ill consequences of such conduct. That the General's not returning to the village after the ill success of the last detachment, he believed was owing to his not having confidence in his Army. At that time there was a great rumor in camp, the general voice was for returning, their horses were much worn down, and the militia showed great signs of revolt. The reports that the militia circulated after their return home, and which was much to the prejudice of General Harmar, was, he believed, owing to the General's having a few of them punished for disobedience of orders; he thought it certain, that they had no grounds for their ill-natured reports, and that General Harmar would have been justifiable in arresting one or two of the most popular field-officers, and sending them home with disgrace; but a thing of that kind, he observed, would have broken up the Army. He knew of no part of the Court of Inquiry on General Harmar.

General's conduct; during the whole of the campaign, that could be censured; without it was showing too much lenity to the militia, and thanking them for their conduct, when they merited punishment.

Question by the Court. Do you think that the sending the detachment under Major Wyllys, tended eventually to the preservation of the Army?

Answer. I think the Indians would have harassed us very much on our return if that detachment had not been made.

Question by General Harmar. Did the enemy annoy the Army at all after that detachment was made?

Answer. No, they did not.

Question by General Harmar. Did we see any Indians afterward?

Answer. We did not.

Lieutenant Sedam being sworn, deposed: That he had the honor of serving under General Harmar last Fall, on a campaign against the Indians of the Maumee village, and that he saw nothing in his conduct, but what he thought was very proper; that relative to the organization of the Army he was but little acquainted, and therefore referred the Court to the General's Orderly Book; that he was entirely unacquainted with General Harmar's motives for sending out the different detachments, and if those detachments were not properly supported, it did not appear to him to be the fault of the General, for the militia were a poor set, and behaved very ill upon all occasions; that, after the first action, he heard Major Paul, of the Pennsylvania militia, say: he hoped General Harmar would not put any confidence in them, for he was sure they would not fight.

Question by General Harmar. When I was upon the return at Chillicothe, I ordered one of the militia to be whipped, I was informed that Colonel Trotter and Major M'Mullen said I had no right to punish them. Did you hear me reprimand them for that conduct?

Answer. After the man was punished, I heard you say to Colonel Trotter and Major M'Mullen, that you would send them both home with disgrace for their bad conduct.

Ensign Armstrong being sworn, deposed as follows: That the militia being ordered into battalions and organized, in which he knew the General met with great difficulty; that the order of march and encampment could be better ascertained by a reference to the Orderly Book, than any thing he could add on the subject; that the conduct of the militia in every instance seemed calculated to obstruct every measure adopted by General Harmar; that the conduct of the General in every particular, was perfectly consistent and uniform, and every step taken by him appeared to be the dictate of prudence and sobriety; that what induced the General to send out the detachments, was wholly unknown to him, and therefore unanswerable by him.

Captain Armstrong being sworn, deposed: That on report being made to General Harmar, by Major M'Mullen and others, that the tracks of women and children had been seen on the route leading towards the Kickapoo towns, a Northwest course, and supposing the enemy had left their families and baggage not far distant from camp, General Harmar, on the morning of October 18th, detached Colonel Trotter, Colonel Hall, Major Ray, and Major M'Mullen, with thirty Federal troops, the mounted infantry, part of the cavalry, and a detachment of militia, amounting in the whole to 300 men. After they had proceeded about one mile, the cavalry gave chase to an Indian who was mounted; him they overtook and killed; before they returned to the column, a second one appeared, on which the four field officers left their commands, and pursued, leaving the troops near half an hour without any directions whatever. The cavalry came across the second Indian, and after wounding one of their party killed him also. When the infantry came up to this place, they immediately fell into confusion, and he gained permission to leave them some distance on the road, where he formed an ambuscade. After he had been some time at his station, a fellow on horseback came to him, who had lost the party in pursuit of the first Indian; he was much frightened, and said he had been pursued by fifty mounted Indians. That on his telling this story to Colonel Trotter, notwithstanding his observations to him, he changed his route, marched in various directions until night, when he returned to camp. That, on their arrival in camp, General Harmar sent for him; and after answering him many questions ordered one subaltern and twenty militia to join his command. With those he crossed the river St. Joseph about ten at night, and with a guide proceeded to an Indian town, about two miles distant, where he continued with his party until the morning of the 19th. His party fired upon an Indian and retook from him two horses. About nine o'clock he joined the remainder of the detachment under Colonel Hardin. They marched on the route Colonel Trotter had pursued the day before, and after passing a morass about five miles distant, they came to where the enemy had encamped the day before. Here they made a short halt, and the commanding officer disposed of the parties at a distance from each other; after a halt of half an hour, they were ordered to move on, and Captain Faulkner's company was left on the ground, the Colonel having neglected giving him orders to move on. After they had proceeded about three miles, they fell in with two Indians on foot who threw off their packs, and the brush being thick, made their escape. He then asked Colonel Hardin where Captain Faulkner was? He said, he was lost, and then sent Major Fontaine with part of the cavalry in search of him, and moved on with the remainder of the troops. That, some time after, he informed Colonel Hardin a gun had been fired in their front, which might be considered as an alarm gun, and that he saw where a horse had come down the road, and returned again; but the Colonel still moved on, giving no orders, nor making any arrangements for an attack. That, some time after, he discovered the enemy's fires at a distance, and informed the Colonel, who replied, that they would not fight, and rode in front of the advance, until fired on from behind the fires; when he the Colonel retreated, and with him all the militia except nine, who continued with him, and were instantly killed, with twenty-four of the Federal troops; and seeing his last man fall and being surrounded by the savages, he threw himself into a thicket and remained there three hours in day-light; during that time he had an opportunity of seeing the enemy pass and repass, and conceived their numbers did not amount to one hundred men; that some were mounted, others armed with rifles, and the advance with tomahawks only. He was of opinion that had Colonel Trotter proceeded on the 18th, agreeably to his orders, having killed the enemy's sentinels, they would have surprised their camp and with ease defeated them, or had Colonel Hardin arranged his troops, or made any military disposition on the 19th, that they would have gained a victory; their defeat he therefore ascribed to two causes, the unofficer-like conduct of Colonel Hardin (who he believed was a brave man) and the cowardly behaviour of the militia; many of them threw down their arms loaded, and he believed that none, except the party under his command, fired a gun. What he saw of the conduct of the militia on that day, and what he felt by being under the command of a man who wanted military talents, had caused him to determine, that he would not willingly fight with the one, or be commanded by the other. That he referred the Court to the Orderly Book which pointed out the line of march, encampment and battle.

Question by the Court. Are you clearly of opinion that if the militia had done their duty, they were fully competent to have defeated the Indians?

Answer. I think they were fully so.

Question by the Court. According to your ideas, as an officer of experience, was the formation and arrangement of the different corps of the Army by General Harmar at the commencement of the expedition judicious?

Answer. I think they were.

Question by the Court. Did the line of march appear to you to be a judicious one, calculated for the protection of the Army in all its parts?

Answer. I think so.

Question by the Court. Do you think the mode of encampment was calculated both for defence and protection?

Answer. As much so as any one that could possibly be adopted?

Question by the Court. What was your opinion of the General's order of battle?

Answer. I think it was a judicious one.

Question by the Court. Do you think that the making the detachment of the 21st, was in its consequences useful to the return of the Army?

Answer. I can judge from circumstances only; that we were not harassed by the enemy afterwards.

Question by the Court. Do you know if any detachment was made for the purpose of supporting Major Wyllys?

Answer. As soon as information of the Major's misfortune arrived in camp, the General ordered all the troops under arms, but whether any detachment was made from them or not, I do not know.

Question by the Court. Do you suppose that if General Harmar had ordered the Army back, the militia would have gone?

Answer. I am of opinion that if a serious attack had been made, in fifteen minutes the militia would have deserted us and left the Federal troops and artillery to be sacrificed.

Question by General Harmar. Do you recollect the proceedings of the militia at Chilicothe on our return?

Answer. I recollect your saying to Colonel Trotter and Major M'Mullen, that you would post them in their country for their unsoldier-like conduct and that they ought to be hanged.

Ensign Shamburgh being sworn, deposed: That the organization of the Army under General Harmar was, as far as he was capable of judging in military affairs, exceedingly well; that the march, encampment, and order of battle were also, in his opinion, very well planned; that he was not capable of judging of the motives which influenced the detachments of the 14th, 19th, and 21st October; but it was his opinion, at that time, that the General was apprehensive, that as the savages had been successful in the preceding engagements, they would harass his Army on his return; in consequence thereof, he ordered the party commanded by Major Wyllys in order to check them, which he believed had its effect; he recollected that the different detachments sent out were numerous, and, he believed, sufficient to fight such number of Indians as were then together, if the commanding officers thereof had taken more precaution; he had been told at the time that Major Ray was ordered to support Major Wyllys, but he could not determine whether that officer had obeyed his orders. He observed, that the loss of so many pack-horses was owing to the neglect of horsemasters, notwithstanding the repeated orders of the General on that head; it appeared to him as if they were parties concerned, and glad to lose their horses, because they had a very great appraisalment for the same. He observed that he did duty in the Ordnance Department at that time, and had fifty pack-horses under his direction, which gave him an opportunity to know the negligence and incapacity of both horsemasters and drivers.

Question by General Harmar. Do you think after the last detachment was made under Major Wyllys, and the remains of his party returned to camp, that the militia would have gone back if they had been ordered?

Answer. I think not.

Question by the Court. Was the appearance of the militia, after the action of the 21st, orderly or disorderly?

Answer. Very disorderly.

Question by the Court. Was there any particular cause ascribed, that you heard of, for their disorderly conduct?

Answer. Not that I know of, the militia, both officers and men, seemed determined to go home, and said frequently that ten Federal regiments should not keep them.

Question by the Court. Did you observe whether the militia were as well treated as the Federal troops?

Answer. Perfectly the same.

Ensign Gaines, who was Captain of horse in General Harmar's expedition, being sworn, deposed: That on the expedition he was almost every evening at General Harmar's tent until the 24th October, when he was detached forward to Fort Washington, and that during the whole time he did not see General Harmar in the least intoxicated with liquor, but that on the contrary the General conducted the Army in a manner which, in his estimation, did him great honor. He further observed, that he had served on a number of expeditions against the savages, undertaken by the militia of Kentucky, and that he never saw in any of them, the like good order and military arrangement which accompanied General Harmar's expedition; he also observed, that the people in Kentucky never alleged any charge against General Harmar, until Colonel John Hardin had acquitted himself before a Board of Inquiry of several charges exhibited against him, respecting his conduct on that expedition; that the populace finding nothing they could say to the prejudice of the Colonel would be believed, levelled their malice at General Harmar. He did not conceive that any thing would have been said against the General in that country, if a Baptist preacher's son, who resides there, had not been whipped in the Army for disobedience of orders.

Question by the Court. I think you say you have been in several expeditions against the Indians; did the militia who were with General Harmar conduct better or worse than those in other expeditions?

Answer. Much better, sir.

Question by the Court. Was you in the action of the 19th?

Answer. I was.

Question by the Court. Is it your opinion, that if the militia had been properly arranged in that action, and would have fought, that they would have been sufficient to have defeated the Indians?

Answer. Yes; for it appeared to me that the Indians were surprised; that if Colonel Trotter on the preceding day had not returned, he most certainly must have been in their camp, and completely defeated them; for I had taken two of their spies the day before, which appeared to be the only two they had out.

Question by the Court. Do you think that, if General Harmar had ordered the Army back, after the action of the 21st, that the militia would have gone?

Answer. They would not have gone willingly. I think in that case there would have been danger of mutiny. When the militia of Major Wyllys' detachment were ordered to march, they appeared unwilling to go, and some were so much so as to cry.

Question by the Court. Is it your opinion that the movement of the detachment under Major Wyllys had a good effect in securing the Army from being attacked and harassed on its return?

Answer. I think it had a very good effect.

Question by the Court. Did the Indians ever attack you afterwards?

Answer. Not while I continued with the Army.

Captain Asheton, being sworn, deposed: That the organization of General Harmar's Army was a source of trouble and difficulty, arising from disputes among the militia officers for precedency, but, when effected, was in all its parts systematical; that the organization of the Army, the order of march, encampment, and battle, when duly considered, cannot fail to raise the General in the estimation of every military man. That it had been basely reported that the General was in a state of intoxication nearly the whole of the campaign; this he asserted to be a malicious falsehood; and he averred that his personal conduct during that time will ever do him honor. He said the motives which influenced the detachments of the 14th, 19th, and 21st of October, could only be accounted for by the General himself; but he supposed that the detachment under Colonel Hardin was sent in consequence of information gained from a prisoner taken on the morning of the 13th, and from a Frenchman employed as a guide, who reported that it was something more than half a day's ride from a place called the French Store (at which place the Army encamped the night of the 13th) to the Maumee villages. This detachment was supported by the whole Army, and moved off the ground at the same time with as much rapidity as possible, and arrived at the villages on the 17th, where the Army encamped. On the morning of the 18th I mounted guard in front of the encampment. In the course of that day I was informed that a detachment of three hundred men were ordered out under Colonel Trotter, with three days' provisions, with orders to scour the country; but they returned the same evening to camp, without effecting anything. Colonel Hardin, disgusted at the conduct of Colonel Trotter, and anxious to retrieve the lost honor of his countrymen, solicited the same command, which was granted. He marched on the morning of the 19th, while he was yet on guard, and was defeated the same day by the Indians. He could not say what influenced the General to send out a detachment on the 21st, but he observed that the Indians were flushed with success in the action of the 19th. That it had become necessary to give them a sudden check, in order to prevent the Army from being harassed on its return; and that, if this was the General's intention, he was fully persuaded it had its desired effect. On the 21st the Army marched eight miles from the Maumee villages, on its return. Late that night a corps of three hundred and forty militia and sixty of the Federal troops, under the command of Major Wyllys, were detached, that they might gain the vicinity of the Maumee villages before the morning, and surprise any Indians who might be found there. The detachment marched in three columns, the Federal troops in the centre, at the head of which he was posted, with Major Wyllys and Colonel Hardin in his front; the militia formed the columns to the right and left. From several delays, occasioned by the militia's halting, they did not reach the banks of the Omece till some time after sunrise. The spies then discovered the enemy, and reported to Major Wyllys, who halted the Federal troops, and moved the militia on some distance in front, where he gave his orders and plan of attack to the several commanding officers of corps; those orders were not communicated to him; that Major Wyllys reserved the command of the Federal troops to himself. Major Hall, with his battalion, was directed to take a circuitous route round the bend of the Omece river, cross the Pickaway Fort, (or St. Mary's,) which brought him directly in the rear of the enemy, and there wait until the attack should commence with Major McMullen's battalion, Major Fontaine's cavalry, and Major Wyllys with the Federal troops, who all crossed the Omece at and near the common fording place. After the attack commenced the troops were by no means to separate, but were to embody, or the battalions to support each other as circumstances required. From this disposition it appeared evident that it was the intention of Major Wyllys to surround the enemy; and that if Colonel Hall, who had gained his ground undiscovered, had not wantonly disobeyed his orders, by firing on a single Indian, the surprise must have been complete. The Indians then fled with precipitation, the battalions of militia pursuing in different directions. Major Fontaine made a charge upon a small party of savages; he fell the first fire, and his troops dispersed. The Federal troops, who were then left unsupported, became an easy sacrifice to such the largest party of Indians that had been seen that day. It was his opinion that the misfortunes of that day were owing to the separation of troops and disobedience of orders. After the Federal troops were defeated, and the firing in all quarters nearly ceased, Colonel Hall and Major McMullen, with their battalions, met in the town, and, after discharging, cleaning, and fresh loading their arms, which took up about half an hour, proceeded to join the Army unmolested. He was convinced that the detachment, if it had been kept embodied, was sufficient to have answered the fullest expectations of the General, and needed no support; but he was informed that a battalion under Major Ray was ordered out for that purpose.

Question by the Court. Is it your opinion that, if the General had ordered the Army back, the militia would have gone?

Answer. I do not think they would.

Lieutenant Kersey, being sworn, deposed: That when the militia arrived at Fort Washington, they were formed into battalions and properly organized. He knew that General Harmar had a great deal of difficulty to get them arranged; their arms and accoutrements were in very bad order. He wished to refer the Court to the General's Orderly Book for information relative to the order of march. In his opinion General Harmar's conduct was uniform, steady, and sober, during the whole expedition. He was also of opinion that the detachment of the 14th was in consequence of information received from a prisoner, taken the morning before, which was, that the enemy were running away; and the detachment of the 19th was to gain some knowledge of them, and the detachment of the 31st was to surprise and take advantage of them; which, in his opinion, would have happened had the militia attended to the directions and plan laid down for that enterprise. He observed that the reduced state of the pack-horses, notwithstanding every attention was paid to secure and keep them in good condition, rendered it impossible for the Army to take any advantage of the enemy. The militia had proved that they were not to be depended upon; their dastardly behaviour, in three instances, destroyed every confidence the General had in them. He therefore determined to return, and not to hazard another engagement, unless the enemy came in reach of the main body. That the Army took up the march to return to Fort Washington, and it was with great difficulty that the General kept them together until they arrived there.

Question by the Court. From your knowledge of service, is it your opinion that the organization of the Army was judicious?

Answer. I think it was.

Question by the Court. Do you think that all the movements of the Army were so connected as to be able to sustain each other in case of attack by the enemy?

Answer. I think they were.

Question by the Court. Do you think that through the course of the campaign the General's conduct was open and decisive throughout?

Answer. I think it was.

Question by the Court. Was the conduct of the militia tolerably regular on their advance towards the Maumee towns?

Answer. It was more regular than it was on the return; but it was very irregular.

Question by the Court. Do you suppose it was necessary to make the detachment of the 31st, in order to prevent the Indians harassing the Army on its return?

Answer. I think it was, and for that purpose.

Question by the Court. If the General had ordered the Army to return to the towns, after Major Wyllys' misfortune, would the militia have gone?

Answer. I think they would not; they would have mutinied.

Question by the Court. Was the Army harassed by the Indians after the 21st, on its return?

Answer. Not to my knowledge; I believe there was not one seen.

The Court adjourned to meet at 9 o'clock, tomorrow morning.

SEPTEMBER 21.

The Court met according to adjournment.

Major Heart was sworn, and deposed: That General Harmar's conduct on his expedition in October, 1790, was at all times steady, calm, and deliberate, and was always attentive to the arrangements and applications made to him, and to the informations given, as far as came under his observation; that he was often at his quarters and marched in front of the right column, which was generally within fifty yards of him. That the organization of the Army being published in the daily orders, would speak for itself; he, however, never heard an individual find fault with it during the campaign, or point out any defects, except in the commissary and pack-horse departments, and in those the execution, and not the arrangements were found fault with; that the order of march was in three columns, covered with front, rear, and flank guards, which order was generally preserved, and as well executed as could be expected with a body composed mostly of militia, and embarrassed with pack-horses; that the encampment was in a square with the baggage, horses, cattle, and stores in centre; guards were posted in such manner as to form a line of sentries round the whole, field officers appointed to dispose those guards, and to see duty well done, and they were so disposed as to prevent surprise, and had the horse department followed orders, would have secured the horses; as they had not occasion to form the line of battle, he could not determine how it would have been executed, but it was simple, easy to be understood, and universally approved. With respect to making the detachments, he had never been in council, and could only assign such motives as offered themselves at the time from a concurrence of circumstances. The detachment of the 14th, he presumed, at that time, was made in consequence of information obtained from a prisoner, that the Indians were confused and distracted in their councils, and was designed to surprise them, prevent their concerting measures to unite, and attack them, and not give them time to secure their provisions and property, and that the desired effect was answered, so far as to prevent their securing so much as they would otherwise have done. The whole Army was put in motion the moment the detachment moved off, and followed with as much rapidity as artillery and stores would admit of, to support the detachment; that the detachment of the 19th was made in consequence of repeated information of having discovered a trail of men, women, and children, and on the fullest assurance, as he was then informed, that the detachment was adequate for attacking the party they were in quest of. A corps de reserve was ordered, but never came up; it was dark before information was brought to the General that the party were defeated, and a support could not be sent that night; a detachment was ordered to march next morning, but for what purpose he could not say. The detachment of the 21st, he had every reason to believe, was made on the general system, viz: to find the enemy, and give them a check, to prevent their attacking and harassing the Army on the retreat, and on that principle the detaching was inevitable; he did not know that any support was ordered; he was on the left, but he knew that the greater part of the detachment came in very soon after the intelligence of the defeat was brought, and it was too late for giving any assistance. He did not expect that the General would make a detachment to support them, after the repeated proofs that the militia would not stand, and he presumed the situation of the horses would not admit of returning with the Army. He supposed the detachment calculated to cover itself, and doubtless would have happily succeeded, had the right and left columns obeyed the orders which it is said Major Wylls had given. He knew of no one circumstance in the General's conduct during the expedition, which ought to injure his reputation; and, though the misfortunes of the 21st were to be lamented, yet he believed the salvation of the remainder of the Army, the baggage, and stores, were due only to the making that detachment.

Question by the Court. On the arrival of the troops in camp, who were defeated on the 21st, do you think, from the state of mind the militia were in, that, if the General had ordered the Army back, the militia would have gone?

Answer. I do not know whether they would or not; but, if they had gone, and not having any place to retreat to, I am of opinion they would have fled as soon as they were attacked, and have left the Federal troops to be sacrificed.

The Court then adjourned to to-morrow morning, at 9 o'clock.

SEPTEMBER 22.

The Court having met according to adjournment, directed the Recorder to write the following letter to his Excellency General St. Clair:

FORT WASHINGTON, September 22, 1791.

SIR: I am directed by the Court of Inquiry now sitting in this place, to inform your Excellency that the Court have gone through the examination of all the witnesses that have been adduced, and that those from Kentucky, who were referred to in your Excellency's letter to the President of the Court, have not appeared. The Court are now ready to close their proceedings, unless your Excellency has information of any further evidence being ready, of which the Court beg to be informed.

I have the honor to be, with the most perfect respect, your Excellency's most obedient servant,
 WINSLOW WARREN,
Recorder to the Court.

To His Excellency General ST. CLAIR.

To which letter, his Excellency General St. Clair sent the following answer:

FORT WASHINGTON, September 22, 1791.

SIR: You will please to inform the Court that I know of no evidences here, other than those that have been before them, and that it is not probable those from Kentucky will come forward. I therefore see no reason why the proceedings should not be closed.

I am, sir, your very humble servant,
 ARTHUR ST. CLAIR.

MR. WARREN,
Recorder to the Court of Inquiry.

Court of Inquiry on General Harmar.

Soon after, the following letter was received :

SEPTEMBER 22, 1791.

SIR : Since I wrote to you a moment ago, I have been informed that it is probable more testimony will be offered to the Court in the course of this day. If the Court, then, have not already closed their proceedings, I wish they would be pleased to defer it until to-morrow morning, of which please to inform them.

I am, sir, your humble servant,

A. ST. CLAIR.

Mr. WARREN.

To which the following answer was returned :

FORT WASHINGTON, September 22, 1791.

SIR : I am directed by the President of the Court of Inquiry to inform your Excellency that, in consequence of the last letter with which you were pleased to honor them, they have adjourned to meet to-morrow, at 9 o'clock, a. m.

I have the honor to be, your Excellency's most obedient servant,

WINSLOW WARREN.

His Excellency General St. CLAIR.

The Court then adjourned to September 23d, 9 o'clock, a. m.

SEPTEMBER 23.

The Court met according to adjournment ; and, no further evidences appearing, came to a resolution to close their proceedings.

The Court, having deliberately considered the evidence before them separately and aggregately, are unanimous in the following opinion :

1st. That the personal conduct of the said Brigadier General Harmar was irreproachable.

2d. That the organization of the Army was calculated to support harmony, and give mutual confidence to the several parts.

3d. That the order of march (a copy of which is annexed to these proceedings) was perfectly adapted to the country through which the Army had to pass.

4th. That the order of encampment and battle (plans of which are also subjoined) were judicious, and well calculated to give security to the camp, energy to the troops in case of attack, and simple in its execution.

5th. That there were just reasons for the detachments of the 14th and 19th of October ; that the detachment of the 21st was made on good principles, and had the designed effect of securing the return of the Army, and preventing the enemy from harassing their rear ; that the General had ordered support for the said detachment in time, but that his orders were not properly executed ; and that the conduct of the said Brigadier General Josiah Harmar merits high approbation.

RICHARD BUTLER,

Major General, President.

Attest : WINSLOW WARREN,

Caleb Worley, of the county of Fayette, in the District of Kentucky, Lieutenant in Colonel Paterson's Battalion of Kentucky Militia, maketh oath, and saith : That this deponent served as Lieutenant in a Battalion of Kentucky Militia, commanded by Major McMullen, on the late expedition undertaken against the savages of the Omee towns ; and that he, this deponent, had very frequent opportunities of seeing and conversing with Brigadier General Harmar, who commanded the whole forces so employed. And this deponent saith, that he never did, to the best of his knowledge, see the said General Harmar in a state of intoxication, nor wanting in that duty and attention which he owed to the safety and order of the troops under his command. And further saith not.

No. 4.

The affidavit of Colonel John Hardin, taken in consequence of a Court of Inquiry, to be held at Fort Washington, respecting the conduct of Brigadier General Harmar on the expedition against the Maumee towns, in October, 1790.

This deponent, being first sworn, deposeth and saith: That, on his arrival with the Kentucky militia at the mouth of Licking, he commenced an acquaintance with General Harmar; found, from his conversation, that he had the good of his country and the expedition very much at heart; business was carried on regularly, and with as much expedition as the nature of the case would admit. About the 1st of October we proceeded on our march; after the line of march was formed the General issued his orders regularly, and observed very strictly that they were executed; on our march there was an Indian prisoner taken, who gave information that the Indians and French were repairing the Old Fort at the Maumee town, and that the Indians were not likely to get any of the neighboring tribes to join them; this prisoner also informed us they did not know that General Harmar had any artillery. After receiving this information the General and this deponent consulted upon the matter, and it was agreed to detach six hundred men, leaving all their heavy baggage, and march rapidly to the towns, hoping that the enemy would fly to their fort, provided the artillery was not discovered, and that six hundred, rank and file, would be sufficient to keep them in their fort until General Harmar arrived with the artillery and balance of the Army. Accordingly, when the General was informed by the guides that they were within thirty or thirty-five miles of the towns, there was a detachment ordered to make ready with all possible expedition; those orders were so pleasing to the officers that they disputed who should go, and some cast lots in order to settle the dispute; this deponent, being honored with the command, left the General with his detachment, and saw him no more until he arrived at the Maumee village, which he thinks was about three or four days after he left him, during which time he heard no complaints of General Harmar. After the General's arrival at the Maumee village, and the Indians all fled, he expressed a very great desire to make his route by the Wea town, on the Wabash; for this purpose there was a council ordered to be held; but, before the council met, finding the Indians had stolen, the night before, a number of pack-horses and some of the light-horemens' horses, there was a stop put to the business, and the thoughts of the route by the Wea towns laid aside. There was an old French captive that was taken informed us the Indians were scattered in the woods, and were not able by any means to fight us, and that they had not got any assistance from other tribes; this induced this deponent to solicit the General for a command of about three or four hundred men, to range the woods for ten or twelve miles, which he granted, and ordered the three hundred men to be furnished with three days' provisions; these orders were as pleasing to the officers and soldiers as the former; Colonel Trotter insisted he had been promised a command; and, as it appeared this would be productive of something very clever, he wished to be indulged with the command of the detachment then ordered out, which was granted by the General, this deponent consenting thereto. Colonel Trotter marched on the morning of the 18th October, equipped for a tour of two or three days, in order to hunt up Indian camps; he returned on the evening of the same day, at the time the General and the deponent were about fixing the guards, in order to capture any of the enemy that might come to steal horses. The General appeared much displeased with the conduct of Colonel Trotter, and ordered the same party out again that evening, and for this deponent to go next morning and take charge of them. This deponent, agreeably to the orders given, collected what he could of the party next morning; and, after proceeding about ten miles, fell in with a party of Indians, who began a very brisk fire on the detachment, who retired without making but very little resistance, notwithstanding all exertions to prevent them. This deponent, when he returned to camp, informed the General what had happened; that it was owing to the cowardly behaviour of the militia, and insisted on another party being sent to the battle-ground. The General informed this deponent he would let him know in the morning. Accordingly he told him that he had not completed the object that he was ordered to do, and that if anything should happen to prevent him, he should be reflected on, as he had been in the possession of the towns so long, and had not destroyed them, that he would first give orders for that purpose, and then he would be better able to judge what was best to be done. On the morning of the 20th orders were given for destroying the towns, which was executed accordingly. At this time the men appeared more timid than before; the General told this deponent he thought it would not answer a good purpose to go to the battleground, as the spirits of the men appeared to be very low at hearing of so many men being killed, and that the sight of the mangled bodies would make them much more so; and the Indians, if not able to fight us, would be gone; and that he should give orders to take up the line of march to Fort Washington. Accordingly, on the morning of the 21st, we left the towns and began our march for the mouth of Licking, in about eight or nine miles encamped. The night being very clear, and the moon giving light, this deponent informed the General that he thought it would be a good opportunity to steal a march on the Indians, as he had reason to believe they returned to the towns as soon as they knew the Army had left it. The General did not appear fond of sending a party back, but this deponent urged the matter, informing the General that, as he had been unfortunate the other day, he wished to have it in his power to pick the militia and try it again; and at the same time endeavored to account for the men's not fighting, and desired an opportunity to retrieve the credit of the militia; the General appeared not to be of opinion the enemy would return so soon, but told this deponent he might take about one hundred men and go back; this deponent replied he did not wish to go back with less than five or six hundred men; the General answered that the troops were very much fatigued, and that it would not answer any valuable purpose to send so many men; this deponent then left the General; in about half an hour he was sent for, when the General informed him that he intended to send Major Wyllys back with all the Federal troops that could be spared, saying, at the same time, they were the men that would stand to the work, and that he wanted about one hundred of our best militia. After some conversation between the General and this deponent, the latter went to Major Wyllys and told him he did not like his going back with so few men; the Major, also thinking the number too few, wished this deponent to speak to the General on the subject, which was done. Major McMullen and Major Hall were then sent for, and the design made known to them; they both appeared well pleased with the affair; it was then proposed what number of men would be sufficient, this deponent recommending from four to six hundred; they both concluded that four hundred men were fully sufficient. The General seemed perfectly satisfied that any number of troops that were thought adequate to the purpose should be ordered; accordingly, four hundred men, consisting of sixty regulars, three hundred foot militia, and forty horsemen, rank and file, properly officered, were ordered to be ready to march at midnight; this deponent was honored with the command of the militia.

The troops marched agreeably to orders about two o'clock, and after proceeding to the towns they fell in with a party of Indians, (a battle ensued, the result of which is generally known;) as they returned, about one and a half miles before we got to camp. This deponent sent a horseman forward to inform the General what was done, and very shortly after he had despatched this horseman, met Major Ray, with about thirty men, who informed him there had come a horseman into camp, and had acquainted the General that the party was nearly all cut off, that the General had sent him with what men he could get out of the militia to meet what had escaped of the detachment, that those with him were all that would turn out: this deponent informed the Major otherwise, and requested him to wait until Major M'Mullen, Major Hall, and Major Ormsby should come up, that they were but a small distance behind, and he would go forward to the General. When this deponent arrived at camp and informed the General what was done, he appeared to be well satisfied; he also asked the General if he would not send back another party to keep possession of the battle ground? he replied, he would not divide his Army any more, when this deponent insisted on the whole Army's marching back, no person being present, except the General, Major Doughty, and this deponent: the General answered, You see the situation of the Army, we are now scarcely able to move our baggage, it will take up three days to go and return to this place, we have no more forage for our horses, and if the Indians intend to collect, which he apprehended they would, from their success on the 19th, it would give them a great opportunity; that they had got a very good scouring, and he would keep the Army in perfect readiness to receive them, should they think proper to follow: and finally concluded that under the present circumstances, it was best to move forward to Fort Washington, and if the Indians did follow, he would make every exertion in his power to defeat their intentions; Major Doughty appeared perfectly to agree with the General in opinion. The bounds of the camp were made less; the Army continued at the same camp until next morning, orders were given to march at the usual hour, which was eight o'clock; during this time this deponent never heard any person express a desire to go back to the towns, except two soldiers of Major Ray's party, by the names of Miller and Hammond. Next morning, at the hour appointed to march, the General moved with the front of the Army, and halted at a very small distance, litters not being ready for all the wounded. This deponent, with the rear guard, and many others, did not leave the camp until ten o'clock, when they moved on and joined the Army; the whole then proceeded on towards Fort Washington, with as much regularity as was observed in going out, until we came to the old Chillicothe on little Miami, when a number of militia, contrary to orders, fired off their guns. This deponent endeavored to put a stop to such disorderly behaviour; and commanded that those offenders that could be taken should be punished agreeably to general orders, and having caught a soldier himself in the very act of firing his gun, ordered a file of men to take him immediately and carry him to the six-pounder, and for the drummer to tie him up and give him six lashes. This deponent was shortly after met by Colonel Trotter and Major M'Mullen, and a number of militia soldiers, who in an abrupt manner asked him by what authority he ordered that soldier whipped? he replied, in support of general orders; on which a very warm dispute ensued between Colonel Trotter, Major M'Mullen, and this deponent. The General, being informed of what had happened came forward and gave Colonel Trotter and Major M'Mullen a very severe reprimand, ordered the Federal troops to parade, and the drummer to do his duty, swearing he would risk his life in support of his orders. The man received the number of lashes ordered, and several that were confined were set at liberty; numbers of the militia seemed much pleased with what was done. This intended mutiny being soon quashed, the Army proceeded in good order to Fort Washington. When the Army arrived at the mouth of Licking, the General informed this deponent he had determined to arrest some of the militia officers for their bad conduct, and send them home with disgrace; but this deponent opposed his intention, alleging that it would be a disgrace to the whole militia, that he would perhaps stand in need of their assistance on some future occasion, and it would sour their minds and cause them to turn out with reluctance, and that his discharging them generally with honor, perhaps would answer a better purpose; the General readily indulged the request of this deponent. This deponent further observes, that during the expedition he never heard officer nor soldier find fault, or give the most distant hint of being displeased with the General's conduct in any respect, nor charge him with cowardice or drunkenness, and expected the General had given general satisfaction: and what more confirmed his opinion, was after their arrival at Fort Washington, the General invited all the field and some other officers to dine with him, amongst whom was Colonel Trotter, Major Doughty, Major Hall, and Major M'Mullen. Dinner being over, wine was introduced; the General stepping out on some occasion, Major Hall proposed drinking his health, it was unanimously agreed to, and with as much cheerfulness as any other health that was proposed. This deponent continued at Fort Washington a few days after, and never heard any person speak a disrespectful word of General Harmar, or find fault in the least with his conduct whilst on the expedition. When this deponent returned home in Kentucky, hearing such reports respecting the expedition, was much amazed, but concluded it arose from a want of knowledge and proper information, or from prejudice. This deponent further saith, that he looked on General Harmar to be a very brave and experienced officer. And further saith not.

COMMERCE WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

Message from the PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES, communicating the correspondence between the British Minister Plenipotentiary and the Secretary of State, in relation to the Commerce of the two countries.

Gentlemen of the Senate and House of Representatives:

I have thought it proper to lay before you a communication of the 11th instant, from the Minister Plenipotentiary of Great Britain to the Secretary of State, relative to the Commerce of the two countries; together with their explanatory correspondence, and the Secretary of State's Letter to me on the subject.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

APRIL 13, 1792.

PHILADELPHIA, April 13, 1792.

SIR: I have the honor to lay before you a communication from Mr. Hammond, Minister Plenipotentiary of his Britannic Majesty, covering a clause of a statute of that country relative to its Commerce with this, and notifying a determination to carry it into execution henceforward. Conceiving that the determination announced could not be really meant as extensively as the words import, I asked and received an explanation from the Minister, as expressed in the Letter and answer herein enclosed; and, on consideration of all circumstances, I cannot but confide in the opinion expressed by him, that its sole object is to exclude foreign vessels from the islands of Jersey and Guernsey.

The want of proportion between the motives expressed and the measure, its magnitude and consequences, total silence as to the proclamation on which the intercourse between the two countries has hitherto hung, and of which, in this broad sense, it would be a revocation, and the recent manifestations of the disposition of that Government to concur with this in mutual offices of friendship and good will, support his construction.

The Minister, moreover, assured me verbally that he would immediately write to his Court for an explanation, and in the mean time is of opinion that the usual intercourse of Commerce between the two countries (Jersey and Guernsey excepted) need not be suspended.

I have the honor to be, with sentiments of the most profound respect and attachment, sir, your most obedient and most humble servant,

TH. JEFFERSON.

The PRESIDENT of the U. S.

Petition of Catharine Greene.

PHILADELPHIA, August 11, 1792.

SIR: I have received, by a circular despatch from my Court, directions to inform this Government that, considerable inconveniences having arisen from the importation of tobacco in foreign vessels into the ports of his Majesty's dominions, contrary to the act of the 12th Charles II, chapter 18, section 3, (commonly called the Navigation act,) it has been determined, in future, strictly to enforce this clause, of which I take the liberty of enclosing to you a copy.

And I have the honor to be, with perfect esteem and respect, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

GEO. HAMMOND.

Mr. JEFFERSON.

Act 12 Car. 2, Chap. 18, Sec. 3.

And it is further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That no goods or commodities whatsoever, of the growth, production, or manufacture of Africa, Asia, or America, or of any part thereof, which are described or laid down in the usual maps or charts of those places, be imported into England, Ireland, or Wales, islands of Guernsey and Jersey, or town of Berwick-upon-Tweed, in any other ship or ships, vessel or vessels whatsoever, but in such as do truly and without fraud, belong only to the people of England or Ireland, Dominion of Wales, or town of Berwick-upon-Tweed, or of the lands, islands, plantations, or territories in Asia, Africa, or America, to his Majesty belonging, as the proprietors and right owners thereof, and whereof the master and three-fourths at least of the mariners are English, under the penalty of the forfeiture of all such goods and commodities, and of the ship or vessel in which they were imported, with all her guns, tackle, furniture, ammunition, and apparel—one moiety to his Majesty, his heirs and successors, and the other moiety to him or them who shall seize, inform, or sue for the same, in any Court of Record, by bill, information, plaint, or other action, where-in no essoine, protection, or wager of law, shall be allowed.

PHILADELPHIA, April 12, 1792.

SIR: I am this moment favored with the Letter you did me the honor of writing yesterday, covering the extract of a British statute forbidding the admission of foreign vessels into any ports of the British dominions, with goods or commodities of the growth, production, or manufacture of America. The effect of this appears to me so extensive, as to induce a doubt whether I understand rightly the determination to enforce it, which you notify, and to oblige me to ask of you whether we are to consider it as so far a revocation of the proclamation of your Government, regulating the Commerce between the two countries, and that henceforth no articles of the growth, production, or manufacture of the United States are to be received in the ports of Great Britain or Ireland, in vessels belonging to the citizens of the United States?

I have the honor to be, with sentiments of the most perfect esteem and respect, sir, your most obedient and most humble servant,

TH. JEFFERSON.

The MINISTER PLENIPOTENTIARY of Great Britain.

PHILADELPHIA, April 12, 1792.

SIR: In answer to your Letter of this day, I have the honor of observing, that I have no other instructions upon the subject of my communication than such as are contained in the circular despatch, of which I stated the purport in my Letter dated yesterday. I have, however, no difficulty in assuring you that the result of my personal conviction is, that the determination of his Majesty's Government to enforce the clause of the Act of Navigation, (a copy of which I transmitted to you,) with respect to the importation of commodities in foreign vessels, has originated in consequence of the many frauds that have taken place in the importation of tobacco into his Majesty's dominions, in foreign vessels, and is not intended to militate against the proclamation, or order of the King in Council, regulating the commercial intercourse between Great Britain and the United States, which I have every reason to believe still exists in full force, as I have not had the most distant information of its being revoked.

I have the honor to be, with the most perfect esteem and consideration, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

GEO. HAMMOND.

Mr. JEFFERSON.

PETITION OF CATHARINE GREENE.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY, to whom was referred a petition of Catharine Greene, of the 4th of March, 1790, respectfully submits the following Report thereupon:

The said petition seeks to obtain an indemnification from the United States against the effects of certain engagements which were entered into by the now deceased husband of the petitioner, the late Major General Nathaniel Greene, while commanding officer in the Southern Department; and, for the circumstances on which it is founded, refers to a representation, of the 22d of August, 1785, which was made by the said Gen. Greene to the United States in Congress assembled; a copy of which representation, marked A, is herewith submitted.

The following are the principal facts which appear in relation to this application:

1. The Department of War, in the Fall of the year 1782, authorized the said Major General Greene to obtain supplies of clothing for the troops under his command.

2. In consequence of this authority, in November or December of the same year, he entered into a contract for the supply of clothing to the Army, with John Banks, a partner in the house of Hunt' er, Banks, & Co., who contracted on behalf of the company; and upon account of the contract advanced him eleven hundred guineas in money, and drew bills upon the Superintendent of Finance for the residue. This transaction was duly notified to the Department of War, and received the approbation of that department.

Petition of Catharine Greene.

3. The goods for completing this contract were purchased on credit by the contractors from certain British merchants then in Charleston.

4. About the same period, the Superintendent of Finance empowered General Greene to contract for the supply of all such provisions as might be wanted for the use of the Army, in the States of North and South Carolina and Georgia, with permission, if more convenient to him, to commit the execution of the business to Edward Carrington, Esq.; to whom it was accordingly committed.

5. An engagement which had been taken by the State of South Carolina, for the supply of the Army, was to expire at the end of the year 1782. It became urgent to complete a contract for the supply after that period. Advertisements for receiving proposals were published; and particular applications were made by General Greene to sundry characters of property and influence, who had been formerly men of business, to endeavor to engage them to enter into a competition for the contract. But these efforts did not produce the desired effect, owing partly to the distressed and deranged situation of the country, and partly to the then state of public credit. No offer was made, except by the same John Banks, who was the contractor for supplying the troops with clothing, acting on behalf of the same copartnership of Hunter, Banks, & Co. The terms proposed by him, being thought too disadvantageous, were not accepted in the first instance. The State of South Carolina having consented to extend its measures for supplying the Army to the 20th of February following, advantage was taken of the extension, to endeavor to procure better terms. A conclusion was delayed to give a further opportunity for other offers, and negotiations were carried on with Mr. Banks to induce him to moderate his terms. He fell somewhat in his demands; but as they still continued to be thought too high, Gen. Greene would not suffer a contract to be concluded till every possible effort to obtain more favorable terms had failed. As a last expedient for this purpose, a letter was written by the said Edward Carrington to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of South Carolina, stating the then situation of the business, and asking through him the opinion of the House, whether there was a probability of obtaining from any part of the country more advantageous terms; and whether it would be advisable, in the expectation of such an event, to keep open the contract for any longer period. It appears to have been an object of this letter, through the medium of that body, to excite, if possible, some further competition. But the end was not answered. The Speaker, in his reply, states that no competition had been excited in consequence of it, and that, though the terms proposed by Banks were thought too high, yet as no other proposals had been made, and as the pressing necessities of the Army called for immediate relief, it was deemed needless to keep open the contract any longer, under an idea that more advantageous propositions might be made. Under these circumstances, on the 18th of the same month of February, a contract with Hunter, Banks, & Co., was concluded, and was immediately after notified to the Superintendent of Finance.

6. It is stated by General Greene, in his representation to Congress, that the company's funds were inadequate to the execution of what they had undertaken; that bills sold greatly under par, and few could be sold at any rate; that the funds of which the company were possessed were tied up by prior engagements; that the creditors insisted on further security, before they would consent to an application of those funds for the support of the Army. That he was reduced to a choice of difficulties, either to turn the Army loose upon the country, or take upon himself the risk of supporting the contractors; that he chose the latter, as the least evil, and became bound for them to their creditors for a sum of upwards of thirty thousand pounds sterling; that to render the hazard as small as possible, he made the company give an order on their agent in Philadelphia, Mr. Pettit, for all the contract money and sums due upon the clothing department, to be paid into the hands of the persons whose debts he had guaranteed, and that one of the creditors was sent forward to receive them; but that these funds were diverted into other channels.

And it appears, in proof, that public bills were, as alleged, of very difficult sale, being subject to a discount of 15 per cent. for prompt payment, (as much as 25 being sometimes demanded;) that the Army, at the time when this engagement was entered into by General Greene, was in a very critical situation; that discontents, from various causes had produced several instances of actual mutiny; that if the contractors had failed, there was no ground to count on any other resource as a substitute, and if a want of provisions had been added to other causes of dissatisfaction, there was reason to apprehend a disbanding or dissolution of the Army. That General Greene, on or about the 8th of April, 1783, did become surety for the contractors, to different persons, in very considerable sums; and it is to be inferred, as well from the fact itself, as from the evidence, that the doing of it was necessary, by quieting their creditors, to enable them to proceed in the supply of the Army.

It further appears, in proof, that Mr. Burnet, one of the company, had informed Mr. Pettit, their agent, that they had purchased a quantity of goods from British merchants in Charleston; that these goods had enabled them to undertake for the supply of the Army in clothing and provisions; and that they had stipulated with those merchants, "that the moneys arising from the contract should be appropriated to the payment of the debt contracted by that purchase." That repeated instructions, by letter, in the name of the company—sometimes in the handwriting of Banks, and sometimes of Burnet—"uniformly held up to him (Mr.

Petition of Catharine Greene.

Pettit) the idea of paying the produce of the contract to the same merchants, in proportion to their respective claims, of which they sent a list amounting to upwards of £32,000, due to three houses." That two payments, one for $23,875, and the other for $4,223, were made by him to the British merchants; that a Mr. Warrington, one of them, had come forward to Philadelphia to receive the money, both on his own account, and as an agent for others; but that, in consequence of subsequent arrangements and instructions, the residue of the contract money was diverted to other purposes.

7. Precautions were taken by General Greene, when he became apprised of his danger, to obtain counter security. This was actually effected to a considerable extent; but it seems now reduced to a certainty, that a loss of not less than eight thousand pounds sterling will be sustained by his estate, in consequence of the transaction, unless indemnified by the Government; and that the probable result will be the entire ruin of the estate.

8. No document appears, showing that the notice of his having become surety for the company, was ever given by General Greene to Congress, or any of the Public Departments, prior to his representations of the 22d August, 1785, claiming an indemnity in case of such eventual loss. The omission of such notice, is indeed to be inferred, from the silence of that representation on the point. The evidence of the foregoing facts is to be found in the documents herewith submitted, marked from A to Z inclusively.

Under this state of facts, it remains to be considered whether it be incumbent upon the Government of the United States to grant the indemnification to the estate of Major General Greene, which is sought by the petition.

Objections to such an indemnification might arise from three sources.

I. Want of authority from the Government to enter into the suretyship in question.

But this, it is conceived, would not be a valid objection. There certainly are numerous cases in which the commanding officer of an Army is justifiable in doing more than he has a regular authority to do, from the exigency of particular conjunctures. And where it appears that the unauthorized procedure was prudent and necessary in itself, and was warranted by motives sufficiently important and emergent, it is just and proper in the Government to ratify what has been done, and to indemnify the officer from injury on account of it. That an emergency of this kind did exist, to justify the measure which was adopted by General Greene, appears to be satisfactorily established. The keeping of the Army from disbanding, may be presumed, upon strong grounds of evidence, to have materially depended upon it. And there does not seem to have been a deficiency of precaution in guarding, as far as was practicable, against eventual loss.

II. A personal or private interest in doing what was foreign to the duties and relations of a commanding officer.

This, if it should exist, would be a decisive objection. The existence of it having been alleged, it remains to examine what probability there is of the allegation being well founded. Its source is traced to a letter of John Banks, containing a suggestion, or conjecture, that General Greene was, or probably would be, concerned in the co-partnership of Hunter, Banks, & Co.

But this circumstance loses all force from the following considerations:

1. From a letter, which General Greene wrote to John Banks, dated the 25th of December, 1782, in which the General makes his acknowledgments to Mr. Banks, for the services he had rendered to the Army, in respect to clothing, and invites him to become a competitor for supplying it with provisions. The scope and language of this letter strongly indicate that General Greene had then no interested connexion with Mr. Banks, in relation to any of the matters which are the subjects of it. As this conclusion results rather from the general tenor of the letter than from particular expressions, its justness will best appear by an insertion of the entire letter. It is in these words:

"HEADQUARTERS, Dec. 25, 1782.

"DEAR SIR: The comfortable condition in which you have put the Army, from the large supply of blankets and clothing furnished it, claims my particular acknowledgments; for although I expect the public will make you a reasonable compensation, yet as you were the only person who had the will and the means to serve us, our obligation is equally great. I am happy to find, also, that most if not all our officers are likely to get supplies of clothing through your agency. Col. Carrington, who is appointed to make the contracts for the subsistence of the Southern Army, also informs me your house have it in contemplation to engage in this business. Great as all our other obligations are, if you contract for the supplies of the Army, this will be greater than all the rest; for the present mode, in which we are supplied, is truly distressing, both to the people and to the Army. The manner of collecting, by military parties, renders it distressing to the citizens, and from the uncertain collections, the Army is often without anything to eat. This is hard upon troops who have bled so freely for an oppressed people. I must beg you to hasten your proposals; and I flatter myself you will, from your attachment to the cause, as well as a regard for the Army, serve the public on the lowest terms.

"I am, dear sir, your most obedient servant,

"NATH. GREENE.

"Mr. JOHN BANKS."

2. From the pains taken by that officer to induce competition from other quarters; the delays which, with his participation and direction, attended an acceptance of the proposals made by Hunter, Banks, & Co., after the time for receiving proposals had expired, in order to afford a still further opportunity for other proposals, and to bring that company to more moderate terms; the reference which, in the last resort, was had to the Assembly of South Carolina, as the only remaining expedient for exciting a competition, which had in vain been sought by other means; and respecting which Colonel Carrington, in his affidavit, (document R,) expresses himself in these strong terms: "General Greene would not suffer a contract to be closed, without making every possible effort to excite a competition, and as a last resort, a letter was written to the Assembly of South Carolina," &c.; circumstances which satisfactorily prove that General Greene had, in the first instance, no common interest with Hunter, Banks, & Co., in the contract for supplying the Army with provisions.

3. From a letter of Mr. Forsyth, one of the partners, to General Greene, December 29th, 1782, (document F,) in which he thanks General Greene for a letter of approbation of his public conduct, and expresses a hope of that countenance and aid from the General, in private life, which he had enjoyed while serving under his command; and then proceeds to mention the case of a brig, belonging to the company, which had been seized at Savannah, and asks, as a favor, a letter from the General to the Judge before whom the cause of the vessel was expected to be tried, to remove a prejudice against Mr. Banks, (as being a person inimical to the American cause,) which, it was feared, might occasion her condemnation. The style of this letter is the reverse of that of one partner writing to another, on a subject of mutual interest. It is that of a person who had received favors from a patron, asking a further favor.

4. From the counter-securities which General Greene took, in consequence of his having become surety for the company, to their creditors; one being a bond, from Banks, Patton, and Hunter, three of the partners, bearing date the 7th of May, 1783, (document M,) in which it is acknowledged, as is usual in such cases, that General Greene had no concern in the debts for which he had become bound; and the parties accordingly engage to exonerate him from those debts, or any damages which might arise from his becoming security for them: another being an assignment from Robert Forsyth, another of the partners, to General Greene, bearing date the 2d of September, 1784, (document N,) of debts due to the partnership, as a counter-security to him; in which it is stated, that General Greene, at the special instance and request of the company, had become their security to certain persons, to whom they were indebted. The latter, however, being a considerable time after the transaction, is far less conclusive than the former.

5. From the affidavits of John Banks and James Hunter, two of the partners, one dated the 3d of January, 1783, (document O,) the other 26th of September, 1785, (document P;) the first, denying explicitly all connexion of General Greene in the affairs of the company; the last, declaring that the deponent never considered General Greene as directly or indirectly interested in the purchase of the goods upon which the debts, for which he had become bound, appear to have been founded: that this purchase was on the proper account of John Banks, Robert Forsyth, Ichabod Burnet, John Ferrie, Robert Patton, and the deponent; and that he never heard nor understood, from either of the other partners, that General Greene was any way concerned or interested in that purchase. There is also a certificate from Robert Forsyth, of the 3d of March, 1785, (document Q,) declaring that the General was not interested, either in that purchase, or in the contract for the Army.

6. From a suit in Chancery, which was brought by General Greene, and after his death prosecuted by his executors to a recovery, against John Ferrie, one of the partners of the house of Hunter, Banks, & Co.; which suit, it appears, might have been defeated by proof of interest in the partnership, on the part of General Greene; but not only no such proof was made, but it is asserted on oath, by Charles C. Pinckney, (document Y,) who was solicitor and counsel for Ferrie, and who professes to have obtained, in a professional capacity, considerable knowledge of their affairs, that Ferrie had assisted Banks in the purchase of the goods in question, had been instrumental in his obtaining credit, had kept the books of the company, and appeared to have known all the concerns of the company most intimately and minutely; that if General Greene had been concerned in the speculation, he (Ferrie) must have known it, and that, knowing it, he would have made it known. That he was under no obligation to conceal it, having been put at defiance by the suit, and could he have proved the fact, he would have been successful in his defence; but he neither produced one tittle of evidence, nor deduced a single circumstance to show, that the General had, in any manner, been concerned in the purchase. The consequence of which was, that the bill was sustained, the lands were decreed to be sold, and after defraying the expenses of the suit, and discharging the money due on a mortgage which had been given by a prior owner, the balance of the sale was directed to be paid over into the hands of the complainant, towards an indemnification of the General. This statement has peculiar force, especially as the General, by commencing the suit, exposed himself to the hazard, if any connexion of the interest had subsisted, either of being defeated, by a discovery of that connexion, on oath, upon a cross bill, or of perjury, in the concealment and denial of it.

7. From a certificate (document X,) of the two Chancellors of South Carolina, which, after stating the insinuations that had been made of General Greene's connexion with Hunter, Banks, & Co., proceeds thus:

"We think ourselves authorized to say, that we are as competent to his vindication, from any aspersion of that nature, as any two persons in the State of South Carolina, as we were both in the Executive Department at the time of the evacuation of this capital—the one, Governor, and the other Lieutenant Governor—and a suit in Chancery has since been brought to issue before us as Chancellors, in the prosecution of which, the several grounds, principles, and obligations of the various connexions or copartnerships, by whom the respective speculations alluded to were entered into, were very fully, ably, and minutely discussed, by some of the most eminent solicitors in the Court. And we have no hesitation, in the most invariable, unreserved, and unequivocal manner, to declare, that we never had, from our own observation, or from the strictest and most scrutinizing investigation on the Chancery bench, the most distant reason to conceive, that the Honorable General Greene was ever, either directly or indirectly, engaged in any of the aforesaid speculations, any further than as surety for Mr. Banks. We think ourselves warranted also in asserting, that the contract with Mr. Banks, for the supply of the Army, was the most advantageous he could obtain, at a time when the want of provisions threatened a mutiny.

“JOHN MATHEWS, “RICHARD HUTSON.

“CHARLESTON, October 30, 1790.”

8. From the concurrent opinions of other respectable characters, who had the best opportunities of judging of circumstances, that General Greene was totally unconnected in interest with that company. On this point, the documents S, T, U, V, W, Z, are interesting; that marked V, states several particulars as argumentative of the opinion expressed, which merit particular attention.

From the foregoing circumstances combined, there is conceived to be conclusive evidence that General Greene was not interested, either in the purchase of the goods, which had created the debts afterwards guaranteed by him, nor in either of the contracts for clothing or provisions; was not a partner in the house of Hunter, Banks, & Co., nor had any concern whatever in the affairs of that company further than as surety.

There is nothing to oppose these conclusions, but the suggestion in Banks's letter, and the fact of the suretyship. The former is obviated by the contradiction, on oath, of the party himself; and the circumstances of this contradiction, as represented by General Wayne and Colonel Carrington, in their affidavits, (documents T and S,) give it every possible appearance of genuineness. A question naturally arises, What could have been the inducement to the suggestion made by Banks? This is answered by Colonel Carrington, who represents him as a man of “excessive vanity, much disposed to make a show of connexions with high characters.” It is also possible that he may have expected to derive advantage from the reputation of such a connexion. The observation, moreover, is of great force, that if General Greene had been a secret partner, unknown to the partners in general, Banks's character precludes the supposition that he would have been the selected depository of the secret.

The fact of the suretyship is accounted for, by the necessity of the measure, as it related to the situation of the Army; and relying on the appropriation of the funds, which should arise out of the contracts with the public, to the payment of the persons to whom he had become bound, it was natural that he should have considered the risk as not very great.

This full statement of the circumstances, which are conceived to exculpate General Greene from the imputation of being concerned in the transaction, has appeared not only essential to placing the merits of the subject properly before the House, but a debt due to the memory of an officer who had rendered essential service to his country; and of a man who, by a life of probity, had secured to himself the strongest of all titles to a candid construction of his conduct.

It remains to advert to the third source of objection which had been intimated, as capable of bringing into question the propriety of an indemnification—namely, the omission of notice to the Government, at or about the time of the transaction, that the suretyship in question had been entered into.

Here, in the judgment of the Secretary, lies the only difficulty which attends the question of indemnification.

It appears to have been incumbent upon General Greene, if he meant to look to the Government for indemnification, in case of eventual loss, to have given early notice of the step he had taken. In proportion as that step was unauthorized or unusual, the necessity for the communication was increased. It seems to be a matter of obvious propriety, that a public officer, who expects the sanction of the Government to an unauthorized proceeding—especially an indemnification against pecuniary loss, on account of it—ought to embrace the first convenient opportunity to make known the object for which such sanction and indemnification are desired. And the motives on the part of the Government to require a due observance of that precaution, are of great force in regard to the security of the public. It is necessary, to enable the Government to investigate the circumstances, at the time, when the truth can best be discovered, and unfounded pretensions best be detected. And where an indemnification against pecuniary loss is expected, a prompt disclosure is necessary to put the Government in a condition to take care of its own interests, in the manner which shall appear to itself most efficacious.

It is, indeed, to be observed, that General Greene was naturally led to imagine that all hazard in the affair was obviated by the measures which had been taken to secure, as he supposed, an application of the moneys to be received from the public, on account of the contract, to the payment of the debts for which he had become surety, and therefore omitted a communication to the Government, as not necessary to his safety.

But whether this, which appears to be a satisfactory explanation of the motive for the omission, which did take place, be also a sufficient ground for dispensing with the observance of a precaution which, as a general rule, would be proper to be made a condition of indemnification; or how far the peculiar merit of the officer, or the peculiar hardship and misfortune of the case, may render advisable a deviation from that rule, are points which the Secretary begs leave to submit, without observation, to the contemplation of Legislative discretion.

If a direct indemnification should be conceived inadmissible, as a public precedent, a question would still present itself, whether, under all the circumstances of the case, the family of Gen. Greene ought to be left to the ruinous consequences of an act, which was dictated by a well-advised zeal for the public service, because he omitted a precaution which the rules of public policy may require to have been observed.

The Secretary is not certain, whether an opinion on this point be within the province assigned him by the reference, which is the subject of this Report, and he therefore forbears an explicit sentiment. He hopes, however, to be thought justified by the occasion, when he permits himself to observe, that strong and extraordinary motives of national gratitude for the very signal and very important services rendered by General Greene to his country, must serve to give a keener sting to the regret which ought ever to attend the necessity of a strict adherence to maxims of public policy, in opposition to claims founded on useful acts of zeal for the public service, if no means of protecting from indigence and penury the family of that most meritorious officer shall, upon examination, be found admissible.

The Public Debt.

All which is humbly submitted.

ALEXANDER HAMILTON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

To the Honorable the Senate and the Honorable the House of Representatives of the United States, in Congress assembled; the petition of Catharine Greene, relict of the late General Greene, humbly sheweth:

That the object on which her petition is founded is generally stated in the representation hereunto annexed, made by her late husband to the United States in Congress assembled, on the 22d day of August, 1785.

That it will appear, by the said representation, that it was the intention of her late husband to have ascertained the loss on the transaction therein stated, previously to his making application to the United States for indemnification; and in pursuit of this intention, he instituted suits for the recovery of the bonds and mortgages by him received from Messrs. Banks and Company, as collateral securities; but his designs in this and all other earthly respects were frustrated by his untimely death.

That the suits for the recovery of the said bonds and other collateral securities have been protracted by the death of the debtors, and various other circumstances entirely without the control of your petitioner.

That while the recovery of the said bonds and other collateral securities are placed at a future distant period, and their amount uncertain, not only the estates conferred on her late husband, by the munificent gratitude of the States of South Carolina and Georgia, but his paternal estate, will be legally wrested from your petitioner and her children, in order to satisfy those obligations which her late husband was constrained to enter into for the public service; whereby your petitioner, and her helpless children, will be exposed to all the bitter effects of poverty.

That your petitioner thus brings forward her situation, and that of her children, with the firmest hope and expectation that the United States will, after a full examination into the transaction stated in her late husband's representation, grant her effectual relief, by assuming the payment of the said obligations entered into for the benefit of the United States; or in such other manner, save her and her children's estate from impending ruin, as in the judgment of Congress shall appear meet and proper.

And your petitioner, as in duty bound, shall continue to pray.

CATHARINE GREENE.

THE PUBLIC DEBT.

[Communicated to the House of Representatives, December 8, 1792.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
November 30, 1792.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a Report, pursuant to two resolutions of the House Representatives, one of the 21st instant, respecting the redemption of the Public Debt; the other of the 22d instant, respecting the reimbursement of the Loan made of the Bank of the United States, pursuant to the eleventh section of the act by which it is incorporated; and to be, with the most perfect respect, sir, your most obedient, and most humble servant,

ALEXANDER HAMILTON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

The Honorable the SPEAKER,
of the House of Representatives.

In obedience to two resolutions of the House of Representatives, one of the 21st instant, directing the SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY to Report a plan for the redemption of so much of the Public Debt, as by the act, entitled "An act making provision for the Debt of the United States," the United States have reserved the right to redeem; the other, of the 22d instant, directing him to Report the plan of a provision for the reimbursement of the Loan made of the Bank of the United States, pursuant to the eleventh section of the act, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States:"—the said SECRETARY respectfully submits the following Report:

The expediency of taking measures for the regular redemption of the Public Debt, according to the right which has been reserved to the Government, being wisely predetermined, by the resolution of the House of Representatives referring the subject to the Secretary, nothing remains for him, but to endeavor to select and submit the most eligible means of providing for the execution of that important object.

With this view, the first inquiry which naturally presents itself, is, whether the existing revenues are, or are not, adequate to the purpose?

The estimates which accompany the Report of the Secretary of the 14th instant,* will show that, during the continuance of the present Indian war, the appropriations for interest and the demands for the current service are likely to exhaust the product of the existing revenues; though they afford a valuable surplus beyond the permanent objects of expenditure, which, it is hoped, may ere long be advantageously applied to accelerate the extinguishment of the Debt.

In the mean time, however, and until the restoration of peace, the employment of that resource, in this way, must of necessity be suspended; and either the business of redemption must be deferred, or recourse must be had to other expedients.

But did no such temporary necessity, for resorting to other expedients, exist, the doing of it would still be recommended by weighty considerations. It would appear, in the abstract, advisable, to leave the surplus of the present revenues free, to be applied to such casual exigencies as may from time to time occur, to occasional purchases of the Debt when not exhausted by such exigencies, to the payment of interest on any balances, which may be found due to particular States, upon the general settlement of accounts, and finally to the payment of interest on the deferred part of the Debt, when the period for such payment arrives. There is a reasonable prospect, that if not diverted it will be found adequate to the two last important purposes.

Relinquishing then the idea of an immediate application of the present revenues to the object in view, it remains to examine what other modes are in the option of the Legislature.

Loans, from time to time, equal to the sums annually redeemable, and bottomed on the same revenues, which are now appropriated to pay the interest upon those sums, offer themselves as one expedient, which may be employed with a degree of advantage. As there is a probability of borrowing at a lower rate of interest, a material saving would result; and even this resource, if none better could be devised, ought not to be neglected.

But it is obvious, that to rely upon this resource alone would be to do little towards the final exoneration of the nation. To stop at that point would consequently be neither provident nor satisfactory. The interests as well as the expectations of the Union require something more effectual.

The establishment of additional revenues is the remaining resource. This, if the business is to be undertaken in earnest, is unavoidable. And a full confidence may reasonably be entertained, that the community will see with satisfaction the employment of these means, which alone can be effectual, for accomplishing an end, in itself so important, and so much an object of general desire. It cannot fail to be universally felt, that if the end is to be attained, the necessary means must be employed.

It can only be expected that care be taken to choose such as are liable to fewest objections, and that in the modifications of the business in other respects, due regard be had to the present and progressive circumstances of the country.

Assuming it as the basis of a plan of redemption, that additional revenues are to be provided, the further inquiry divides itself into the following branches:

I. Shall a revenue be immediately constituted, equal to the full sum which may at present be redeemed, according to the terms of the contract?

II. Shall a revenue be constituted from year to year, equal only to the interest of the sum to be redeemed in each year, coupling with this operation an annual Loan, commensurate with such sum? or,

III. Shall a revenue be constituted each year so much exceeding the interest of the sum to be redeemed, as to be sufficient, within a short definite term of time, to discharge the principal itself; coupling with this operation also, an annual Loan, equal to the sum to be annually redeemed, and appropriating the revenue created to its discharge, within the term which shall have been pre-determined?

The first plan, besides being completely effectual, would be eventually most economical; but considering to what a magnitude the revenues of the United States have grown in a short period, it is not easy to pronounce how far the faculty of paying might not be strained by any sudden considerable augmentation, wheresoever immediately placed; while the rapid progress of the country in population and resource seems to afford a moral certainty, that the necessary augmentation may be made with convenience, by successive steps, within a moderate term of time; and invites to temporary and partial suspensions, as capable of conciliating the reasonable accommodation of the community with the vigorous prosecution of the main design. For these and for other reasons which will readily occur, the course of providing immediately the entire sum to be redeemed, is conceived not to be the most eligible.

The second plan, though much more efficacious than that of annual Loans bottomed on the revenues now appropriated for the payment of interest on the sums to be redeemed, does not appear to be sufficiently efficacious. The schedule A will show the effect of it to the 1st of January, 1802, when the Deferred Debt will become redeemable in the proportions stipulated. Supposing the investment of the interest which is each year liberated, together with that which has been, and will be released by purchases, pursuant to provisions heretofore made, in the purchase of six per cent. stock; a sum of principal equal to $2,043,837 07 would be sunk, and a clear annuity, equal to $459,212 82 would be created, toward further redemptions; but the fund then necessary for the future progressive redemption of the Debt, according to the right reserved, would be $1,126,616 44, exceeding by $667,403 62, the amount of the redeeming fund. Something more effectual than this is certainly desirable, and appears to be practicable.

The last of the three plans best accords with the most accurate view, which the Secretary has been able to take of the public interest.

In its application, it is of material consequence to endeavor to accomplish these two points:

1st. The complete discharge of the sums annually redeemable, within the period prefixed, and the reimbursement, within the same period, of all auxiliary Loans, which may have been made for that purpose.

The Public Debt.

2d. The constituting, by the expiration of that period, a clear annual fund competent to the future redemption of the Debt, to the extent of the right reserved.

The period, to which it is conceived the plan ought to refer, that is, January 1st, 1802; because then the first payment, on account of the principal of the Deferred Debt, may rightfully be made.

In conformity to these ideas, the following plan is most respectfully submitted; premising, that the sum redeemable for the first year of the six per cent. stock, bearing a present interest, is computed at $550,000.

Let an annual fund be constituted during the present session, equal to $103,199 06, and to begin to accrue from the 1st of January, 1793. Let the sum of $550,000 be borrowed upon the credit of this annuity, reimbursable within five years, that is, by the 1st of January, 1799. The sum borrowed to be applied, on 1st of January, 1794, to the first payment on account of the principal of the Debt.

The proposed annuity will reimburse the sum borrowed with interest, by the 1st of January, 1799, and will thenceforth, be free for any further application.

The sum redeemable the second year, that is, January 1, 1795, is computed at $583,000.

Let an annual fund be constituted, during the second session after the present, equal to $109,391 60, to begin to accrue from the 1st of January, 1794. Let the sum of $583,000 be borrowed upon the credit of this annuity, reimbursable within five years, that is, by the 1st of January, 1800. The sum borrowed to be applied, on the 1st of January, 1795, to the second payment on account of the principal of the Debt.

The proposed annuity will reimburse the sum borrowed, with interest, by the 1st of January, 1800, and will be thenceforth free for any further application.

The sum redeemable the third year, that is, January 1, 1796, is computed at $617,980.

Let an annual fund be constituted, during the third session after the present, equal to $115,955 17, to begin to accrue from the 1st of January, 1795. Let the sum of $617,980 be borrowed upon the credit of this annuity, reimbursable within five years, that is, by the 1st of January, 1801. The sum borrowed to be applied, on the 1st of January, 1796, to the third payment on account of the principal of the Debt.

The proposed annuity will reimburse the sum borrowed, with interest, by the 1st of January, 1802.

The sum redeemable the fourth year, that is, January 1st, 1797, is computed at $655,058 80.

Let an annual fund be constituted, during the fourth session after the present, equal to $122,912 48, to begin to accrue from the 1st of January, 1796. Let the sum of $655,058 80, be borrowed upon the credit of this annuity, reimbursable within five years, that is, by the 1st of January, 1802. The sum borrowed to be applied, on the 1st of January, 1797, to the fourth payment on account of the principal of the Debt.

The proposed annuity will reimburse the sum borrowed, with interest, by the 1st of January, 1802.

The sum redeemable the fifth year, that is, January 1st, 1798, is computed at $694,362 33.

Let an annual fund be constituted, during the fifth session after the present, equal to $152,743 12, to begin to accrue from the 1st of January, 1797. Let the sum of $694,362 33, be borrowed upon the credit of this annuity, reimbursable within four years, that is, by the 1st of January, 1802. The sum borrowed to be applied, on the 1st of January, 1798, to the fifth payment on account of the principal of the Debt.

The proposed annuity will reimburse the sum borrowed, with interest, by the 1st of January, 1802.

The sum redeemable the sixth year, that is, January 1st, 1799, is computed at $736,024 07.

Let an annual fund be constituted, during the sixth session after the present, equal to $197,680 20, to begin to accrue from the 1st of January, 1798. Let the sum of $736,024 07, be borrowed upon the credit of this annuity, reimbursable within three years, that is, by the 1st of January, 1802. The sum borrowed to be applied, on the 1st of January, 1799, to the sixth payment on account of the principal of the Debt.

The proposed annuity will reimburse the sum borrowed, with interest, by the 1st of January, 1802.

The sum redeemable the seventh year, that is, January 1st, 1800, is computed at $780,185 52.

Let an annual fund be constituted, during the seventh session after the present, equal to $272,848 38, to begin to accrue from the 1st of January, 1799. Let the sum of $780,185 52, be borrowed upon the credit of this annuity, reimbursable within two years, that is, by the 1st of January, 1802. The sum borrowed to be applied, on the 1st of January, 1800, to the seventh payment on account of the principal of the Debt.

The proposed annuity will reimburse the sum borrowed, with interest, by the 1st of January, 1802.

The sum redeemable the eighth year, that is, on the 1st of January, 1801, is computed at $826,996 65.

Let an annual fund be constituted, during the eighth session after the present, equal to $423,583 64, to begin to accrue from the 1st of January, 1800. Let the sum of $826,996 65, be borrowed upon the credit of this annuity, reimbursable within one year, that is, on the 1st of January, 1802. The sum borrowed to be applied, on the 1st of January, 1801, to the eighth payment on account of the principal of the Debt.

The proposed annuity will reimburse the sum borrowed, with interest, on the 1st of January, 1802.

The sum redeemable the ninth year, that is, on the 1st of January, 1802, is computed at $1,126,616 44.

The then existing means for the discharge of this sum, arising from the operation of the plan, will be—

1st. The amount of the annuity constituted the third year, which will have been liberated by reimbursement of the the third Loan.

2d. The arrears of interest not previously appropriated, and which are computed at $200,000.

There will consequently be a deficiency this year of $610,661 27, which will require to be supplied by a temporary Loan, to be reimbursed out of the surplus of the fund which, on the 1st of January, 1802, will exist for future redemptions, and which surplus will be sufficient to reimburse this temporary Loan in about thirteen years and a half.

It may be proper to remark, that this deficiency upon one year is suffered to exist, to avoid an unnecessary augmentation of revenue, materially beyond the sum permanently requisite. No inconvenience ensues, because this temporary deficiency is made up by the surplus of the permanent fund, within the period mentioned. And that fund, from the 1st of January, 1802, is adequate to all future redemptions, in the full proportion permitted by the contract.

The table in the schedule B, herewith submitted, will show in one view, the principles and operation of this plan.

The schedule C, will exhibit the means of constituting the several annuities proposed to be established. From it, will be seen, that the proposed annuities are to be composed partly of taxes to be successively laid, at the respective periods of creating them, partly of the surplus dividend to be expected on the stock belonging to the Government, in the Bank of the United States, beyond the interest to be paid on account of it, and partly of the funds heretofore pledged for the payment of interest, which will have been liberated upon so much of the Debt as will have been extinguished.

The respective amounts of the taxes to be severally laid, will be—

In the 1st year,	- - -	$ 43,199 06
In the 2d year,	- - -	109,391 60
In the 3d year,	- - -	115,955 17

Making together, - - - $691,530 95

The sum which will have been redeemed prior to the 1st day of January, 1802, will be $5,443,607 37. The sum redeemable on the 1st of January, 1802, will be $1,126,616 44; and the fund, which will thenceforth exist for the purpose of future redemption, as is particularly shown by the schedule D, will be $1,210,744 34; exceeding the sum strictly necessary by $84,127 90; a fund, which including the interest from year to year liberated, will, as already intimated, be completely adequate to the final redemption of the whole amount of six per cent. stock, as well the deferred as that bearing a present interest, according to the right which has been reserved for that purpose.

In the meantime, a further impression will be made upon the Debt by the investment of the residue of the funds, heretofore established, in the purchase of it; and it is hoped that the restoration of peace with the Indians will enable the application of the surplus of the existing revenues, together with the proceeds of the ceded lands in our Western Territory, to the same object. These, whenever they can be brought into action, will be important aids, materially accelerating the ultimate redemption of the entire Debt. The employment of these resources, when it can be done, by increasing the interest fund, will proportionably lessen the necessity of using the resource of taxation for creating the proposed annuities, if the Government shall judge it advisable to avail itself of the substitute which may accrue from that circumstance.

Having now given a general view of the plan, which has appeared upon the whole the most eligible, it is necessary in the next place to present to the consideration of the House the requisite funds for commencing the execution of it. These will embrace a provision for the first annuity only; that alone requiring, by the plan, immediate provision. With regard to a provision for the subsequent annuities, which is proposed to be successive, the Secretary will content himself with this general observation, that he discerns no intrinsic difficulty in making provision for them, as fast as shall be necessary, with due convenience to the people, and consistently with the idea of abstaining from taxing lands and buildings, (with the stock and implements of farms,) reserving them as a resource for those great emergencies, which call for a full exertion of all the contributive faculties of a country.

The following means for constituting the first annuity, are respectfully submitted, viz:

Annual surplus of the dividend on the stock of Government in the Bank of the United States, beyond the interest to be paid out of the said dividend, estimated at $60,000.

Tax on horses, kept or used for the purpose of riding, or of drawing any coach, chariot, phaeton, chaise, chair, sulkey, or other carriage, for conveyance of persons; excepting and exempting all horses which are usually and chiefly employed for the purposes of husbandry, or in drawing wagons, wains, drays, carts, or other carriages, for the transportation of produce, goods, merchandise, and commodities, or in carrying burdens, in the course of the trade or occupation of the persons to whom they respectively belong, and the horses of persons in the military service of the United States, viz:

For every horse, not above excepted and exempted, at the rate of one dollar per annum, where only one is used or kept by the same person; with an addition of fifty cents per annum per horse, where more than one and not more than two horses are kept or used by the same person; with an addition of one dollar per annum per horse where more than two, and not more than four are kept or used by the same person; and with an addition of one dollar and a half per horse, per annum, where more than four are kept or used by the same person: Provided, That this addition shall not be made in respect to horses usually employed in public stages, for the conveyance of passengers.

This progressive increase of rates on the higher numbers, has reference to the presumption of greater wealth, which arises from the possession of such higher numbers.

The product of this tax will probably be about equal to the residue of the proposed annuity, which is $43,199 06. How near the truth this estimate may prove, experiment alone can, in so untried a case, decide. An aid to this fund may be derived from the surplus dividend on the Bank stock, for the half year ending the last of December next, which it is presumed will be not less than twenty thousand dollars. Should a deficiency appear upon trial, it can be supplied by a future provision.

Proper regulations for the collection of this tax will, it is believed, be found not difficult, if the tax itself shall be deemed eligible. Its simplicity has been a considerable recommendation of it. Qualified as it is, it is not likely to fall on any but such who can afford to pay it. The exemption from the tax, in regard to horses which are appropriated to the purposes of husbandry, or of any trade or occupation, or to the transportation of commodities, seems to obviate all reasonable objection.

If, however, there should appear to the Legislature, reasons for preferring a tax on carriages for pleasure—which, it may be observed, will operate on nearly the same description of persons—the sum required may, it is believed, be produced from the following arrangement of rates, viz:

Upon every coach, the annual sum of four dollars; upon every chariot, the annual sum of three dollars; upon every other carriage for the conveyance of persons, having four wheels, the annual sum of two dollars; and upon every chair, sulkey, or other carriage, for the conveyance of persons, having less than four wheels, the annual sum of one dollar.

The collection of this tax will be as simple and easy, and perhaps more certain, than that which has been primarily submitted.

With regard to the second object referred to the Secretary, namely, the plan of a provision for the reimbursement of the Loan made of the Bank of the United States, pursuant to the eleventh section of the act by which it is incorporated, the following is respectfully submitted, to wit: That power be given by law to borrow the sum due, to be applied to that reimbursement: and that so much of the dividend on the stock of the Government in the Bank as may be necessary, be appropriated for paying the interest of the sum to be borrowed.

From this operation, it is obvious that a saving to the Government will result, equal to the difference between the interest which will be payable on the new Loan and that which is payable on the sum now due to the Bank. If the proposed Loan can be effected at the rate of those last made in Holland, the nett saving to the Government may be computed at the annual sum of $35,000; which saving, whatever it may be, is contemplated as part of the means for constituting the proposed annuities.

The benefit of this arrangement will be accelerated, if provision be made for the application of the proceeds of any Loans heretofore obtained, to the payment suggested, on the condition of replacing the sums which may be so applied out of the proceeds of the Loan or Loans which shall be made pursuant to the power above proposed to be given.

It will also conduce to the general end in view, if the Legislature shall think proper, to authorize the investment of the funds destined for the purchases of the Debt, in purchases of six per cent. stock, at the market price, though above par. The comparative prices of the several kinds of stock have been, and frequently may be, such as to render it more profitable to make investments in the six per cents. than in any other species of stock.

All which is humbly submitted.

ALEXANDER HAMILTON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, November 30, 1792.

ALEXANDER HAMILTON.

[Communicated to the House of Representatives, January 4, 1793.]

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES,
Monday, December 24, 1792.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before this House an account of the application of the moneys borrowed in Antwerp and Amsterdam for the United States within the present year.

Thursday, December 27.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause this House to be furnished with a particular account of the several sums borrowed under his authority by the United States; the terms on which each Loan has been obtained; the applications to which any of the moneys have been made, agreeably to appropriations; and the balances, if any, which remain unapplied. In this statement, it is requested that it may be specified at what times interest commenced on the several sums obtained, and at what times it was stopped, by the several payments made.

Loans.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 3, 1793.

SIR: In obedience to an order of the President of the United States, I have the honor to transmit sundry statements, Nos. I, II, III, IV, respecting the several Foreign Loans which have been made under his authority, by the United States, showing, in conformity to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 27th of December, as far as the materials in the possession of the Treasury will now permit, the several particulars specified in that resolution. These statements will equally fulfil the object of the resolution of the House of the 24th of December.

With perfect respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient and humble servant,
ALEXANDER HAMILTON.

The Hon. the SPEAKER of the House of Representatives.

No. 1.

Statement of the several sums which have been borrowed for the use of the United States, by virtue of the acts of the 4th and 12th of August, 1790, showing the particular application of the moneys to the 1st of January, 1793, inclusively, and the balance remaining unapplied.

REMARKS.

(a.) The dates here mentioned are those for commencing payments on account of the respective Loans. The usage is to allow a certain time to the subscribers (ordinarily from three to six months) to pay in the sums subscribed, the sums paid in in each month bearing interest from the beginning of the month. The schedule No. 2 shows the monthly periods of actual payment. The first of these Loans was set on foot by our bankers in Holland, without previous authority, for reasons of weight, respecting the interests and credit of the United States. A due regard to the motives and considerations relative to the yet unascertained effect of our financial arrangements in their first stages, led to an acceptance of that Loan on account of the Government. The fourth of these Loans was originally contracted for 3,000,000 of florins, but 950,000 florins were afterwards suppressed, in consequence of its being found that money had become obtainable at a lower rate of interest.

(b.) The conversion of florins into livres, in each case, is regulated by the actual market rate of exchange at the time of payment. It is, however, understood that there is to be a re-liquidation, with a view to certain equitable considerations. The rate of exchange for the proceeds of the Antwerp Loan is stated by analogy, no more certain rule being at present in possession of the Treasury.

(c.) The actual payment of this interest is not yet known at the Treasury, but an appropriation has been made for it, at the disposal of the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States in France.

(d.) Advice is received that this payment was going on, though it had not been completed. There is no cause to doubt that it has been since carried into full effect.

(e.) The produce of the bills drawn for this sum, and other particulars respecting it, will appear from the schedules Nos. 3 and 4.

According to the terms of all these Loans the United States are bound to reimburse, in fifteen years, by equal instalments, the first beginning the eleventh year; but the United States have reserved a right upon all except the two last to reimburse at any time at their pleasure. The reimbursement of the two last (according to the general usage of the country observed in all Loans by the United States prior to the present Government) cannot begin till the eleventh year.

ALEXANDER HAMILTON, Secretary of the Treasury.

REMARKS.

The bills drawn from the 15th December, 1790, to June, 1791, inclusively, have been sold at 36 4-11 ninetieths of a dollar per guilder, payable in sixty days, or in ninety, with interest for thirty days.

Those drawn in October and November, 1791, have been sold at the same rate of exchange for cash, or on a credit not exceeding ninety days, the purchaser paying interest for the whole term of the credit. The terms upon which the bills in April, 1792, have been disposed of were a credit of six months; the first two months without interest, and the last four months with an allowance of six per cent. by the purchaser, the rate of exchange as before. In July, August, and October, 1792, the rate of exchange was forty cents and seven mills per guilder, one moiety to be paid in two, and the other moiety in four months, with interest from the time of each sale. In November and December, 1792, the exchange was 36 4-11 ninetieths of a dollar.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 10, 1793.

SIR: The resolution of the House of Representatives of the 27th of December last having been considered as contemplating Foreign Loans only, the statements rendered to the House on the 3d instant, were confined merely to those objects.

But, lest a greater latitude should have been intended by that resolution, I have the honor to transmit, herewith, a supplementary statement, No. V., which contains the several sums that have been borrowed in the United States, under the authority of the President; and to be, with perfect respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

ALEXANDER HAMILTON, Secretary of the Treasury.

The Hon. SPEAKER of the House of Representatives of the United States.

No. V.

A statement of the moneys which have been borrowed in the United States, by the Government, and applied pursuant to several acts of Congress.

Under the act, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1790," the following sums were borrowed from the Bank of New York, and applied as specified in the said act, viz:

1790, March 31, $30,000
April 8, 25,000

55,000, at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, from the respective dates mentioned, to the 14th May, 1790, when the Loan was reimbursed.

Pursuant to the act, entitled "An act for raising a further sum of money for the protection of the frontiers, and for other purposes therein mentioned," a Loan has been obtained from the Bank of the United States, agreeably to a contract with the said Bank, dated the 25th of May, 1792, of $523,000* at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, reimbursable at the pleasure of the United States; upon which Loan there has been received in the Treasury, in the following instalments, and applied to the purpose for which it was appropriated—

$100,000	on the 1st of June,	1792.
100,000	1st of July,	1792.
100,000	1st of August,	1792.
100,000	1st of September,	1792.†

The interest accruing on the said instalments to the 1st of January, 1793, was made payable on that day, and thenceforth, until the reimbursement of the principal, the interest on the whole is to be paid half-yearly, namely, on the 1st of July and on the 1st of January, in each year.

The surplus of the duties laid by the act before mentioned, to be applied, as the same shall accrue, to the reimbursement of the principal and interest.

Pursuant to the act, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States," a Loan has been made, by the said Bank to the United States, of $2,000,000, at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, reimbursable in ten years, by equal annual instalments, or at any time sooner, or in any greater proportions that the Government may think fit.

This Loan has been applied as directed by the act under which it was borrowed.

The time when the interest commenced on $1,000,000 of the said Loan, is coincident with the time when the dividend upon the stock of the Bank began to accrue, namely: the 20th of December, 1791. Upon the remaining $1,000,000, interest commenced on the 1st of July, 1792.

ALEXANDER HAMILTON, *Secretary of the Treasury.*TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 10, 1793.

[Communicated to the Senate, January 18, 1793.]

The Senate passed the following order, January 15, 1793:

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Treasury lay before the Senate the account of the United States with the Bank of the United States, specifying the precise sums, with the dates of the debits and credits, from the institution of the Bank to the day the return is made.

That the Secretary of the Treasury also lay before the Senate, an account of the surplus of revenue appropriated to the purchase of the Public Debt, to the same period, specifying the sums and dates.

That he lay before the Senate, a statement of the money borrowed by virtue of the law passed August the 4th, 1790, with the appropriation of the amount, and the precise dates.

That he lay before the Senate the amount and application of the money borrowed by virtue of the law of August the 12th, 1790.

* Errata.—The true sum, agreeably to contract, was $523,500.

† This sum was not received till the 20th of September.

Loans and Finances.

And that he also lay before the Senate, an account exhibiting the probable surplus, and unappropriated revenue of the year 1792, stating, as far as possible, the dates and the sums.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 16, 1793.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit, herewith, pursuant to the order of the Senate of yesterday, the following documents, viz:

Books Nos. 1 and 2,* containing the current cash account between the United States and the Bank of the United States, from the commencement of the operations of that institution until this day.

Files A, B, C, D.*

A. Containing a series of accounts beginning the 16th of June, 1792, and ending the 5th of January, 1793, showing the cash account of the United States with the Office of Discount and Deposit of the Bank of the United States at Boston.

B. Containing a series of accounts, beginning the 29d of May, 1792, and ending the 5th of January, 1793, showing the cash account of the United States with the Office of Discount and Deposit of the Bank of the United States at New York.

C. Containing a series of accounts, beginning the 9th of August, 1792, and ending the 5th of January, 1793, showing similar accounts with the Office of Discount and Deposit at Baltimore.

D. Containing a series of accounts, beginning the 9th of June, and ending the 29d of December, 1792, showing similar cash accounts with the Office of Discount and Deposit at Charleston.

Statement E, being an abstract of the balances remaining in the several Offices of Discount and Deposit, at the respective periods of the last returns.

Statements AB and Nos. 1, 2, 3, being accounts of the sales of bills on Amsterdam, by the Bank of the United States, and the several offices of Discount and Deposit.

These documents fulfil the first object of the order above mentioned.

Statement F, showing the surplus of revenue appropriated to the purchase of the Public Debt. This surplus arose at the end of the year 1790, and was appropriated by an act of the 18th of August, 1790.

This fulfils the second object of the order, as I understand its meaning.

Statements (printed) Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4.†

These have been heretofore presented to the House of Representatives, and show, with as much detail and accuracy as is now in the power of the Treasury, the different Loans which have been made pursuant to the acts of the 4th and 12th of August, 1790, and their application, as far as it has gone.

These Loans having been contracted in virtue of the powers communicated by both acts, without particular reference to either, a specification of the Loans made upon each is, of course, not practicable. This mode of proceeding was indicated first, by an intimation from our bankers in Holland that a distinction might prove an embarrassment, (being a novelty, the reason of which would not be obvious to the money-lenders.) Secondly, by the consideration that, if the Loans were made upon both acts indiscriminately, their application could be regulated as circumstances, from time to time, should render advisable.

These documents fulfil, as far as is practicable, the third and fourth objects of the order.

Statement G, showing the probable unappropriated surplus of the public revenue during the year 1792. This fulfils, as far as can now be done, the last of the objects comprised in the order of the Senate. But, by way of explanation, I beg leave to refer to the printed statement D, which accompanied the estimate for the service of the present year, reported to the House of Representatives on the 14th of November last, and which is herewith transmitted.

The books Nos. 1 and 2, the papers contained in the files A, B, C, and D, and those marked AB, Nos. 1, 2, 3, are originals. They are sent, rather than transcripts, to avoid delay, as it is understood that the statements called for have reference to the deliberations of the Senate on the bill making appropriations for the service of the current year.

I suppose it would be most agreeable to the Senate to be enabled, as soon as possible, by the receipt of the information they have required, to proceed to a decision on that important subject; and, exposed as I am to very perplexing dilemmas, for the want of the requisite appropriations, in consequence of arrangements which it was my duty to enter into, to be able to keep pace with the exigencies of the public service, I could not but feel a solicitude to hasten the communication.

As the originals which have been mentioned are necessary documents of office, I request that the Senate will be pleased to cause them to be returned as soon as they shall have answered the purpose for which they have been required. With the most perfect respect, I have the honor to be, &c.

ALEXANDER HAMILTON, Secretary of the Treasury.

The VICE PRESIDENT of the United States and President of the Senate.

* "Books Nos. 1 and 2," and "files A, B, C, D," were returned, and are not now to be found.

† For these statements, see preceding tables.

A statement showing the probable surplus of the revenue of the United States, for the year 1792.

Nett product of duties on imports and tonnage, from the 1st of January to the 31st of December, 1792, as estimated (a)	-	$3,900,000 00
Nett products of duties on home-made spirits, as estimated	-	400,000 00
		4,300,000 00
APPROPRIATIONS.
Interest on the Public Debt for the year 1792	$2,849,194 73
For the support of Government for the same year, appropriated by the act of the 23d of December, 1791	600,000 00
Towards carrying into execution the act, entitled "An act making further and more effectual provision for the protection of the frontiers," appropriated by the act of the 2d of May, 1792	523,500 00
To defray any expense incurred in relation to the intercourse between the United States and foreign nations, appropriated by the act of the 8th of May, 1792	50,000 00
		4,022,694 73
Surplus	-	277,305 27

(a) This sum is estimated by adding to the ascertained product of the year 1791, an ascertained excess of product of the first two quarters of the year 1792, beyond the product of the first two quarters of the year 1791, being $252,319 11, and the estimated product for a half year, of the additional duties on imports, laid during the last session of Congress, and commencing on the 1st of July last, being $261,750. According to the information hitherto received at the Treasury, there is every probability that the amount of the duties for the last half year of 1792, will fully equal this calculation of their product, if in the ratio of the first half year, will exceed it.

LOANS.

[Communicated to the House of Representatives, February 4, 1783.]

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES U. S.

Wednesday, January 23, 1793.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House copies of the authorities under which Loans have been negotiated, pursuant to the acts of the 4th and 12th of August, 1790, together with copies of the authorities directing the application of the moneys borrowed.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause this House to be furnished with the names of the persons by whom and to whom the respective payments of the French Debt have been made in France, pursuant to the act for that purpose; specifying the dates of the respective drafts upon the Commissioners in Holland, and the dates of the respective payments of the Debt: A similar statement is requested respecting the Debts to Spain and Holland.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before this House an account, exhibiting, half-monthly, the balances between the United States and the Bank of the United States, including the several Branch Banks, from the commencement of those institutions to the end of the year 1792.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before this House an account of all moneys which may have come into the Sinking Fund, from the commencement of that institution to the present time; specifying the particular fund from which they have accrued, and exhibiting, half-yearly, the sums uninvested, and where deposited.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to this House the balance of all unapplied revenues at the end of the year 1792; specifying whether in money or bonds, and noting where the money is deposited: That he also make report of all unapplied moneys which may have been obtained by the several Loans authorized by law, and where such moneys are now deposited.

Report of the SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY, in pursuance of the foregoing resolutions:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Feb. 4, 1793.

SIR: I have lost no time in preparing, as far as has been practicable, consistently with the course of facts, the several statements required by the resolutions of the House of Representatives of the 23d of last month; and I have concluded to add to them such further statements as appeared to me necessary to convey fully the information which is understood to be the object of those resolutions. It was my first intention to submit these statements collectively, with such explanatory remarks as the occasion might demand; but finding on experiment, from the extent and variety of the matter involved in the resolutions, that more time will be requisite for a full development of it than I had anticipated, considerations of weight in my mind have determined me to present the different parts of the subject successively. Among other advantages incident to this course of proceeding, will be that of having it in my power to give a more accurate and mature view of the entire subject, without too great a dereliction of the current business of the Department. In executing the task I propose to myself, I shall rely on the indulgence of the House to a latitude of observation, corresponding with the peculiar circumstances of the case.

The resolutions to which I am to answer, were not moved without a pretty copious display of the reasons on which they were founded. These reasons are before the public, through the channel of the press. They are of a nature to excite attention, to beget alarm, to inspire doubts. Deductions of a very extraordinary complexion may, without forcing the sense, be drawn from them.

I feel it incumbent upon me to meet the suggestions which have been thrown out with decision and explicitness. And while I hope I shall let fall nothing inconsistent with that cordial and unqualified respect which I feel for the House of Representatives, while I acquiesce in the sufficiency of the motives that induced on their part the giving a prompt and free course to the investigation proposed, I cannot but resolve to treat the subject with a freedom which is due to truth and to the consciousness of a pure zeal for the public interest.

I begin with the last of the four resolutions, because it is that which seeks information relating to the most delicate and important of the suggestions that have been hazarded.

Here, however, I have to regret the utter impossibility of a strict compliance with the terms of the resolution. The practicability of such a compliance would suppose nothing less than that, since the last day of December, 1792, all the accounts of all the Collectors of the Customs, and other officers of the revenue throughout the whole extent of the United States, could be digested, made up, and forwarded to the Treasury—could be examined there, settled, and carried into the public books under their proper heads. In a word, that all the accounts of the revenues, receipts, and expenditures of this extensive country, could have passed through a complete exhibition, examination, and adjustment within the short period of twenty-three days.

It was made (as I presume from the result) satisfactorily to appear to a Committee of the House of Representatives, who were charged during the last session with framing a direction to the Treasury for bringing forward an annual account of Receipts and Expenditures, that the course of public business would not admit of the rendering of such an account in less than nine months after the expiration of each year; in conformity to which idea, their report was formed and an order of the House established.

I need do nothing more, to evince the impracticability of an exact compliance with the resolution in question, than to observe, that it is even more comprehensive (though with less detail) than the order of the House to which I have alluded. To evince, nevertheless, my readiness to do all in my power towards fulfilling the views of the House, and throwing light upon the transactions of the Department, I shall now offer to their inspection sundry statements, marked A, A B,* B, C, D, E, F, which contain, as far as is at this time possible, the information desired, and with sufficient certainty and accuracy to afford satisfaction on the points of inquiry involved in the resolution.

The statement A shows in abstract the whole of the receipts into, and expenditures from, the Treasury, commencing with the first of January, and ending with the last of December, 1792, corresponding with the accounts of the Treasurer. These accounts have been regularly settled up to the end of September, and copies have been laid before the two Houses of Congress. The account for the quarter terminating with the year has not yet passed through the forms of settlement, but is under examination, and will, no doubt, be settled as it stands—the manner of conducting the business, and the usual care and accuracy of the officer concerned, leaving very little room to apprehend misstatement or error. A copy of this account is herewith submitted in the schedule marked C.

This statement takes up the balance of the general account of Receipts and Expenditures to the end of the year 1791, as reported to the House of Representatives within the first week of the present session, and continuing it down to the end of 1792, shows a balance then in the Treasury of $783,444 51.

* For this statement, see ante page 1191.

Loans.

The statement B is a more comprehensive document. It is a general account of Income and Expenditure. It shows not merely the actual receipts of money into the Treasury, but the whole amount of the national revenues from the commencement of the present Government to the conclusion of the year 1792, as well outstanding as collected—the proceeds of Domestic Loans—the whole amount of the sums which have been drawn into the United States on account of the Foreign Loans—and all other moneys, from whatever source, which have accrued within the period embraced by the statement.

These items form the debit side of the account, amounting to $17,879,825 33.

The credit side consists of two items. First, the whole amount of the actual expenditures to the end of the year 1791, as stated in the general account of Receipts and Expenditures before referred to. Second, the whole amount of the actual expenditures during the year 1792, as specified generally in the statement A, and particularly in the several quarterly accounts of the Treasurer, amounting to $12,765,128 83.

The balance of this account of Income and Expenditure is, consequently, $5,114,696 50; which corresponds with the excess of the public income (including the proceeds of Loans foreign and domestic) beyond the actual expenditure, or, more properly speaking, disbursement to the end of the year 1792. This of course is exclusive of those parts of the proceeds of Foreign Loans which have been left in Europe to be applied there; the amount, application, and balance of which are exhibited, as far as they are known at the Treasury, in the statement No. 1 of my late Report on Foreign Loans.

This balance, as noted in the statement B, is composed of the following particulars:

I. Cash in the Treasury, per statement A	$783,444 51
II. Cash in the Bank of the United States, and the offices of Discount and Deposit of New York and Baltimore, not yet passed to the account of the Treasurer, per statement A B,	605,883 08
III. Proceeds of Amsterdam bills remaining in deposit in the Bank of North America, including the sum of $156,595 56 cents advanced by the Bank without interest, which is credited in the general account of Receipts and Expenditures, statement A	177,998 80
IV. Proceeds of Amsterdam bills sold but not yet received	614,593 02
V. Cash in hands of Collectors of Customs, per abstract D	151,851 25
VI. Bonds unpaid at the end of the year 1792, on account of the duties on imports, and falling due between that time and May, 1794, per abstract E	2,442,069 15

VII. Uncollected residue of duties on spirits distilled within the United States, per abstract F,	341,057 19
Total	$5,116,897 00

This aggregate somewhat exceeds the balance of the account; but, in a case where estimates must necessarily supply the deficiency of ascertained results, differences of this nature are of course. It is, at the same time, satisfactory to observe that the estimates which have been heretofore communicated are proved, by the official documents already received, to have been essentially correct.

It will no doubt readily occur to the House that a very small part of the excess, which has been stated, is a real surplus of income. There remain to be satisfied numerous objects of expenditure charged upon the fund by the appropriations which have been made, that cannot fail ultimately to exhaust it, probably within four or five hundred thousand dollars; which will be embraced in the appropriations for the service of the year 1793. A further explanation on this point is reserved for future communication.

A due comprehension of the statements now presented, must obviate every idea of a balance unaccounted for, in whatever sense the allegation may have been intended to be made.

If there was before any obscurity on the subject, it was certainly not the fault of this Department. Till the last resolutions, no call has been made upon it which rendered it proper to exhibit a general view of the public moneys and funds, or to show the amount and situation of such as were unapplied. Particular calls for particular objects were made, which as I conceive were complied with; but they were not comprehensive enough to embrace a disclosure of that nature. It could not, therefore, with propriety have been alleged that there was a balance unaccounted for. To infer it from documents, which contained only a part of the necessary information, was not justifiable, nor could it otherwise happen than that conclusions wholly erroneous would be the consequences of taking such imperfect data for guides.

It may be of use, by way of elucidation, to point out some of the most palpable features of the error which has been entertained.

The following items are stated as the basis of the supposed deficiency:

Residue of the proceeds of the Foreign bills supposed to be unapplied, (after deducting the sums furnished for St. Domingo, and the amount of the Debt to Foreign officers)	$1,668,190
Surplus of Sinking Fund, meaning, I presume, that part of the surplus of the revenue to the end of the year 1790, which had not been applied in purchases	400,000
Surplus of revenue of the year 1792, as reported	277,385
Total	$2,345,575

Loans.

Deduct in Bank, meaning I presume the balance of the Treasurer's cash account - - - - -	790,642
Balance unaccounted for -	$1,554,933

It appears in the first place to have been overlooked, that in statement No. 3, of my late Report concerning Foreign Loans, mention is made that, on the 3d of January, there remained to be received of the proceeds of the Foreign bills $632,132 02; consequently that sum could not be considered as in the Treasury, and ought to be deducted from the supposed deficiency.

Among the official papers which it is intimated were consulted, was an original account, rendered by the Bank of the United States, of the sales of Amsterdam bills, showing a sum of $605,883 08, as having been received by the Bank and two of its offices of Discount and Deposite, for the proceeds of those bills. Had the document been understood, it would have been known that this sum was in Bank, over and above the balance of the Treasurer's cash account; and this, also, would have served to account for a large part of the supposed deficiency, namely, $605,883 08. The course of this transaction will be hereafter explained.

But among the misconceptions which have obtained, what relates to the surplus of revenue of the year 1792 is not the least striking. The laws inform (and consequently no information on that point from this Department could have been necessary) that credits are allowed upon the duties on imports of four, six, nine, twelve months, and in some cases of two years. Reason dictates, that a surplus in such case must be considered as postponed in the collection or receipt till all the appropriations upon the fund have been first satisfied. The account of Receipts and Expenditures to the end of 1791, in possession of the House, shows that at that time no less a sum than $1,828,289 28 of the antecedent duties were outstanding in bonds. How, then, could it have happened that the surplus of 1792 was sought for in the Treasury at the very instant of the expiration of the year? I forbear to attempt to trace the source of a mistake so extraordinary.

Let me, however, add that of the surplus in question, $172,584 82, are not payable till April and May, 1794, as will be seen by the abstract E.

Thus have I not only furnished a just and affirmative view of the real situation of the public account, but have likewise shown, I trust in a conspicuous manner, fallacies enough in the statement, from which the inference of an unaccounted for balance is drawn, to evince that it is one tissue of error. In this I might have gone still further, there being scarcely a step of the whole process which is not liable to the imputation of misapprehension. But I wish not unnecessarily to weary the patience of the House.

Another circumstance to which importance has been given, and which was noticed in connexion with the suggestion last discussed, is a disagreement between a memorandum in the Treasurer's Bank Book and the statement reported by me, of the amount of bills drawn at the Treasury upon the Foreign Fund. A disagreement no doubt exists, and to the extent of 5,760,138 florins or guilders.

But the following circumstances contain the solution of this disquieting appearance.

There will be found in the statement A two several credits, each for $2,000,000, as for moneys received into the Treasury, with corresponding debits of equal sums as for moneys paid out of the Treasury. But neither the one nor the other did in reality take place. The whole is a mere operation to accomplish the purposes of the eleventh section of the "Act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States," without an inconvenient and unnecessary displacement of funds.

That section authorizes a subscription to the stock of the Bank, on account of the Government, not exceeding in amount $2,000,000, and provides for the payment of it out of the moneys which should be borrowed by virtue of either of the acts of the 4th and 12th of August, 1790—the first making provision for the Public Debt, the last for reducing it; enjoining, at the same time, that a Loan should be made of the Bank to an equal amount, to replace the moneys which were to be applied to the payment of the subscription.

It is evident that nothing could have been more useless (at the same time that it would have been attended with obvious disadvantages to the Government) than actually to draw from Europe, out of the moneys borrowed there, the sum necessary for the payment of the subscription to the Bank, and again to remit out of the Loan which was to be obtained of the Bank a sufficient sum to replace such moneys, or such part of them as may have been destined for the Foreign object. Loss upon exchange in consequence of overstocking of the market with bills—loss in interest by the delays incident to the operation, and which would necessarily have suspended the useful employment of the funds for a considerable time—these are some of the disadvantages to the Government. To the Bank alone could any benefit have accrued, which would have been in proportion to the delay in restoring or applying the fund to its primitive destination. Such an operation, therefore, could only have been justified by an indisposition on the part of the Bank to facilitate the principal object, without the intervention of actual payment. But no such disposition existed. On this, as on every other occasion, a temper liberal towards the Government has characterized the conduct of the directors of that institution.

It was accordingly proposed by me, and agreed to by them, that the object to be accomplished should be carried into effect by a merely formal arrangement. In this, however, it was necessary to consult the injunctions of law, and the principles of the constitution of the Treasury Department.

These points, then, were to be effected—a payment of the subscription money, to vest the Government with the property of the stock; possession of the means of paying it, which were to be derived from the Foreign Fund, and of course were first to be in the Treasury before payment could be made; the replacing what should be taken from that fund by a Loan of the Bank.

The following plan for these purposes was devised and executed by previous concert:

The Treasurer drew bills upon our Commissioners in Amsterdam for the sums requisite to complete the payment on account of the subscription. These bills were purchased by the Bank, and warrants in favor of the Treasurer upon the Bank served to place the proceeds in the Treasury. Warrants afterwards issued upon the Treasurer, in favor of the Bank, for the amount of the subscription money, which was receipted for on the part of the Bank as paid. Other warrants then issued in favor of the Treasurer upon the Bank, for equal sums, as upon account of a Loan to the Government; which warrants were satisfied by a re-delivery to the Treasurer of the bills that had been drawn upon the Commissioners. In the last place, warrants were drawn upon the Treasurer to replace the moneys, supposed by the arrangement to be drawn from the Foreign fund, which perfected the operation. But, from the detail which has been given, it will be seen that in fact no moneys were either withdrawn from or returned to that fund. The bills were cancelled, annexed to the warrants, and are lodged in the Treasury as vouchers of the transaction.

These bills were for two separate sums, each 2,475,000 guilders, equal to $1,000,000; the payment having been divided into two parts, upon certain equitable considerations, relative to the dividend of the first half year.

This transaction explains 4,950,000 guilders, of the sum which forms the disagreement between the memorandum in the Treasurer's Bank Book and the statement reported by me.

The residue is thus explained. The sum of 1,237,500 guilders, directed to be drawn for on the 30th of November, was directed to be comprised in one or more bills, as the Bank should desire. It was at first placed in one bill; but this bill was afterward returned, with a request that it might be converted into smaller sums. The bill returned was cancelled, and in lieu of it there had been furnished, prior to the first of January of the present year, 934,500 guilders—the balance, 303,000, then remaining to be furnished. The sum of 934,500 guilders consequently appears twice in the memorandum.

These two sums of 4,590,000 and 934,500 guilders, exceed the difference in question by 124,362 guilders.

The Treasurer informs me that there are two bills not included in the memorandum; one for 123,750, and the other for 612 guilders, which make up the above mentioned excess. The former of these two bills was furnished to the Secretary of State for the purpose contemplated by the 3d section of the act of the last session, entitled "An act making certain appropriations therein specified."

Is it not truly matter of regret, that so formal an explanation on such a point should have been made requisite? Could no personal inquiry of either of the officers concerned have superseded the necessity of publicly calling the attention of the House of Representatives to an appearance, in truth, so little significant? Was it seriously supposable that there could be any real difficulty in explaining that appearance, when the very disclosure of it proceeded from a voluntary act of the Head of this Department?

With perfect respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient and most humble servant,
ALEXANDER HAMILTON,

Secretary of the Treasury.

The Hon. the SPEAKER
of the House of Representatives.

2. Of cash in the Bank of the United States, and the Offices of Discount and Deposite of New York and Baltimore, per account rendered by the Bank herewith, marked A B	605,883 08
3. Of the proceeds of bills on Amsterdam, remaining in deposite in the Bank of North America, including the sum of $156,595 56, loaned without interest, which Loan is credited in the general account of Receipts and Expenditures	177,998 80
4. Of the proceeds of bills on Amsterdam, not yet received	614,593 08
5. Uncollected residue of duties on spirits distilled within the United States, viz:
Total, as estimated	$550,000 00
Deduct sums received into the Treasury, and credited in account of Receipts and Expenditures, marked A	208,942 81
	341,057 19
6. Cash in hands of Collectors of Customs, per abstract of weekly returns	151,851 25
7. Bonds unpaid at the end of the year 1792, on account of duties on imports and tonnage, and falling due between that time and May, 1794	2,442,069 15
	$5,116,897 00

NOTES.

Office of Discount and Deposite, Baltimore	20,635 74
	605,883 08
	$1,389,327 59

3. Of this sum, $156,595 56 are considered as in deposite, by way of counterbalance to an advance made by the Bank for the use of the Department of War, for the purposes of the act passed the 3d of March, 1791, for raising and adding another regiment to the Military Establishment of the United States, and for making further provision for the protection of the frontiers. It has remained without final adjustment, from a doubt whether the funds, upon which the appropriations which comprehend the surplus of duties to the end of 1791 are bottomed, are fully sufficient. A sum of about $50,000 must depend on the existence of certain surplusses upon antecedent appropriations, which it is believed will not require the full sums appropriated; but the purposes of those appropriations not being yet finally satisfied, the real state of the business is not yet completely ascertained. An example of this exists in the case of a sum of $40,000, appropriated for paying off certain specie claims on the Quartermaster's Department, incurred during the late war. It is known that further claims exist, but not to what extent. There are several other cases attended with similar uncertainty. A recent examination leaves some doubt whether warrants can yet safely issue to wind up the transaction.

5. Whether the sum here stated as outstanding be correct, must in a degree depend on the accuracy of the estimated product of the duties. It will be observed that the product, as carried into the statement, was originally fixed by estimation; and even now the materials in possession of the Treasury, respecting a branch of revenue, for known reasons not yet reduced to perfect order, are unavoidably imperfect, and liable to some error. The estimate may exceed or fall short of the reality, and proportionally affect the outstanding balance. But, however this may turn out, it cannot affect the merits of the statement. The excess or deficiency of one side of the account would correspond with a like excess or deficiency on the other. The auxiliary statement, however, marked F, serves to show that there can be no material error in the estimate.

6 and 7. These two items are also liable to some degree of uncertainty. The cash returns of the Collectors not being all received up to the end of the year, and some disbursements which were to be made to that time not having been completed, the amount which was then in their hands cannot be pronounced with precision. The difference, however, which may appear upon a settlement of their accounts, cannot be material. In like manner, as monthly abstracts of bonds up to the end of the year have not yet been received from some ports, and it has been found necessary to supply the deficiency by a comparative estimate, the result may vary somewhat from the fact. But enough is ascertained to pronounce that the difference must be inconsiderable; and, in reference both to the cash and bonds in the hands of the Collectors, whatever difference may hereafter appear, is liable to the same remark as to the merits of the statement, which has been made in regard to the duties on distilled spirits. The differences in both cases must resolve themselves into the circumstance of the estimated amounts of the duties proving greater or less than the real amounts.

[Communicated to the Senate February 6, 1793.]

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
February 5, 1793.

SIR: In pursuance of the first part of the order of the Senate of the 23d of January past, I have the honor to send, herewith, sundry statements, marked A, AB, B, B a, D, E, F, and I beg the permission of the Senate to add the copy of a letter dated yesterday, which served to transmit duplicates of the same documents to the House of Representatives, and which contains some explanations of them, a repetition of which here will be thereby rendered unnecessary. The document C, referred to in that letter, was also sent to the House of Representatives, but being of considerable length, a duplicate is not yet ready; and I did not think it advisable to detain the other papers till it was ready.

The documents now transmitted will answer the whole of the inquiry contained in the first part of the order above referred to, except what regards a distribution of the expenditures under each head of appropriation, which is in preparation, and will be forwarded as soon as it can be ready.

The situation in which I am placed renders further delay absolutely necessary to the fulfilment of the second part of the order.

There is a point in my Letter of the 16th of January to the Senate, concerning which some explanation is requisite. I stated, as one motive to the joint negotiation of the Loans, under both acts, "an intimation from our bankers in Holland that a distinction might prove an embarrassment, being a novelty, the reason of which would not be obvious to the money-lenders." This was done from memory, without recurrence to documents, and in a degree of hurry occasioned by my anxiety for the speedy passing of the Appropriation bill, and, upon a revision, proves to be not accurate. The mistake arose in the following manner: My original idea was, to maintain a separation between the two acts. This will appear from my Letter of the 28th of August, 1790, to our bankers, in which I express a desire that they would endeavor to place part of the first Loan upon one act, and another part upon the other act. But they did not carry this idea into execution, for the reason assigned in their answer, now before the Senate, which is, that the subdivision proposed would, under the circumstances of the case, tend to excite speculations and doubts among the money-lenders.

But, prior to the receipt of their answer, I had made further inquiry, and had reflected more on the subject. The result of my inquiry was, that the money-lenders, having been accustomed to lend on the general credit of the Government borrowing, with a sort of general pledge of its revenues and resources, the attempt to bottom a Loan upon any particular law, might, as a novelty, occasion some hesitation and embarrassment among them, especially as they are known to be a description of men much influenced by habit and precedent; and the conclusions, from more full reflection, were, that the distinguishing of the Loans with reference to each act, might not only embarrass the business, in the first stages of negotiation, but might interfere with an application of the proceeds of the Loans in the most convenient and beneficial manner, according to circumstances.

On these considerations, I abandoned my original intention, and, in my first instruction to Mr. Short, was silent on the point.

These different positions of the subject in the mind, at different times, and what actually took place with regard to the first Loan, produced some confusion in the recollection of facts, and led me to assign as a cause what had been only a collateral circumstance, and to ascribe to the bankers intimations, or rather information, which I had received from other quarters.

I submit this explanation of the matter to the candor of the Senate, and have the honor to be, with perfect respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

ALEXANDER HAMILTON.

The VICE PRESIDENT of the
United States and President of the Senate.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
February 5, 1793.

SIR: By order of the President of the United States, I have the honor to transmit, herewith—

1. Copies of a power given by him to the Secretary of the Treasury for the time being, dated the 28th of August, 1790, for the negotiation of the Loans authorized by the laws of the 4th and 12th of August, 1790, and of certain instructions relative thereto, dated on the same day.

2. Copies of an authority founded upon the power of the President from me to William Short, Esq., dated the 1st of September, 1790, and of sundry letters from me to the said William Short, of dates from the 29th of May, 1790, to the 31st of December, 1792, inclusively, relating to the negotiation and application of the above-mentioned Loans.

3. Originals of sundry letters from William Short to me, under dates from the 2d of December, 1790, to the 2d of November, 1792, inclusively, relating to the same subject.

4. Copy of an authority from me to Messrs. Wilhem and John Willinks, Nicholas and J. Van Staphorst, and Hubbard, bankers of the United States at Amsterdam, dated the 28th of August, 1790, relating to the first of the Loans made under the above-mentioned acts, and copies of sundry letters to the said bankers, of dates from the 28th of August, 1790, to the 31st of December, 1792, inclusively.

5. Originals of sundry letters from the said bankers to me, of dates from the 25th of January, 1790, to the 5th of November, 1792.

6. Copies of sundry letters, of dates from the 18th of June to the 24th of September, 1792, inclusively, between G. Morris and W. Short, Esqs., having relation to the above subjects.

The general power from the President to the

Loans.

Secretary of the Treasury, of the 28th of August, 1790, and the communications from William Short, Esq., who has been the only Commissioner, would, it is presumed, have fulfilled the terms of the resolution of the Senate of the 23d of last month, and are transmitted, pursuant to the request contained in that resolution.

But the President has been pleased to direct the transmission of the other documents also, in the supposition that they will serve to throw light upon the general subject of that resolution.

With perfect respect, I have the honor to be, sir, yours, &c.,

ALEXANDER HAMILTON.

Secretary of the Treasury.

The VICE PRESIDENT of the United States and President of the Senate.

[NOTE.—Of the papers referred to in this Report, none are now to be found, except those published by the Secretary's second Report, of the 13th February, 1793.]

LOANS.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 13, 1793.

SIR: The next most important article of inquiry involved in the resolutions of the House of Representatives of the twenty-third of January last, and in the observations which have been made respecting the conduct of this Department, relates to the Loans negotiated under the acts of the 4th and 12th of August, 1790.

The papers which have been transmitted to the House by order of the President, disclose the following particulars—

I. That the immediate superintendence of the business of the Loans was confided to the Department of the Treasury, being naturally connected with it. This trust, besides the original instructions for regulating the execution of it, which have been communicated, was of course subject to such directions from time to time, as the President should think fit to give, or as occasion should require. A considerable latitude of discretion, nevertheless, from the very nature of the case, attended it; so as justly to leave on the head of this Department a complete responsibility in all instances, where special exceptions do not appear.

II. That the first Loan which was obtained, was undertaken and completed by the agency of Wilhem and Jan Willink, and Nicholas and Jacob Van Staphorst, and Hubbard, who, both under the former and present Government, have been and are the bankers of the United States at Amsterdam.

III. That with the single exception of the first Loan, William Short, Esq., then Chargé des Affaires at the Court of France, now resident Minister at the Hague, was constituted the sole agent of this Department, for carrying into effect the powers confided to it; with this qualification only, that if any negotiation with a Prince or State, to whom any part of the Debt to be discharged by the Loans, was due, should be requisite, the same was to be carried on through the person who in capacity of Minister, Chargé des Affaires, or otherwise, then was, or thereafter might be charged with transacting the affairs of the United States, with such Prince or State.

IV. That all payments, which have been made out of the proceeds of the Loans, have been made by the immediate and special order of Mr. Short, except those, upon the bills of the Treasurer for the moneys drawn to this country, and those to the money-lenders in Holland; which were made in course by our bankers, at the periods they respectively became due. This consequently embraces all the payments to France; the very last of which, though agreed for by Mr. Morris, in consequence of his having been employed for a special purpose by Mr. Short, was not, and could not, be completed, but by the same immediate and special direction of Mr. Short.

It moreover appears, from the same papers, and more fully from the correspondence at large, now before the Senate, that except in the particular instance which has been just stated, with regard to Mr. Morris, there has been no other agency in the whole business, than that of Mr. Short, and of the bankers at Amsterdam and Antwerp, whom he necessarily employed as instruments in the negotiations with the money-lenders, and in the receipt and disbursement of the moneys borrowed. These, as already mentioned, were, at Amsterdam, the two houses of Wilhem and Jan Willink, and of Nicholas and Jacob Van Staphorst and Hubbard; at Antwerp, a Mr. G. De Wolf was the banker.

It may not be without its uses to add, that the moneys proceeding from the Loans, have constantly remained in the hands of the respective bankers, till they have been paid over to the creditors; namely, the French treasury, or their bankers, the money-lenders or their representatives, the holders of the bills drawn from this country by the Treasurer. Neither Mr. Short nor Mr. Morris has ever had possession of a single guilder. The latter, indeed, has never even had power over one, excepting merely a sum of 105,000 guilders, by letters of mine, dated the 13th September last, placed at his disposal for paying at Paris, according to stipulation, the interest on the Debt due to foreign officers. The fact is, and it is so demonstrated by the correspondence already referred to, that I never wrote a line to Mr. Morris on the subject of the Loans or their proceeds, but in reference to the case just mentioned of the interest payable to foreign officers, in respect to which, local situation governed.

One more circumstance only is necessary to be noticed in this place, with a view to the elucidation intended. It is this: that the last payment, though originating prior to the change in the political position of France of the 10th of August last, not having been consummated until the 6th of September following, fell of course under the disposition of those then in possession of the power of the nation.

It could not but have been unexpected to me, that exception should be taken to the Report lately made by me on the subject of Foreign Loans, for the omission of details which I did not at that time, and do not yet, conceive, to have been called for, by the terms of the resolutions upon which it was founded. The request addressed to the President, by those resolutions, was, that he would cause to be laid before the House a particular account of the sums borrowed under his authority by the United States, the terms on which each Loan was obtained, the applications which had been made of the moneys, agreeably to appropriations, the balances, if any, which remained unapplied, specifying also, at what times interest commenced on the several sums obtained, and at what times it was stopped by the several payments made. It was not natural to imagine that these expressions were designed to comprehend a specification of the precise authorities, under which the Loans were negotiated, of the names of the persons by whom they were negotiated, of the particular place or places, where the balance unexpended of the sums that had been drawn for to the United States, were deposited. Still less natural was it for me to anticipate surmises, which could give to such particulars the shadow of importance. But as animadversions have attended the omission of those details, I ought to regard it as an admonition to me, to be more full and precise in my present communication; a motive which co-operates with my desire, to throw all possible light upon the subject.

The first general circumstance, which requires to be noticed and explained, after the particulars that have been communicated, is this: that all the Loans which have been hitherto obtained, have been made under the authority of both acts, without particular reference to either.

The idea originally entertained, was to conduct them on a different plan, founding each Loan upon one or the other of the acts, as will be seen by my letter of the 28th of August, 1790, to our bankers at Amsterdam; at the same time, that it will appear, from the same letter, that the separation did not appear to me a matter of consequence, and that I anticipated the possibility of a difficulty in adhering to it in the particular case. That difficulty, proved in the opinion of the bankers, to be of sufficient moment to render the arrangement contemplated, under the circumstances of the case, unadvisable, as they inform me in their answer to the abovementioned letter.

But prior to the receipt of that answer, further inquiry and reflection had determined me to abandon my original idea, as likely to produce embarrassment and inconvenience, both in the negotiation of the Loans, and in the application of their proceeds. It was accordingly concluded to let the Loans proceed indiscriminately, upon both acts.

These Loans were to have reference to two purposes; first, the reimbursement of the Foreign Debt; second, the purchase of the Domestic Debt at its market price.

There were weighty reasons for carrying on both these operations concurrently. The arrears to France had been a considerable time accumul-

ing. It was in every sense proper that a reimbursement of them should begin without delay, and desirable for obvious reasons, that it should go on without any very considerable chasms or intermissions. This manner of proceeding could not but have the fairest chance of being the most satisfactory and convenient to France; unless, indeed, the business were to have proceeded upon the principle of an entire postponement of the domestic object, to that of the reimbursement.

But very cogent reasons rendered this course not the most eligible. The early commencement of purchases of the Debt was a matter of real and great importance.

It was important in two relations; as it regarded the advantages to the Government, from redeeming a portion of the Debt at low prices; and still more, as it regarded the savings to the country from raising the price of stock on foreign purchasers; the beneficial influence upon the credit of the nation abroad and at home, to be expected from a quick appreciation of the public obligations; the benefit to the public creditors in general, and to the most meritorious classes of them in particular, which would result from the same cause; all which objects were suggested from the Treasury, as motives to the provision respecting purchases, and are evidently contemplated in the preamble of the act which makes that provision.

Exclusive of the other advantages which have been cited, and which are of a nature truly precious and important, that of preventing foreigners from acquiring the property of our citizens at a great under-value, is too obvious not to be estimated, as it ought to be, at first sight. It cannot require argument to show how great an evil it was, that foreigners should be able to acquire with nine or ten, that for which the country would ultimately have to pay them twenty, with full interest in the interval; nor how much it merited the attention of the Government to prevent or lessen so serious an evil.

But the influence which the purchases by the Government may have had upon this event may not be equally obvious. It is, however, not difficult to be traced. Price naturally keeps pace with competition and demand; whatever increases the latter, necessarily tends to an augmentation of the former. Merely then as another purchaser, by adding to the competition and demand, the purchases of the Government were calculated to influence a rise of price. But they had an effect more than proportioned to their extent. Imagination has much to do in all such questions, and in scarcely anything so much as in what relates to public funds. Experience proves, that it is here exerted with uncommon effort. The appearance of the Government as a purchaser has not failed to excite the expectation of a greater demand than was real, because the extent of the resources to be employed might be very great, and was unknown; which, by stimulating the zeal of those who wanted to buy, lest the price should rise suddenly and considerably upon them, and by encouraging those who wanted to sell, under the hope of a better price, to hold back the commodity, has in both ways generally contributed to give a spring to the market. Prices once raised, when founded on intrinsic value, tend to maintain themselves; because those who have given them, are for the most part interested in keeping them up. And every new impulse, which they receive, serves to carry them rapidly to their just level.

Those who have been most attentive to the operation of the public purchases, will have the least doubt that they had a material agency in accelerating the appreciation of the public stock.

An inquiry naturally arises here. Were the moneys which were drawn from Europe on account of the Foreign Loans, the instrument of the purchases, to which these beneficial effects are ascribed?

I answer, that these purchases are to be attributed to the instrumentality of that fund; that had it not been for this resource they could not have been made at the early periods when most of them were made. The course of the transaction will be fully, and with more propriety, explained in another place.

An attention to both objects—to the reimbursements to France, and to the purchases of the Debt, rendered expedient a subdivision, even of the first Loan. Considerations of the moment seconded those of a general nature, to induce an immediate payment to that country. The Loan had been undertaken without previous authority from hence, with a view to such payment. This was known, and a correspondent expectation excited. The immediate situation of the French finances rendered a payment at the particular juncture more than ordinarily interesting. In such a state of things, there could be no hesitation about applying a large part of the Loan to that object. Another part of it was, of necessity, applied to the payment of the sums that were falling due on the Dutch Loans. And it is presumed that the reasons which have been assigned, will appear to have been sufficiently powerful to have dictated the drawing of a part of it to the United States.

Accordingly, a million and a half of the three millions borrowed, were appropriated to France, something more than eight hundred thousand guilders were drawn for here, and the remainder of the Loan was left to be disbursed in Holland.

It shall not be concealed, though I am aware that the acknowledgment may be a subject of criticism, that the conduct which was pursued, both with regard to this and to the succeeding Loan, was in some degree influenced by a collateral consideration. The Government had but just adopted a plan for the restoration of public credit. The periodical payment of interest was to commence on the 1st of April, 1791. A considerable part of the revenue, out of which the moneys were to arise, was only to begin to accrue on the first of January preceding. This revenue was liable to credits of four, six, and twelve months.

How far its eventual product would answer expectation—how far the punctuality of payments could be relied upon—were points unascertained, and which required to their ascertainment much more experience than had been obtained. In such a situation, it was not only natural but necessary for an Administrator of the Finances to doubt; and doubting, it was his duty to call to the aid of the Public Credit every auxiliary which it was in his power to command. He was bound to reflect, that a failure in any stipulated payment would be fatal to the dawning credit of the country—to the reputation of the Government—just beginning to rise. That a wound inflicted upon either, at so early a stage, under all the circumstances of opposition to the Constitution, which had existed in the community, would have been deeply felt, and might either not have admitted of a cure at all, or not till after a length of time, and a series of mischiefs; that it could not but be an important service rendered to the country to ward off so great a misfortune by the temporary use of any extraordinary resource, which might be at hand, till time was given for more effectual provision.

If, in the course of such reflections, a doubt had occurred about the strict regularity of what was contemplated as a possible resort, a mind sufficiently alive to the public interest, and sufficiently firm in the pursuit of it, would have dismissed that doubt as an obstacle, suggested by a pusillanimous caution, to the exercise of those higher motives, which ought ever to govern a man invested with a great public trust. It would have occurred that there was reasonable ground to rely that the necessity of the case, and the magnitude of the occasion, would insure a justification; and that, if the contrary should happen, there remained still the consolation of having sacrificed personal interest and tranquility, no matter to what extent, to an important public interest; and of having avoided the humiliation which would have been justly due to an opposite and to a feeble conduct.

The disposition which was resolved upon, with regard to the first Loan, involved, necessarily, a decision of the point, that the Loans might be placed on the joint foundation of both acts. That Loan having been undertaken, as already mentioned, without previous authority, and consequently without a particular eye to either act, it was probable that it would be found too late to make an apportionment of one part of the sum borrowed to one act, of another part to the other act. In that case, the distributive application of the fund to the different objects was to be relinquished, or the possibility was to be admitted, of the Loan being left to stand upon the authority of both acts. The same disposition of the first Loan will also illustrate the convenience and expediency of the plan which was finally adopted; that is, of placing the Loans on the basis of both acts.

The idea of a concurrent execution of both the objects to which the Loans were destined, could not conveniently have been pursued upon the plan of a separation of the Loans; which, to be effectual, would include the strict application of the proceeds of each to the purposes of the particular act upon which it was founded.

Amsterdam was naturally looked to, as the great scene of the intended Loans. There, as everywhere else, there is but a certain quantity of money floating in the market, from time to time, beyond the necessary demands of trade and industry, seeking for employment in Loans. This quantity, of course, varies at different periods, from a variety of causes. Of the quantity at any time afloat, but a certain proportion can be commanded by any one-borrowing Power, owing to the competition of other borrowers, who have each their connexions, through their bankers, with different sets of undertakers. Nor is it always that considerable Loans can be had at any rate. There are certain seasons only when they are practicable.

To have brought two Loans upon the market at one time, as an opportunity of borrowing offered, which must have been the case, in order to make concurrent provision for both the objects in question, if the principle of a separation of the Loans had been adopted, would have been to exhibit to the money-lenders a very unusual appearance. With men known to be much influenced by precedent and habit, such an appearance could not have failed to prove a source of speculation and conjecture; and might have led to a confused idea that the wants of the United States were excessive; a supposition by no means calculated to promote their credit. It would, moreover, have been a departure from that simplicity of procedure which, where numbers are concerned, is always of moment to a right conception of the business to be accomplished, and ought not to be abandoned, but for reasons of real utility and weight.

To have instituted the Loans successively, founding each upon one or the other of the acts, would have had a tendency to occasion longer intervals between the payments to France than was desirable. The intervention of a Loan for the purpose of purchases would have created, of course, a very considerable chasm. It may be objected, that such chasms did happen on the plan which was pursued. This is true in two instances, but the most material of the two proceeded from casualties foreign to the plan itself, which are detailed in the correspondence more than once alluded to.

It is possible, too, that a separation of the Loans might have rendered it less easy to take advantage of a state of the market, favorable to their extension at a particular juncture. The Loan to be brought on the market might relate to the purchase of the Debt. The moment might be favorable to a more considerable Loan than was within the limits prescribed for that object, and the opportunity might slip before a second could be instituted. In this business moments are often of importance, and are to be embraced with promptitude and dexterity.

Thus it appears that, in different ways, the negotiation of the Loans might have been embarrassed by their separation.

But the most obvious, if not the most serious of the inconveniences which would have attended it, respects the application of the sums borrowed. This could not then have been moulded, as the interest or policy of the Government might dictate. A Loan for the purchase of the Debt might have been made under prospects promising a ready and beneficial investment of it; but, before the investment was made, a change of the market might render it ineligible—involving the alternative, either of a disadvantageous investment, or of leaving, perhaps, a large sum of money a long time unemployed. Such a state of things might have produced to the banks an advantage, and to the Government a loss of magnitude, sufficient to give color to a surmise, that the public interest had been sacrificed to the profit of those institutions. The contrary course has essentially avoided that evil; which, in this and in other instances, would have been incident, in a far greater degree, to the modes of proceeding, contrasted with those that have been pursued, than has in reality attended them.

Or political considerations might have rendered it advisable to transfer the application of the fund from one object to the other.

Of this, the case of St. Domingo presents an example. It might have happened on the plan of separate Loans, that there was no fund in hand but for the purchase of the Debt. Then, on the principle of that plan, there would have been no fund in the disposition of the Executive, applicable to the other object, which would have embarrassed the performance of a duty towards a friendly Power, and in a way which included the positive advantage to the country of paying directly a part of its Foreign Debt, in its own productions.

Such were the embarrassments avoided, and such the conveniences secured, by the plan of making the Loans indiscriminately, upon the authority of both acts.

In the opposite plan, I can discern no counterbalancing advantage nor convenience.

Consequently, if both are equally legal, there can be no doubt which of them ought to have been preferred.

If there be any want of legality in the plan which has been pursued, I was not at the time, and am not yet, sensible of it.

I know of no rule which renders it illegal in an agent, having from the same principal two authorities to borrow money, whether for one or different purposes, to unite the Loans he may make upon the foundation of both authorities, provided the terms of them be consistent with both or either of his commissions. If the purposes are different, it will be incumbent upon him to take care that the application of the moneys borrowed makes the proper separation, and, doing this, he will have fulfilled his trust. To test this position, it seems only necessary to ask, whether the principal, in such case, would not be fully bound to the lenders?

In reflecting originally upon the regularity of the proceeding meditated, there was but one source of hesitation—the difference in the funds upon which the Loans were to rest. But the following reasoning satisfied the scruple: The pledging of particular funds is for the security of the lenders. If they are willing to waive the special security by lending on the general credit of the Government, or to dispense with the preference of one fund to another, where two are pledged, by lending indiscriminately on the credit of both, the one or the other circumstance must be alike indifferent to the Government. The authority will have been well executed, to the extent necessary for public purposes, and if any thing remains unexecuted, it will be in enlargement, not in abridgment of the public rights. It is, however, presumed that the practical construction in the present case will be, that the two funds pledged will constitute an aggregate for the joint security of the moneys borrowed upon both acts.

The second general circumstance respecting the Foreign Loans negotiated under the acts of the 4th and 12th of August, which requires attention, relates to the terms on which they have been obtained. These, it appears, have been represented as neither honorable nor advantageous.

The following facts, witnessed by the correspondence before the Senate, more than once referred to, and well known to all who have had opportunities of information, demonstrate that the terms of those Loans have been both honorable and advantageous:

1. There is not one of them, which originated under the acts, that was not effected upon conditions equally favorable with those attending the Loans of the cotemporary borrowing Powers of the most tried resources and best-established credit, and more favorable than were obtained by some Powers of great respectability.

2. The United States took a lead in the market in regard to the subsequent reductions of interest, having had either earlier or more complete success than any other borrowing Power.

3. From a rate of five per cent. interest and four-and-a-half per cent. charges, which marked the level of the market when they began their Loans, they, in the course of a single year, brought down the terms to four per cent. interest and five per cent. charges; that is, from an interest on the nett sum received (including an indemnification for charges) of 5.5012, something more than five-and-a-half per cent., to an interest on the like sum of 4.4951, something less than four-and-a-half per cent.

When this state of things is applied to a Government only in the third year of its existence, and to a country which had so recently emerged from a total derangement of its finances, it would seem impossible to deny that the issue is not only honorable but flattering; unless, indeed, it can be denied that a sound and vigorous state of credit is honorable to a nation.

I forbear a comparison between the Loans of the present and of the former Government of this country, because an immense disparity of circumstances would render it an improper one, further than to take notice of a very great error which has been upon some occasions advanced. It has been alleged, to disparage the management under the present, that the Loans of the former Government, in a situation comparatively very disadvantageous, have been effected upon equal terms; and in proof of this an appeal has been made to the Loan of 2,000,000 of guilders, at four per cent., which is that of the 9th March, 1784.

Nothing can manifest more clearly than this the very precipitate and superficial views with which suggestions on important public subjects are sometimes made. The last four per cent. Loan obtained under the existing laws, including charges, is a real four-and-a-half per cent. Loan, or, more exactly, a 4.4951 per cent. Loan. The four per cent. Loan of March, 1784, is a real 6.6468 per cent. Loan. The difference, which exceeds two per cent., arises principally from extra premiums and gratifications which were allowed upon this Loan, and which are unknown to the other.

Much praise is no doubt due to the exertions which effected the Loans under the former Government. A superiority of merit shall readily be conceded to them, from the circumstances under which they were made, and their signal utility in the Revolution. But it is not necessary to their eulogium to affirm that they were made upon equal terms with those of the Loans lately obtained, or to deny the goodness of the terms of the latter. Truth will not justify the one or the other.

The facts which have been stated prove that the terms of the Loans are advantageous as well as honorable. They are comparatively advantageous, because they are as moderate as other Powers in the best credit have allowed; and they are absolutely advantageous, because the highest real not nominal rate of interest which has been given does not exceed 5.5012, a fraction more than five-and-a-half per cent., while the lowest real rate is 4.4951, a fraction less than four-and-a-half per cent.

If the question whether advantageous or not be tested by the purposes for which the Loans have been made, the conclusion is equally in their favor. The payments on account of the Foreign Debt were an indispensable obligation. Unless it can be shown that they might have been derived from another and more advantageous source, it will follow that it was the interest of the Government to avail itself of the resource which has been employed, because it was its duty to discharge its obligations.

It is sometimes urged that Foreign Loans, for whatever purpose, are pernicious, because they serve to drain the country of its specie for the payment of interest, and for the final reimbursement of principal; that it would be preferable, for that reason, to procure Loans at home, even at a higher rate of interest.

To this, several answers may be given, some of a special, others of a general nature.

In reference to the reimbursement of the Foreign Debt, it may be observed, that, as a Debt had already been incurred abroad, upon which interest was payable, the contracting of new Loans there for the reimbursement of that Debt would leave us, as to the demand for the exportation of our specie, just where we originally stood. Moreover, if the money could have been borrowed at home for that reimbursement, the remittance of it would have been ruinous to the country. The mere necessity of remitting could not alone have increased the foreign demand for our commodities, so as to deduce from an extra exportation of them the requisite means of payment; and if our specie was to perform the office, the country would speedily have been exhausted to a degree inconsistent with the support of its commerce and industry. The quantity of coin in the United States has never been considerable enough for such an operation.

But this very state of things would have rendered the procuring of the money from domestic resources impracticable. These, it may be safely affirmed, are too limited for extensive Loans of any considerable degree of permanency.

In the last place, the expedient of Domestic Loans would not prevent the evil which is desired to be prevented. Foreigners would either in the first instance bring their moneys to subscribe them to the Loans, or they would afterwards purchase the stock arising from them, and, in either case, they would equally draw away the money of the country on account of their interest and principal. The only consequence of giving a disproportionate rate of interest for Domestic Loans would be that our specie would be carried away so much the faster.

Experience having shown that nations sometimes pay more regard to their external than to their internal credit—this consideration co-operates with reasons of convenience to induce moneyed men abroad to be content with a lower rate of interest, stipulated to be paid in their own country, than if the place of payment be in another country; making even a greater difference than is an equivalent for the expense and risk of obtaining remittances.

The clear inference from these observations is, that, with regard to the reimbursement of the Foreign Debt, no other expedient than that of Foreign Loans was practicable or eligible.

The utility of that part of the Loans which has reference to the purchase of the Debt has already been explained in certain views. So far as their agency has been hitherto concerned in that operation, it is a sufficient demonstration of the advantage of the measure to state that the sum invested in purchases up to the period of the last Report to Congress has redeemed what is equal to an annuity of 6.15 per cent., including also the advantage of sinking a capital more than fifty per cent. greater than the sum expended.

A valuable profit will arise from the investment of the sums on hand, either in a payment to the Bank or in the purchase of stock. The liberation of an annuity of six per cent. can be secured, while, upon a great part of the fund which is to effect it no more than four-and-a-half per cent. is payable, and less than five-and-a-half upon the other part. The mean of these rates being five per cent., an annual saving of one per cent. may be effected, which, upon $2,000,000, interest at five per cent., is equal to a capital or gross sum of $400,000—an item certainly of no inconsiderable consequence.

Against the advantages which are claimed in favor of the Loan, it is natural to place the loss of interest incident to the delays which have attended their application to the purposes for which they were obtained. This leads to an examination of the cases of delay, their causes, the circumstances, if any, which counterbalance them.

There are three instances of material delay—
3d Con.—40

one respecting the first Loan, another the second Loan, and a third a part of the two last Loans.

The first Loan, it will be seen, was not applied till a considerable time after its commencement. It has been already intimated that it was undertaken without previous authority from this country. The motives to the measure are detailed in a letter from our bankers of the 25th of January, 1790, a copy of which accompanies the communications herewith made by order of the President. A regard to those motives led to an acceptance of the Loan. Nor could it have been deemed an unfortunate circumstance that such an auxiliary to the operations of the Treasury had been previously prepared.

The laws authorizing the Loans passed the 4th and 12th of August. As early as the 28th of that month, the acceptance above mentioned was communicated, and the application of 1,500,000 florins, in a payment to France, directed. So far, no time was lost, more than could not have been avoided.

But the bills for the sum to be brought here were not drawn till some months after. This proceeded from an unwillingness to risk the public credit, by drawing before there was a certainty of funds to answer the drafts. It was not impossible that the great delay which had attended the passing of the law for borrowing might have led the bankers to come to some arrangement with the money-lenders for surrendering the moneys paid in and terminating the Loan. Independent of this source of apprehension, they had expressed themselves, in their letter communicating the step they had taken, to this effect: "To spare the United States all possible advance of interest, while the money shall remain unappropriated, we shall issue the receipts at the option of the buyers to take them so late as they please; on the expectation the three millions would be placed in a few months." This, though it announced an expectation that the moneys would be paid in in a few months, did not render the event certain. And as the bankers appeared, from that precaution, to have adverted to the idea of saving the United States an advance of interest, it was supposable that they might have found means still farther to procrastinate the payments, or a considerable part of them, till they had received a confirmation of the Loan. This policy would have been the more natural, as they risked the loss of interest themselves, if the transaction should not have been finally ratified.

Under such circumstances, I thought it most prudent to defer the drafts until advice was received of the actual progress of the Loans. There was no room to hesitate between the loss of a small sum in interest and the danger of committing the public credit by a premature operation.

The second case of delay relates to the second Loan. It was occasioned by a determination to suspend the orders for its application till information was received of its having been contracted for. One motive to this determination has been already intimated, namely, the yet untried and immature state of our fiscal arrangements. The general reasoning on this head was strengthened by an occurrence altogether unlooked for, which disclosed itself on the 23d of August, 1790, eleven days after the rising of Congress—an occurrence which they had not contemplated in their pecuniary dispositions. I allude to the commencement of an Indian war, which was announced in a Letter from Governor St. Clair, dated on the above-mentioned day, the progressive extent and consequences of which could, of course, not be foreseen. Under such circumstances, I judged it for the public interest and safety to hold the resource which the prospect of a Loan presented under the power of the Treasury till advice should be received of the actual institution of the Loan, with intention then to dispose of it as should appear advisable, under a better matured view of our pecuniary situation and prospects.

Hence the delay which attended the application of the second Loan; the first in fact that originated subsequent to the laws for borrowing. But after advice had been received of its having been set on foot, no time was lost in converting it with due despatch to its proper uses. There was only, not an anticipation of its application. As early as May 24th, 1791, I wrote a letter to Mr. Short (a copy of which is in possession of the House) empowering him to apply the proceeds of all future Loans, as they should accrue, in payments to France; except as to such sums as therein were, or afterwards should be previously and specially reserved. This arrangement was calculated to obviate the inconvenience of leaving the proceeds of the Loans, for any considerable time, unemployed. At the period of making it, and not sooner, the public prospects appeared to me sufficiently unfolded, to render a general and permanent disposition free from hazard. This instruction preceded in due season all the Loans subsequent to that of March, 1791.

Whatever delay, therefore, may have attended succeeding investments for paying the French Debt, is not attributable to this Department. And I think it will not appear, that any has been incurred, in respect to the sums which were destined for the public service here. In judging of this point it will be proper to observe, that a latitude of six months, for making their payments, has been reserved to the money-lenders, though with liberty to make them earlier. It was, however, necessary for the Treasury to regulate its bills according to the possible delay, lest they should not meet adequate funds. The general policy adopted was to let them fall upon the rear of each Loan; this giving a freer course for early payments to France, and best conciliating a certainty of funds for answering the bills, with as little double interest as possible.

It will appear, that notwithstanding the arrangement which was made, a considerable time intervened between the two last payments to France, while there were funds in hand waiting for employment. It may be expected, that the causes of this procrastination, though as I have said not imputable to this Department, should be unfolded to the House. Particular circumstances, however, induce me to confine myself to stating generally, that the delay proceeded, in the first place, from expectation given to Mr. Short, and kept up from time to time by the French Minister of Marine, that a plan would be adopted, to which a decree of the National Assembly was requisite, for converting a large sum into supplies for St. Domingo, which Mr. Short concluded justly must come out of the Foreign Fund, and consequently suspended its application in Europe. In the second place, from a desire to settle, previously to further payments, a definitive rule, by which the moneys paid, should be liquidated and credited to the United States.

Both the one and the other appears to have been procrastinated from period to period, by the disordered state of French affairs, and to have finally issued contrary to expectation. It would be an unnecessary commitment of my opinion to declare, how far the delay appears to me to have been justified by the causes. But, being led by the occasion to take notice of it, I think it improper to send it abroad, liable, perhaps, to misconstruction, without observing that the inducements appear to me, to have been weighty; that the delays naturally grew out of the circumstances, and that I am entirely persuaded of the goodness of the motives which governed. The correspondence before the Senate contains the particulars of the transaction.

Having pointed out the instances of material delay which happened, and the causes of them, it remains to state what circumstances there are to counterbalance the loss on that account.

These circumstances are of two kinds.

1. Gain by exchange in the sale of the bills drawn by the Treasury and upon the higher rate of interest on the credits which were given for those bills, than was payable on the fund upon which they were drawn.

2. Gain by exchange on the payments to France. According to my calculation, founded on the best information extant, the real par of the metals between the United States and Amsterdam, makes a current guilder equal to 35-99-100 ninetieths of a dollar. The lowest rate which has been obtained for the bills has been 36 4-11 ninetieths, with an allowance of sixty days credit without interest. Making a deduction for the interest the bills were still sold above the true par. In some instances they have been sold as high as forty cents and seven mills per guilder, with interest for the whole term of the credit given.

The rate of interest for the credits allowed upon the bills was six per cent, the mean interest paid upon the fund five per cent. producing consequently a gain of one per cent.

With regard to the payments to France, if the current rate of exchange between Paris and Amsterdam at the moment of each remittance or payment were to govern, a large profit would result to the United States. But certain equitable considerations will produce deductions, which will greatly lessen this advantage; yet, making a liberal allowance for them, there is ground to calculate that a saving may be made in this particular, more than sufficient to indemnify for the loss of interest. Hence, any positive advantage which will have been otherwise gained, will probably be undiminished by that circumstance.

I proceed, in the next place, to state the views which prevailed respecting the sums that have been from time to time drawn for; the purposes they have hitherto answered, and the further advantages to be expected from the measure.

The direct object of all the sums drawn for prior to July, 1792, was the purchase of the Debt. A collateral consideration, which operated in the first stages of drawing, has also been mentioned. It has likewise been stated, that the early purchases of the Debt are to be ascribed to the instrumentality of the fund derived from the Loans. This idea shall now be explained.

Two mistakes appear to have influenced the impressions which have been entertained in relation, directly or indirectly, to this subject.

1st. It seems to have been all along forgotten, that a considerable part of the duties is always outstanding, on account of the credits which are given; whence the assertion, that the Sinking Fund has continually overflowed from domestic resources.

2d. It seems to have been taken for granted that the proceeds of the Loans have remained apart, distinct from the mass of the money in the Treasury; while in truth the course of the business has been to turn them over to the Treasurer by warrants as they have been received, so as to form a part of the aggregate, from time to time appearing in his hand and in his accounts. The Banks have been the agents employed for selling the bills, sometimes warrants on account have issued upon them, from the sums accruing from the sales, at other times the warrants have been deferred till the whole proceeds of any parcel have been received, and the accounts of the Bank settled at the Treasury, as the state of the Treasury has happened to render the one or the other most convenient.

The Banks of North America and New York were the agents for the sale of all the bills, which were sold prior to April, 1792, amounting to $1,006,626 36. Of this sum $361,391 84 were passed over to the Treasurer in 1791; $397,136 22 in March, 1792, and $140,000 in June following; the residue having remained as heretofore stated, in deposit with the Bank of North America, upon a special consideration. This is exclusive of certain bills furnished for the use of the Department of State, amounting to $78,766 07.

The remainder of the bills which have been sold, beginning in April, 1792, were sold by the Bank of the United States and its branches at New York and Baltimore. The accounts of the sales had just been made out for settlement, when the present inquiry began, but warrants had not yet issued for placing the proceeds in the Treasury. It will be remarked that, from the terms of credit allowed, they only began to be receivable in October last; the 26th day of which month the first return made by the Bank shows a sum of $127,225 53 received; and that the collection had not been completed when the accounts of the sales were rendered.

These are different views of the subject, which will enable the House to perceive that the possession of the fund in question was necessary to enable the Treasury to furnish the means of making all the purchases which were made prior to July, 1792.

It is true, that there was a surplus of revenue to the end of the year 1790, equal to $1,374,656 40, which was appropriated to purchases of the Debt; and from the credits then given upon the duties, this surplus would naturally come into the Treasury in the course of the year 1791.

But the Legislature, foreseeing that the revenue of 1791, from the same cause, could not actually be in the Treasury, within that year, to face the appropriation upon it, (which if it is to be observed were nearly commensurate with the fund,) inserted a clause in the law, appropriating the surplus of 1790, to the purchase of the Debt, which authorized a reservation of so much of that surplus as might be necessary to make the payments of interest during 1791, in case of a deficiency in the receipts into the Treasury, on account of the current revenue of the year.

It will appear to the House, upon a recurrence to the Treasurer's quarterly account, ending the 30th of September, 1791, that the balance of cash then on hand was $662,233 99.

At that time there had been paid into the Treasury, upon warrants, from the proceeds of the bills drawn upon the Foreign Fund $361,391 34. Consequently, the balance of cash, had it not been for that auxiliary, would have been only $300,842 65, considering the whole balance in the Treasury as representing an equal sum of the proceeds of the bills.

Even in a time of complete peace, in a country where a small extent of moneyed capital forbids a reliance upon large pecuniary aids to be suddenly obtained, a prudent administrator of the finances could not feel entirely at ease, with a less sum at all times in the certain command of the Treasury, than $500,000, for meeting current demands and extra exigencies, which, in the affairs of a nation, are every moment to be expected. But with a war actually on hand, and a possibility of its extension to a more serious length, he would be inexcusable, in leaving himself with a less sum at command; unless from an impracticability of doing otherwise. It would be always his duty to combine two considerations—the chance of extra calls for money, and a possibility of some failure in the receipts which were expected. Derangements of various kinds may happen in the commercial circle, capable of interrupting for a time the punctual course of payments to the Treasury. It is necessary to a certain extent to be prepared for such casualties.

But during the year 1791, there was a circumstance which operated as an additional reason for keeping a respectable sum always on hand. The Loans of the Domestic Debt were going on till the last of September of that year, while at the same time, the interest was in a course of payment. It was, therefore, always uncertain what sum would be payable at the end of a quarter; this depending on the eagerness or backwardness of the public creditors in bringing forward their subscriptions, or their claims as non-subscribers. The omissions, at the end of a preceding quarter, might be expected to fall on a subsequent one, and it was necessary to be prepared for that possibility; of course to keep in hand a larger sum for contingent demands. This necessity extended to the termination of the period for receiving subscriptions, because the Treasury was to be prepared on the supposition that the whole of the Domestic Debt would then be in a state to receive interest either, as subscribed or unsubscribed. But this did not in fact happen. A part of the sums which were presented were crowded into the last days of the quarter, and were too late for a dividend. A considerable sum remained ultimately in a form which, according to the terms of the provision, did not entitle it to interest, either as subscribed or as unsubscribed Debt.

Hence the cash in the Treasury on the 1st of October, 1791, was by a considerable sum greater than was to have been counted upon or than might have happened.

The conclusion which results from the foregoing observations is this, that the purchases which preceded the 1st of October, 1791, and which amounted to $699,984 23 in specie, could not have been hazarded, but for the aid of the sums which had actually accrued from the proceeds of the bills and the expectation of those which were to accrue from the yet uncollected proceeds of others.

Had it not been for this aid, the Treasury would have been left more bare than was consistent with the security of public credit and the certain execution of the public service.

There is, however, a later period in the state of the Treasury, which will more completely illustrate the idea intended to be established. This is the 2d of July, 1792.

On that day, the balance of cash in the Treasury, comprehending the deposits in all the Banks, and including a sum of $200,000, received on Loan of the Bank of the United States, together with a sum of $220,900 in bills drawn upon Domestic Funds, the proceeds of which had not been received, was $623,133 61.

Prior to this period a further sum of $545,902 89 arising from the sales of Foreign bills had been placed in the Treasury, by warrants, making with the former sums placed there from the same source, $907,294 23.

Had it not been for this auxiliary, and that of the Loan from the Bank, the Treasury would then have been in arrear $484,160 62. It, therefore, necessarily follows, that for the purchases to that period, which amounted in specie to $942,672 54, at least $484,160 62 must have come from the Foreign Fund.

But when it is considered, for the reasons which have been stated, and which will hereafter be fortified by others, tending, as I conceive, to give them conclusive force, that the sum in the Treasury at the period in question was barely what ought to have been there for safety, and for a due supply of current demands; it will follow that the whole or nearly the whole of the purchases which were made previous to July, 1792, were made by the means or instrumentality of the Foreign Fund.

A similar view, extended to the subsequent quarter, will exhibit this point in a still clearer light. The balance then in the Treasury, including a further Loan from the Bank of $100,000, was only $420,914 51.

What, then, it may be asked, became of the surplus of revenue to the end of 1790? What was the office performed by that fund during the period in question?

The answer is, that it served exactly the purpose which was anticipated by the Legislature. It came in aid of the current receipts for satisfying the current expenditures of 1791, with particular reference to the interest of the Debt. This will easily be comprehended when it is recollected that the appropriations made during 1791, upon the revenues of that year, and some small surpluses of antecedent appropriations, amounted to three million six hundred and thirty-seven thousand and fifty-eight dollars and thirty-four cents; that the revenues themselves amounted to no more than $3,553,195 18; and that at the end of 1791, there were outstanding in bonds for the duties on imports, besides the chief part of the proceeds of the duties on spirits distilled within the United States, then also uncollected, $1,828,269 28.

On this point likewise, of the surplus of revenue to the end of 1790, it is presumable a misapprehension has been entertained. It seems to have been supposed, that that surplus, as well as the proceeds of the Foreign Fund, have been kept separate and distinct from the common mass of the moneys appearing from time to time to be in the Treasury. It has been already observed, that this was not the case with regard to the Foreign Fund. It is now proper to add, that it has not been the case, either, with regard to the surplus in question. That surplus, as received by the Collectors of the Customs, has regularly passed into the Treasury, and appears in the quarterly accounts of the Treasurer for the periods to which they relate.

It is the course of the Treasury, resulting from the constitution of the Department, for all moneys from whatever source to be brought into it, to constitute an aggregate, subject to the dispositions prescribed by law. The moneys to be employed in the Sinking Fund have consequently only been separated, as they have been called for, for actual investment. The only exception to this, relates to that part of the Sinking Fund which is created by the interest of the Debt purchased. This has been included in the quarterly dividends, and covered by the warrants, in favor of the cashiers of the Banks for paying those dividends, after which, they have passed into a distinct account, in the books of the Bank opened with Samuel Meredith, as agent to the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund.

To the foregoing representation, it may seem an objection that the purchases to the end of 1791, appear to have been carried to the account of the surplus at the end of 1790.

The ultimate form which it has been judged convenient to give to the transaction in the accounts of the Treasury, cannot change what was truly the course of facts. The proceeds of the above mentioned surplus and of the Foreign Loans formed together the fund for purchases. In the accounts of the Treasury, the thing was susceptible of various modifications at pleasure. The two parts of the fund might have been united in one account, or divided into distinct accounts. Being separated, moneys issued for purchases might have been legally carried to either of them.

It was judged most advisable, in the forms of the Treasury, to place the purchases to the end of 1791, to the account of the Domestic Fund, because it was calculated to give greater latitude and energy to the Sinking Fund. Had not this course been pursued, the business would have taken the following shape: the Foreign Fund to the extent of the purchases, would have been exhausted—the whole, or the greater part of the surplus of 1790, would have continued wrapt up in the expenditure of 1791, not liable to be liberated, till the receipts into the Treasury should yield a correspondent surplus beyond the actual disbursements—which could not have been the case, while the war with the Indians continues to call for extraordinary expenditures.

From the form into which the thing has been thrown, the Foreign Fund has been set free to be applied to further purchases; and a necessity produced of anticipating the outstanding duties, by temporary Loans for the current service.

I trust there can be no doubt, that the course pursued was regular, and within the discretion of the Department. I hope, also, that it will appear to the House to have been the most eligible. The expediency of giving the earliest and greatest possible extent and activity to whatever concerns the Sinking Fund, will, it is presumed, unite all opinions.

What has been said hitherto respecting the employment of the Foreign Fund is applicable only to that part of it which was drawn for prior to April, 1792; the residue standing in a different situation, and requiring a separate examination.

From the statement which has been given, it may be perceived that the fund in question has neither been idle nor useless. A confirmation of this will be found in the following details.

The whole sum successively received on account of Amsterdam bills, up to the 17th of August, 1791, was $361,391 34. The amount of the moneys invested in purchases, prior to that day, was $350,000, chiefly by anticipation of those receipts.

The whole sum successively received on account of Amsterdam bills, from August 17, 1791, to March 1, 1792, was $408,722 69. The amount of the moneys invested in purchases between those periods, was $349,984 23; chiefly in the month of September, and by anticipation of those receipts.

The whole sum successively received on account of Amsterdam bills, subsequent to the 1st of March, and prior to July, 1792, was $235,412 33. The amount of the moneys invested in purchases between those periods, was $242,688 31.

It was stated in my first letter, that $177,998 80, of the proceeds of the Foreign bills were left in deposit with the Bank of North America; and in a note upon statement B, accompanying that letter, the occasion of it was shown to be an advance without interest, made by that Bank, for the use of the Department of War; which could not yet be covered, in consequence of a doubt still remaining whether the fund appropriated for satisfying that object was adequate to it; the sufficiency of that fund depending in part on certain unexpended residues of antecedent appropriations, which it was expected would not be finally necessary for satisfying the purposes of those appropriations.

It is to be remarked, that the delay of the employment of this part of the proceeds of the Foreign Fund, has been compensated by a saving of interest on the sum advanced by the Bank, which otherwise must have been procured upon a Loan, with an allowance of interest, probably, at the time of the advance, at a rate of six per cent.; so that even in this particular, the fund, though temporarily suspended from its destination, has not been idle or unproductive. I reserve for another place some additional observations and statements, which will be calculated to show that opportunities of investing the moneys at any time on hand, applicable to purchases of the Debt, were not suffered to pass unimproved; and that as much in this respect was done, as the state of the Treasury and the state of the market would permit.

It has been said, that a distinct examination would be proper with regard to the bills which have been drawn upon the Foreign Fund, subsequent to March, 1792. I proceed now to this examination.

The expediency of what has been in this respect done, seems to have been called in question, under a suggestion that an application of the fund to purchases had ceased to be advantageous.

The drawing of these bills has been, at different periods, influenced by various considerations. A leading motive was always the purchase of the Debt; and a correct view of the subject will, I doubt not, satisfy the House, that the measure was recommended by an adequate prospect of advantage.

It is to be observed that all these drafts were predicated upon the two four per cent. Loans; being, as already stated, real four-and-a-half per cent. Loans.

There was good ground to presume that opportunities would be found of investing the moneys drawn for in purchases which would yield at least five per cent., with a possibility of doing still better. The difference of half per cent. was alone an object of importance; but it would be coupled with the further benefit of reducing a principal sum materially exceeding the sum invested. When the three per cents. are purchased at twelve shillings in the pound, there is not only a redemption of an annuity of five per cent., but a sinking of a capital of twenty shillings for twelve. And though this might not be material if the market rate of interest should never fall below five, because in that case the three per cents. might always be purchased at the same rate; yet if it should at any time happen that interest fell below five, it would be a gain to the Government to have purchased at five, in exact proportion to the difference between five and the then market rate. Add to this, that the three per cents. have generally a value in the market more than proportioned to the income they produce, which arises from the capacity of the capital to appreciate even to par.

These observations are, also, for the most part, applicable to the deferred, with this circumstance in addition, that when interest begins to be payable on that species of stock, the money invested, and which in the mean time would have produced five, would then begin to produce to the Government six per cent., with the advantage of having anticipated the redemption of a species of stock of right only gradually redeemable. Combining these considerations, it appears to be clearly and even eminently for the interest of the Government to purchase within the limits suggested, with a fund which does not cost more than four-and-a-half per cent.

That this was the view of the subject which governed, is deducible, not only from the circumstances of the fact, but from my letter of the 2d of April, 1792, to Mr. Short, announcing my intention to draw, in which I assign, as the ground of that intention, "that I considered it for the interest of the United States to prosecute purchases of the Public Debt, with moneys borrowed on the terms of the last Loan;" meaning the Loan of the 1st of January, 1792, at four per cent.

If the event be taken as a criterion, the anticipation will be more than justified; the present juncture offering an opportunity for purchases peculiarly advantageous.

But, without insisting on a state of things occasioned by extraordinary circumstances, it was morally certain that the common course of events would render the operation a beneficial one. And it would not argue peculiar foresight if a calculation was even made on the effect which the situation and probable progress of affairs in Europe might produce upon our market. A pretty general war there, by extending the demand for money, would naturally divert from our stocks a portion of what might otherwise be employed upon them, and affect injuriously their prices. It is also a familiar fact, that during the winter, in this country, there is always a scarcity of money in the towns; a circumstance calculated to damp the prices of stock.

A consideration which collaterally influenced the drawing of the latter bills, was the situation of the French Colony of St. Domingo.

This not only produced an early application for a considerable advance, which was promised, but it was to be foreseen that still further aids would be indispensable.

Indeed, sundry letters from Mr. Short—the first dated at Paris, the 28th of December, 1791—announced the daily probability of an arrangement, requiring an advance here of $800,000, for the use of that Colony. A sum of four millions of livres has in fact been successively stipulated for that object, the greatest part of which has been actually furnished.

It is known that these supplies could proceed from no other source than the Foreign Fund.

The payment to the foreign officers of near two hundred thousand dollars, by which an interest of six per cent. would be released, was another object for which provision was to be made out of the same fund.

These several purposes conspired, with the object of purchasing the Debt, to induce the latitude of drawing which took place.

But there was still a further inducement, which came in aid of the others. The time for reimbursing the first instalment of the two millions of dollars due to the Bank, was approaching, when, by positive stipulation, the Government would have to pay two hundred thousand dollars, for which there was no Domestic Fund that could be spared from the current exigencies. I thought it incumbent upon this Department to have an eye to placing within the reach of the Legislature the means of fulfilling this engagement; the object of which bore a strict analogy to that for which the two millions, authorized by the act making provision for the reduction of the Public Debt, were to be borrowed.

I did not even scruple to take into the calculation, that if, from the extent of the drafts upon the Foreign Fund, there should happen to be found on hand a larger sum than was necessary for, or could be advantageously employed towards, the several purposes which were the immediate and direct objects of the operation, the surplus would facilitate to the Government a measure manifestly and unequivocally beneficial—an additional payment to the Bank, on account of a Debt, upon which an annual interest of six per cent. was payable; a measure by which a certain saving of one per cent. to the extent of the payment that might be made would be accomplished.

The possibility of this application of the fund, afforded a perfect assurance that the public interest could in no event fail to be promoted.

I felt myself more at liberty to do it, because it did not interfere with a complete fulfilment of the public engagements in regard to the Foreign Debt. It could be done consistently with a full reimbursement of all arrears and instalments which had accrued on account of that Debt.

The detail which has been given comprehends a full exposition of the views and motives that have regulated the conduct of this Department in relation to those parts of the proceeds of the Foreign Loans which have been transferred to the United States, except as to the last sum of one million two hundred and thirty-seven thousand five hundred florins, directed to be drawn for on the 30th of November last; in regard to which, circumstances of a special nature co-operated, as is explained in a note upon the copy of my letter of the 26th of that month, to Mr. Short, forming a part of the communication herewith made by order of the President of the United States.

The House will perceive that the variety of matter comprised in this letter, has not been collected and digested into its present form without much labor, and unavoidable expense of time. I trust they will be sensible that no delay has been unnecessarily incurred. It is certain that I have made every exertion in my power, at the hazard of my health, to comply with the requisitions of the House as early as possible; and it has even been done with more expedition than was desirable to secure the perfect accuracy of the communication.

Yet I have still to regret that some part of the subject must remain to be presented in a subsequent letter. To lessen, however, the inconvenience of this further delay, I shall transmit, with the present letter, the statements required by the first and second of the resolutions of the 23d of January, which will be found in the schedules herewith marked No. I to V; these required by the last of the resolutions having been already forwarded.

There remain, however, some particulars to complete the information contemplated by those resolutions, that must be reserved for another communication. This I may venture to assure the House will not be deferred beyond the present, or at least the first day of the ensuing week.

With perfect respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient and most humble servant,

ALEXANDER HAMILTON,

Secretary of the Treasury.

The Hon. the SPEAKER,
of the House of Representatives.

The previous sickness, and afterwards the death of Mr. Eveleigh, the late Comptroller, which happened on the 15th of April, 1791, occasioned an accommodation between the Secretary of the Treasury and the Bank of North America, with respect to a number of warrants which were not countersigned, the Bank agreeing to pay them and retain them in its possession till the appointment of a Comptroller, when they could be regularly countersigned and charged to my account. This caused an agreement with the Comptroller, that the two first quarters of the year 1791 might be included in one account, in order that the different offices in the Treasury Department should correspond in their balances.

TREASURY OF THE UNITED STATES,
 SAMUEL MEREDITH, Treasurer of the United States.

Loans.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 13, 1793.

SIR: In obedience to an order of the President of the United States, founded upon the requests contained in two resolutions of the House of Representatives, of the 23d of January last, I have the honor to lay before the House—

1. The several papers numbered, 1, 2, 3, 4, being copies of the authorities under which Loans have been negotiated, pursuant to the acts of the 4th and 12th of August, 1790.

2. Sundry letters, as per list at foot, from the Secretary of the Treasury to William Short, Esq., and to Wilhem and J. Willinks, N. and J. Van Staphorst, and Hubbard, being copies of the authorities respecting the application of the moneys borrowed.

3. Statement A, showing the names of the persons by whom, and to whom, the respective payments of the French Debt have been made in Europe, specifying the dates of the respective payments, and the sums. With regard to the precise dates of the respective drafts which may have been drawn, or orders which may have been given by Mr. Short to our bankers, for making those payments, they cannot be furnished, not being known at the Treasury. It is, however, to be inferred, from the correspondence and circumstances, that they preceded but a short time the respective payments to which they related.

Statement B, showing by whom the payments have been made, on account of the Dutch Loans, the dates, and the sums. As to the persons to whom the payments were made, no specification is practicable, these being the numerous subscribers to the several Loans, their agents, or assignees. It has never been considered, either under the former or present Government, as interesting to the Treasury to know who those individuals were. Indeed, by the transfers always going on, they are continually changing. The demand for a communication of their names would have been unprecedented, and the disclosure, from time to time, would have been attended with a great deal of useless, but expensive trouble.

The statement desired, in reference to the Spanish Debt, cannot be furnished. In a note upon statement No. 1, of my late Report, concerning Foreign Loans, it is mentioned, "that advice had been received that the payment of this Debt was going on, though it had not been completed." This appears by letters from Mr. Short, now before the Senate, dated August 30th, and October 9th and 22d. No advice of the completion of the payment has been since received. All that is known is, that our bankers were procuring bills under orders from Mr. Short, for the purpose of remitting to Spain the sum necessary to discharge her debt.

There will be seen a difference in the statement now presented, and No. 1 of my late Report, concerning Foreign Loans, as to the date of the last payment to France. In one, the 9th of August is mentioned, in the other, of the 6th of September. The fact is, that it had its inception some time in August, but was not perfected till the 6th of September. Mr. Morris, who had been charged by Mr. Short with endeavoring to adjust, with the French Treasury, the rule by which the payments that had been, and might be made, should be liquidated into livres, having regard to certain equitable considerations, made an arrangement with it, provisionally, for the payment of 1,641,250 florins, [1,625,000 Banco,] and wrote to Mr. Short, requesting that he would direct the payment to be completed. There appeared to have been two letters from Mr. Morris on the subject, one dated the 6th, the other the 9th of August. But Mr. Short, for reasons which he explains in his correspondence, now before the Senate, did not consummate the payment till the 6th of September. One statement has reference to the beginning, the other, to the conclusion of the affair.

I am instructed by the President to observe, that there are some circumstances in the communications now made, which would render a public perusal of them not without inconvenience.

With perfect respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient and most humble servant,
ALEXANDER HAMILTON, Secretary of the Treasury.

The Hon. the SPEAKER of the House of Representatives.

No. 1.

George Washington, President of the United States of America, to the Secretary of the Treasury for the time being.

By virtue of the several acts, the one, entitled "An act making provision for the Debt of the United States," and the other entitled "An act making provision for the reduction of the Public Debt," I do hereby authorize and empower you, by yourself, or any other person or persons, to borrow, on behalf of the United States, within the said States, or elsewhere, a sum or sums, not exceeding, in the whole, fourteen millions of dollars, and to make, or cause to be made, for that purpose, such contract or contracts, as shall be necessary, and for the interest of the said States, subject to the restrictions and limitations in the said several acts contained; and, for so doing, this shall be your sufficient warrant.

In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the United States to be hereunto affixed.

Given under my hand, at the city of New York, this twenty-eighth day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

By the President:

TH. JEFFERSON.

Loans.

No. 2.

George Washington, President of the United States of America, to the Secretary of the Treasury for the time being.

Having thought fit to commit to you the charge of borrowing, on behalf of the United States, a sum or sums, not exceeding, in the whole, fourteen millions of dollars, pursuant to the several acts, the one, entitled "An act making provision for the Debt of the United;" the other, entitled "An act making provision for the reduction of the Public Debt:"

I do hereby make known to you, that, in the execution of the said trust, you are to observe and follow the orders and directions following, viz: Except where otherwise especially directed by me, you shall employ, in the negotiation of any Loan or Loans, which may be made in any foreign country, William Short, Esq. You shall borrow, or cause to be borrowed, on the best terms which shall be found practicable, (and within the limitations prescribed by law as to time of repayment and rate of interest,) such sum or sums, as shall be sufficient to discharge, as well all instalments, or parts of the principal of the Foreign Debt which now are due, or shall become payable to the end of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, as all interest and arrears of interest, which now are, or shall become due, in respect to the said Debt, to the same end of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one. And you shall apply, or cause to be applied, the moneys which shall be so borrowed, with all convenient despatch, to the payment of the said instalments, and parts of the principal and interest, and arrears of the interest of the said Debt. You shall not extend the amount of the Loan which you shall make, or cause to be made, beyond the sum which shall be necessary for completing such payment, unless it can be done upon terms more advantageous to the United States than those upon which the residue of the said Debt shall stand or be. But, if the said residue, or any part of the same, can be paid off by new Loans, upon terms of advantage to the United States, you shall cause such further Loans as may be requisite to that end, to be made, and the proceeds thereof to be applied accordingly. And for carrying into effect the objects and purposes aforesaid, I do hereby further empower you to make, or cause to be made, with whomsoever it may concern, such contract or contracts, being of a nature relative thereto, as shall be found needful, and conducive to the interest of the United States.

If any negotiation with any Prince or State, to whom any part of the said Debt may be due, should be requisite, the same shall be carried on through the person who, in capacity of Minister, Chargé des Affaires or otherwise, now is, or hereafter shall be charged with transacting the affairs of the United States, with such Prince or State; for which purpose I shall direct the Secretary of State, with whom you are in this behalf to consult and concert, to co-operate with you.

Given under my hand at the city of New York, this twenty-eighth day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety.

GEO. WASHINGTON.

No. 3.

To all to whom these presents shall come:

Whereas, by an act, passed the fourth day of August, in this present year, entitled "An act making provision for the Debt of the United States," it is, among other things, enacted, that the President of the United States be authorized to cause to be borrowed, on behalf of the United States, a sum or sums, not exceeding in the whole twelve millions of dollars, and that so much of that sum as may be necessary to the discharge of the said arrears and instalments, and (if it can be effected upon terms advantageous to the United States) to the paying off the whole of the said Foreign Debt, be appropriated solely to those purposes; and that the President be, moreover, further authorized to cause to be made such other contracts respecting the said Debt as shall be found for the interest of the said States: Provided, nevertheless, That no engagement nor contract shall be entered into, which shall preclude the United States from reimbursing any sum or sums borrowed, within fifteen years after the same shall have been lent or advanced:

And, whereas, by another act, passed the twelfth day of August, in the present year, entitled "An act making provision for the reduction of the Public Debt," it is, also, among other things, enacted that the President of the United States be authorized to cause to be borrowed, on behalf of the United States, a sum or sums, not exceeding in the whole two millions of dollars, at an interest not exceeding five per cent:

And whereas, by virtue of the said several acts, the President of the United of America hath been pleased, by a certain commission or warrant, under his hand, to authorize and empower the Secretary of the Treasury for the time being, by himself, or any other person or persons, to borrow, on behalf of the United States, within the said States, or elsewhere, a sum or sums, not exceeding, in the whole, fourteen millions of dollars, and to make, or cause to be made, for that purpose, such contract or contracts as shall be necessary, and for the interest of the said States, subject to the restrictions and limitations in the said several acts contained: And whereas, Messrs. Wilhem and Jan Willink, and Nicholaas and Jacob Van Staphorst, and Hubbard, have, by letter, bearing date the 25th day of January, 1790, communicated to me, that they have entered into a certain provisional agreement or arrangement, for a Loan of three millions of florins, for the use of the United States of America, bearing an interest of five per centum per annum, and reimbursable by yearly instalments, of six hundred thousand florins, commencing in the year one thousand eight hundred and one, and ending in the year one thousand eight hundred and five: And whereas, it appears to me for the interest of the said United States to accept the said Loan:

Now, therefore, be it known: That I, Alexander Hamilton, Secretary of the Treasury of the United States for the time being, by virtue of the power and authority in me vested, by the said President of the United States, and in his name, and on behalf of the United States of America, and to their use, do, by these presents, accept, agree to, ratify, and confirm, the Loan aforesaid, provisionally undertaken by the said Wilhem and Jan Willink, and Nicholaas and Jacob Van Staphorst, and Hubbard. And I do hereby authorize and empower the said Wilhem and Jan Willink, and Nicholaas and Jacob Van Staphorst, and Hubbard, or, in case of the death of any of them, the survivors, to borrow, on behalf of the United States, either by way of confirmation of the said provisional agreement, or otherwise, as need may be, a sum or sums, not exceeding, in the whole, three millions of florins, subject to the restrictions and limitations in the said several acts contained and above recited; and for that purpose, in the name of the said President, on behalf of the United States of America, to execute such contracts, obligations, and instruments, as shall be necessary, and comfortable to usage, in the like cases, and the faith of the United States to pledge for the performance of the terms thereof; and if the same shall be deemed requisite, to stipulate for the ratification thereof by the President of the United States; hereby giving and granting to the said Wilhem and Jan Willink, and Nicholas and Jacob Van Staphorst, and Hubbard, and the survivors of them, all my power and authority, in the premises, and ratifying, allowing, and confirming, whatsoever they shall lawfully do therein.

In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the Treasury to be affixed to these presents, and have hereunto subscribed my hand, the twenty-eighth day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety.

ALEXANDER HAMILTON, Secretary of the Treasury.

No. 4.

To all to whom these presents shall come:

Whereas, by an act passed the fourth day of August, in this present year, entitled "An act making provision for the Debt of the United States," it is, among other things, enacted, that the President of the United States be authorized to cause to be borrowed, on behalf of the United States, a sum or sums, not exceeding in the whole twelve millions of dollars, and that so much of that sum as may be necessary to the discharge of the said arrears and instalments, and (if it can be effected upon terms advantageous to the United States) to the paying off the whole of the said Foreign Debt, be appropriated solely to those purposes; and that the President be, moreover, further authorized to cause to be made such other contracts respecting the said Debt, as shall be found for the interest of the said States: Provided, nevertheless, That no engagement nor contract shall be entered into, which shall preclude the United States from reimbursing any sum or sums borrowed, within fifteen years after the same shall have been lent or advanced:

And whereas, by another act, passed the 12th day of August, in the present year, entitled "An act making provision for the reduction of the Public Debt," it is, also, among other things, enacted, that the President of the United States be authorized to cause to be borrowed, on behalf of the United States, a sum or sums not exceeding in the whole two millions of dollars, at an interest not exceeding five per cent:

And whereas, by virtue of the said several acts, the President of the United States of America hath been pleased, by a certain commission or warrant, under his hand, to authorize and empower the Secretary of the Treasury for the time being, by himself, or any other person or persons, to borrow, on behalf of the United States, within the said States, or elsewhere, a sum or sums, not exceeding, in the whole, fourteen millions of dollars, and to make, or cause to be made, for that purpose, such contract or contracts as shall be necessary, and for the interest of the said States, subject to the restrictions and limitations in the said several acts contained:

Now, therefore, know ye: That I, Alexander Hamilton, Secretary of the Treasury of the United States for the time being, by virtue of the said commission, power, or warrant, of the President of the United States of America, have authorized and empowered, and, by these presents, do authorize and empower William Short, Chargé des Affaires of the United States at the Court of France, to borrow, on behalf of the United States, in any part of Europe, a sum or sums, not exceeding, in the whole fourteen millions of dollars, and to make, or cause to be made, for that purpose, such contract or contracts as shall be necessary, and for the interest of the said States; subject to the restrictions and limitations in the said several acts contained; and for so doing, this shall be his sufficient warrant.

In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the Treasury to be affixed to these presents, and have hereunto subscribed my hand, the first day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 13, 1793.

* The amount of livres here stated exceeds somewhat that which was stated in No. 1, of my last Report. It will be observed, that it was then mentioned, that the details of this transaction were wanting. They have since been received, and correspond with the present statement. The difference arises from the real rates of exchange at the times of the respective payments having been different from what was assumed by analogy as a rule of computation.

REMARKS.

(a) These Loans were negotiated under the late Government.

(b) The interest payable upon each of these Loans, at the expiration of the first year, was not due upon the entire capital borrowed, but in the proportion to the time in which the Loans were completed.

The sum of 1,833,189 florins, 2 stivers and 8 deniers, here stated, is the same as reported to the House by the Secretary on the 3d instant, in the statement No. 1.

ALEXANDER HAMILTON, Secretary of the Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 13, 1793.

PUBLIC FUNDS.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 14, 1793.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit, herewith, in further pursuance of the order of the Senate, of the 23d of January past, three several statements, marked A, B, C.

A, being a general account of revenue and appropriations: exhibiting, on one side, all the income of the United States, except from the proceeds of Loans foreign and domestic, to the end of the year 1792; on the other, the respective amounts of all the appropriations which have been made by law, to the same period.

B, being a general account of appropriations and expenditures to the same end of the year 1792. This statement takes up the excess of the appropriations beyond the expenditure, to the end of the year 1791, as contained in the account of Receipts and Expenditures, reported to the House of Representatives during the present session; and, including all the subsequent appropriations and expenditures to the end of 1792, shows the balance unsatisfied of each head of appropriation.

C, being an explanatory statement, for the purpose of showing a conformity between the aggregate of the balances of appropriations unsatisfied, and the balance of the public income beyond the public expenditure, to the end of the year 1792, as represented in the statement B, heretofore reported.

It will be observed, that the most considerable item among the balances of appropriations, is for interest on the Public Debt—amounting to one million three hundred and ninety-five thousand eight hundred and twenty-four dollars and sixty-five cents. This happens in three ways. 1st. The interest on the foreign part of the Debt has been paid in Europe, out of the proceeds of the Loans; the sum paid will consequently require to be replaced out of the domestic funds, and will operate as if an equal sum had been transferred here by drafts. 2d. The payment of interest to certain States, upon the difference between their quotas of the assumed Debt, and the sums subscribed upon the first Loan, has been suspended, in consequence of the opening of the second Loan, to avoid a double payment of interest, first to the States, and next to the subscribers, which might otherwise happen. 3d. There is a part of the Public Debt which has continued in a form that has not entitled the holders, under the existing laws, to receive interest, either as subscribers or non-subscribers.

There are certain arrears of interest, on the part of the Debt entitled to interest, which did not come into the accounts of the year 1792.

This balance of interest, however, will be a real future expenditure; as, indeed, will be the case with regard to most of the other balances of appropriations. There will be surplusses, but these surplusses cannot exceed, if they equal, the sum mentioned in my letter of the 4th instant, to the House of Representatives.

With perfect respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,
ALEXANDER HAMILTON, Secretary of the Treasury.

(b.) The interest on the Debt for the year 1792, as estimated.

(c.) The sum requested by the National Assembly of France, by their decree of June 26, 1792, for the Colony of St. Domingo, four million livres.

(d.) The sum actually advanced for the Mint establishment during the year 1792.

(e.) The Debt payable to foreign officers, contemplated in the fifth section of the act supplementary to the act making provision for the Debt of the United States.

(f.) In this balance is included two years' interest on the Foreign Debt, which has been paid out of the Foreign Loans, the accounts of which remain unsettled; also, the interest on that part of the Domestic Debt which has not been funded or registered at the Treasury, so as to be entitled to a dividend; and, also, the interest due to States on the unsubscribed balances of the assumed Debt, the payment of which is at present suspended.

(g.) Warrants for $445,263 83 had been drawn on the 31st of December, 1792, towards the Debt due to France, as stated in the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury of the 3d of January, 1793, $10,000 of which, however, had not been paid by the Treasurer at that time, and, consequently, not charged in his accounts.

ALEXANDER HAMILTON, Secretary of the Treasury.

Loans.

LOANS.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
February 19, 1793.

SIR: The last Letter which I had the honor to address to the House of Representatives contained a pretty full exposition of the conduct and views of this Department in regard to the Foreign Loans. There remain, however, some incidental topics which it may not be expedient to pass over in silence.

In order to carry the attention of the House immediately to a just application of the remarks which will be submitted, it is necessary to premise, that it is known to have been suggested that the proceeds of the Foreign bills drawn for to this country had no object of public utility, answered none, and were calculated merely to indulge a spirit of favoritism towards the Bank of the United States.

It has already been shown, clearly, I trust, that, but for the instrumentality of the parts of the Loan drawn for prior to April, 1792, amounting nearly to one-half of the whole sum, the purchases of the Debt which were made to that time could not have been made; and that these purchases, besides being the object designated by law for the application of the fund, were productive of positive and important advantages.

How far the operation could have been influenced by motives of favor to the Bank of the United States, the following facts will still more completely decide.

That Bank did not begin its operations till the 12th of December, 1791.

The Banks of North America and New York were the agents of the Treasury for the sale of the bills in question. They sold them, collected, and, with the exception which will be presently stated, disbursed the proceeds.

The receipts on account of those bills began in March, 1791, and concluded in March, 1792.

On the 31st of December, 1791, as the Treasurer's account before the House will show, the public cash was deposited as follows:

In the Bank of the United States	-	$133,000 00
In the Bank of North America	-	471,972 28
In the Bank of New York	-	224,677 35
In the Bank of Massachusetts	-	65,578 22
In the Bank of Maryland	-	50,665 29
In the Bank of Providence	-	7,969 61
Making, together	-	$953,862 75

There was then also some moneys in the Banks of North America and New York in a course of receipt which had not been passed over to the Treasurer; but all the public moneys, of whatever kind, in the Bank of the United States, are included in the above sum of $133,000, which had arisen from the duties on imports and tonnage.

It appears, then, that, on the 31st of December, 1791, no transfer for the benefit of the Bank of the United States had been made; and that the deposits of the Government there (exclusive of the proceeds of the bills remaining in the two Banks of North America and New York) amounted to little more than one-fourth of the deposits in the Bank of North America, and little more than one-half of those in the Bank of New York.

As late as the 1st of February, the State Banks continued to share with the Bank of the United States a large proportion of the public deposits. The state of the Treasury then was as follows, viz:

In the Bank of the United States	-	$456,278 90
In the Bank of North America	-	151,516 32
In the Bank of New York	-	128,708 21
In the Bank of Massachusetts	-	71,215 55
In the Bank of Maryland	-	49,583 25
In the Bank of Providence	-	7,969 61
Making, together	-	$865,271 84

A concentration of the public deposits in the Bank of the United States was a measure which grew out of the relation between that establishment and the Government; yet, instead of hastening it through favor, it was resolved to let it have a gradual course, so as to consult, in a due degree, the convenience of the other banks, and to effect it rather by letting the public disbursements fall upon the moneys in those banks than by direct transfer.

But a state of things took place in the month of February, between the Banks of the United States and North America, which rendered a more expeditious transfer than was meditated, for the mutual convenience of the two institutions.

The effect of this was, that the state of the Treasury, on the 1st of March, stood as follows:

In the Bank of the United States	-	$692,959 06
In the Bank of Massachusetts	-	31,769 05
In the Bank of New York	-	32,352 52
In the Bank of North America	-	31,515 74
In the Bank of Providence	-	8,404 94
In the Bank of Maryland	-	34,752 85
Making, together	-	$831,754 16

But at this time there was in the Bank of New York, from the proceeds of the Foreign bills, $121,984 71, not transferred to the account of the Treasurer.

This accumulation, however, in the Bank of the United States was of very short duration.

On the 1st of April ensuing, the state of the public cash was as follows:

In the Bank of the United States	-	$359,643 64
In the Bank of New York	-	254,930 41
In the Bank of North America	-	31,515 74
In the Bank of Massachusetts	-	37,712 58
In the Bank of Providence	-	7,156 65
In the Bank of Maryland	-	60,418 32
Making, together	-	$751,377 34

A similar state of things lasted to the 1st of June, comparatively more disadvantageous to the Bank of the United States. The receipts of public revenue continued to go into the Bank of New

Loans.

York till the 1st of April, 1792, when a branch of the Bank of the United States began to operate in that city, which is the reason of the sum in the Bank of New York bearing so near a proportion to that of the Bank of the United States, and so far exceeding the Bank of North America. By this time, also, the balance of the proceeds of Foreign bills had been passed to the account of the Treasurer, yet still remaining in deposit in the Bank of New York.

These views of the state of the public cash are conformable to the Treasurer's statement of half-monthly balances, accompanying my Letter of the 13th instant.

The same statement will show that a proportion of the public deposits has continued, since the 1st of April, 1792, in the State banks—in those of North America and New York down to the end of the period which that statement embraces.

From these details, the following inferences are deducible:

That, as far as any advantages may have accrued from the deposits, on account of the Foreign bills drawn prior to April, 1792, they accrued substantially to the Banks of North America and New York, not to the Bank of the United States, or to its branches. That, in transferring the pecuniary concerns of the Government from the pre-existing banks to that of the United States and its dependencies, a cautious regard has been paid to the convenience of the former institutions, and the reverse of a policy unduly solicitous for the accommodation of the Bank of the United States has prevailed. Indeed, so much has this been the case, that it might be proved, if it were proper to enter into the proof, that a criticism has been brought upon the conduct of the Department, as consulting less the accommodation of the last-mentioned institution than was due to its relation to the Government and to the services expected from it.

But further examination will demonstrate another point, which is, that none of the establishments in question have received any accommodations which were not in perfect coincidence with the public interest, and in the due and proper course of events.

This examination will be directed towards two objects—one, the state of the Treasury at the commencement of each quarter, during the years 1791 and 1792; the other, the state of the market in regard to the prices of stock during the same years.

These periods are selected because they afford the truest criterion of the state of the Treasury, from time to time, being those at which the principal public payments are made, and for which it is necessary to be prepared by intermediate accumulations.

The state of the Treasury at the periods in question was as follows:

In the year 1791—

January 1	-	-	-	$569,886	55
March 1	-	-	-	373,434	53

-----------	---	---	---	---------	----

This appears from the statements Nos. 4 and 5, forwarded with my last Letter.

The state of the stock market during the several quarters of the same years was as follows:

FIRST QUARTER OF 1791.

Six per cents.,	from	16s. 9d.	to	17s. 6d.
Three per cents.,	from	8s. 6d.	to	9s. 4d.
Deferred,	from	8s. 6d.	to	9s. 4d.

SECOND QUARTER OF 1791.

Six per cents.,	from	17s. 0d.	to	17s. 9d.
Three per cents.,	from	9s. 0d.	to	10s. 0d.
Deferred,	from	8s. 11d.	to	9s. 4d.

THIRD QUARTER OF 1791.

Six per cents.	from	17s. 10d.	to	21s. 3d.
Three per cents.,	from	9s. 9d.	to	12s. 5d.
Deferred,	from	9s. 9d.	to	12s. 10d.

As early as the 6th of August, the six per cents. had a temporary rise to 21s., but, by the 16th, they had fallen to 20s., on the 20th, they had risen to 20s. 6d., and were sometimes above that rate, but never lower during the rest of the quarter.

As early as the 23d of July, the three per cents. had reached 12s., and were sometimes higher, but never lower during the rest of the quarter.

On the 23d of July the deferred also reached 12s., and afterwards rose to 12s. 6d.

FOURTH QUARTER OF 1791.

Six per cents.,	from	20s. 4d.	to	22s. 4d.
Three per cents.,	from	12s. 2d.	to	13s. 8d.
Deferred,	from	11s. 8d.	to	13s. 6d.

The prices were lowest in the early, and highest in the latter part of the quarter.

During the whole of the month of December, the deferred was at 12s. 8d. and upwards, the greatest part of the time at 13s.

FIRST QUARTER OF 1792.

Six per cents.,	from	21s. 0d.	to	25s. 0d.
Three per cents.,	from	12s. 6d.	to	15s. 0d.
Deferred,	from	12s. 0d.	to	15s. 0d.

The low prices were, in the last ten days of March.

SECOND QUARTER OF 1792.

Six per cents.,	from	20s. 0d.	to	22s. 6d.
Three per cents.,	from	12s. 0d.	to	13s. 9d.
Deferred,	from	11s. 6d.	to	13s. 4d.

THIRD QUARTER OF 1792.

Six per cents.,	from	21s. 0d.	to	22s. 3d.
Three per cents.,	from	12s. 4d.	to	13s. 6d.
Deferred,	from	12s. 3d.	to	13s. 7d.

FOURTH QUARTER OF 1792.

Six per cents.,	from	20s. 2d.	to	21s. 9d.
Three per cents.,	from	12s. 3d.	to	13s. 6d.
Deferred,	from	11s. 10d.	to	13s. 6d.

Loans.

In October, the deferred was at the highest. The lowest prices were in the month of December.

This view of the subject is derived from a statement of prices, pursuant to actual purchases and sales, furnished by a dealer of this city, respectable for his intelligence and probity, combined with the accounts from time to time published in the Gazette of the United States. The papers marked (A x) and (B y) are transmitted for the more particular information of the House on this head.

The market prices of stock no doubt varied at other places; at some may have been higher, at others lower. At Philadelphia, too, it is believed that small sums were obtainable at particular periods, from necessitous individuals, below the prices in the statement.

But there is good ground of reliance that it is substantially a just representation of the state of the stock market during the periods to which it refers.

The state of the Treasury from the first of January to the first of October, 1791, may be said to have been at its proper level, exhibiting none, or an inconsiderable excess beyond the sum which has been mentioned as necessary to be there, and concerning which a further explanation has been promised, and will be given in the course of this Letter. The public purchases in August and September, 1791, amounted to $349,744 99.

In the last quarter of the year 1791, beginning with the month of November, and the first quarter of the year 1792, there appears to have been an excess of some magnitude in the Treasury, being from about $250,000 to about $450,000. Taking the first quarter of 1792 as the truest criterion, (which it certainly was, because, at the expiration of that quarter, the payment of interest on the assumed debt began, and was to be provided for,) the real excess ought to be considered as $250,000, with the addition of about $80,000 then in the Bank of North America, from the proceeds of Amsterdam bills, beyond the advances of the Bank for the public service, which had not been passed into the Treasurer's account. It is proper to remark that the course of importations occasions large receipts in the latter part of each year, which circumstance contributed to the accumulation in question.

From the last of November to about the 21st of March, an investment of the excess on hand in purchases was impracticable.

To enable the House to understand what is meant by saying that purchases were impracticable during that period, it is necessary to add, that the prices of stock exceeded the limits which the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund had prescribed to themselves. Indeed, a large proportion of the time those prices were manifestly artificial, and such as predicted a great fall not far distant. The delay incurred was accordingly well compensated by the prices at which investments were afterwards made.

From the 21st of March to the 25th of April, purchases were effected to the extent of $242,688 31 in specie; within $80,000 or $90,000 of what could have been spared, consistently with the rule which has been mentioned, as proper to regulate the arrangements of the Treasury.

But two circumstances operated against a further investment—a sudden rise of prices, and a state of temporary disorder in the two principal mercantile scenes of the country, (occasioned by the excessive speculations that had preceded,) which admonished the Treasury to be cautious in its disbursements.

It results from the foregoing view of the subject, that, as far as any extraordinary sum may appear to have remained unemployed in the banks a longer term than was desirable, it proceeded essentially from a state of things which did not permit its employment, and is in no degree attributable to that spirit of favoritism towards those establishments, or any of them, which has been imagined, as the solution of appearances not rightly understood and much overrated.

The only question, then, of which the matter is susceptible is this: Was not the state of things that did take place to have been foreseen, so as to have influenced the drawing for a proportionably less sum?

This question may safely be answered in the negative.

The bills, the proceeds of which contributed to constitute the excess, which remained unemployed during the two quarters, were drawn in May, 1791. In that month, the highest prices of stock were 17s. 2d. for six per cents., 9s. 2d. for three per cents., and 9s. 3d. for deferred.

No reasonable anticipation, at this juncture, of the progressive rise of stock could have carried it in so short a time to the height which it attained, or beyond the limits within which purchases were deemed advantageous. The rapid and extraordinary rise which did ensue was, in fact, artificial and violent, such as no discreet calculation of probabilities could have pre-supposed. It, therefore, cannot impeach the prudence or expediency of having made provision, on a different supposition, for an extension of purchases.

The proceeds of the bills which were drawn subsequent to May, only began to be collected about the beginning of February, and continued in collection until the 29th of March. On the 2d of February, the sum received amounted to no more than $13,431 33.

These last bills were drawn when the rapid rise of stock commenced, and were sold upon a credit of three months. It was a natural conjecture that a rise so sudden and violent could not be of long duration, and that a declension would shortly succeed, which would afford an opportunity of purchasing with advantage, and render the intervention of public purchases advantageous, in more than one respect. The event fully corresponded with the anticipation.

With regard to the bills drawn in April last, it has been stated that they were directed to be sold upon a credit of six months; that those drawn in July, August, and October, were made payable, one moiety in two, the other moiety in four months. Hence, with a moderate allowance for delay in the sales, the period contemplated by the arrangement for the commencement of receipts was the month of October, that for their consummation the month of February.

The inducements to the drawing of these bills have been stated. The present examination has relation merely to the question whether the Bank of the United States, by premeditation of this Department, or subsequent omissions, had enjoyed any undue advantage from the deposits of the proceeds of the bills at the end of the year 1792, the point of time to which this inquiry has reference.

The statement which has been made as to the time the moneys received to that period had remained in deposit might alone be relied upon as a sufficient answer. If delinquency can be attached to the non-employment of one or two hundred thousand dollars for a few weeks, in the money operations of a nation, it implies a minuteness of responsibility which could never be encountered with prudence, and never will be fulfilled in practice. The distractions of attention incident to a great and complicated scene of business, would alone disappoint the expectation.

But I have more than this to offer upon the present occasion. The opportunity for investing the moneys on hand, during the period in question, was not favorable. This was experienced by the Treasurer, in his endeavors to invest the fund arising from the interest on the purchased Debt. There was no part but the deferred which could be had at all within the limits prescribed. Several indications of an approaching season more advantageous for purchases were discernible, and a better employment of the money than at the then prices presented itself to the option of the Legislature. This mode of employing it formed, in my mind, part of a general plan for the regular redemption of the Public Debt, according to the right reserved to the Government. The one per cent. which might be saved was regarded as one means of constituting the proposed annuities.

Accordingly, on the 30th of November last, pursuant to a reference of the 22d of that month, and connected with the plan of redemption contemplated, I submitted to the House of Representatives a proposition for applying the moneys in question towards discharging the Debt which the Government owes to the Bank, and upon which an interest of six per cent. is payable. This was manifestly, at the time of the proposition, the most profitable use that could be made of the fund. It has been already stated that it would produce a saving, if extended to the whole two millions, worth to the Government an annual sum of twenty thousand dollars—equal to a capital of four hundred thousand dollars.

This proposition tended to accelerate the employment of the moneys on hand, in a way the most beneficial to the Government, and, consequently, to shorten the duration of the advantage to the banks of holding them by way of deposit. I submit it to the candor of the House, whether it be not full evidence that there was no disposition on my part to prolong to those institutions a benefit at the expense of the Government.

The proposition itself has not yet received the decision of the House.

Another ground upon which the suggestion of mismanagement and undue concession to the interest of the banks has been founded, respects the Domestic Loans which have been obtained. Those of them which have been made of the Bank of the United States are represented as unnecessary, tending to afford an emolument to that institution, for which the United States had no equivalent advantage.

It will conduce to a correct judgment of this matter to resume a point already touched upon, and to add here the further illustrations of it which have been promised, to wit: that it ought to be a general principle to have constantly in the command of the Treasury, at its different places of deposit, a sum of about $500,000—a principle, too, which must be understood with reference to the beginnings of the quarters of a year, when the chief public payments are made and making.

The following observations will apply generally to the balances which appear at the commencement of each quarter. The greatest part of the interest for the preceding quarter will have been then deducted, but a part is always in a different situation.

The payment of interest upon a Public Debt, at thirteen different places, is an operation as difficult and complicated as it is new. In carrying it into execution, it is of necessity to lodge, for some time previous to the expiration of each quarter, at several of the Loan Offices, drafts of the Treasurer for the sums estimated to be necessary at those offices, with blanks for the direction, and with liberty to the respective officers to dispose of them upon different places, as a demand accrues. This arrangement has an eye to two purposes—to avoid large previous accumulations at particular points; to facilitate the placing of the requisite sums where they are wanted, without the transportation of specie. The allowing of the drafts to be disposed of on several places gives larger scope to a demand for them, and renders them more easily saleable. But it is a consequence of this, that a part of the drafts are often not placed and brought into the accounts of the Treasurer until some time after the expiration of the quarter. The fund for them of course appears on hand until the transaction is completed.

Connected with the circumstance of paying the interest upon the Public Debt at different places is this further consequence: the transfers continually going on from one office to another render it impossible to know at any moment when provision for the payment of interest is to be made, what sum is requisite at each place. Estimate must supply the want of knowledge; and, to avoid disappointment anywhere, the estimate must always be large, and a correspondent sum placed in the power of the Commissioners. This circumstance alone requires an extra sum at the different places of payment, which ought not to be computed at less than $50,000.

Again: the sums payable on account of the Civil List, at the end of each quarter, which amount to about fifty thousand dollars, exclusive of what relates to the two Houses of Congress, are always in a course of payment for some time within the succeeding quarter. The fund for them, consequently, appears in the moneys on hand at the beginning of such quarter.

Again: there are constantly considerable arrears of existing appropriations, for which demands on the Treasury are at every moment possible; the times when they will be presented, and to what extent, at any given time, being in a great degree contingent. The arrears for the different objects of the War Department can seldom be estimated at less than $150,000.

It is presumed to be a clear principle that the Treasury ought to be always ready to face such arrears as may be claimed at every instant or within any short period. An hour's distress or embarrassment, to make good a public payment already due, would be baneful to public credit. It has been a uniform maxim of the present administration of the Treasury never to risk such distress or embarrassment.

Independently, therefore, of the weighty consideration of being prepared (especially, with a war on hand, liable every moment to greater extension) for future casualties, the mere satisfaction of arrears ought to cause the constant reservation of a sum that would be moderately stated at half the sum which it has been alleged ought always to be in the Treasury. It is to be observed, that it does not often happen that the current receipts to be expected in any immediately succeeding quarter are likely to exceed the probable expenditure of the quarter. The reverse is as often the case. Hence the greater necessity of maintaining a constant surplus.

There are still other considerations of weight, in a just estimate of the point in question.

The sum stated as necessary to be always in the command of the Treasury is never in fact at the Seat of the Government, where far the greatest part of the public disbursements are to be made. The depositories of it are the several banks from Charleston to Boston. The whole sum, therefore, can never be brought into immediate action for answering the claims upon the Treasury. No part can be properly viewed as in this situation beyond New York on the one side, and Baltimore on the other. Whatever part is more remote than those points ought not to be regarded as capable of being commanded in less time, upon an average, than sixty days, making allowance for the usual delays in the sale of bills, and the usual terms of credit, which experience has shown to be convenient.

In estimating the effective sum at any time on hand in the Bank of the United States, it is necessary to be known that a practice for the simplification of the Treasurer's bank account begun with the Bank of North America, has been continued with the Bank of the United States, of this nature: the bills drawn by the Treasurer upon distant places, and deposited with the Bank for sale, are immediately passed to his credit as cash, though they are allowed to be sold at credits from thirty to sixty days, and it is understood that the proceeds are not demandable of the Bank till they are collected. Hence, the apparent sum in the Bank of the United States is always greater than the real, sometimes to a large amount.

The deductions to be made for this circumstance are shown in the Treasurer's half-monthly statement of balances, No. 5, beginning with the 1st of June, 1792, and ending with the 1st of January, 1793. The period begun with is that when the first instalment of the Loan from the Bank was payable, and has been selected for this reason.

The propriety of these deductions appears to have been objected to, by anticipation, on two grounds—one, that the bills deposited answer all the purposes of cash, and ought to be credited as such, on the receipt of them; the other, that "there is a regular and constant influx of moneys into the Bank, by the operation of these bills, and that it is not very material whether a bill lodged in the Bank to-day should be paid to-day, provided something like the same sum should be paid in consequence of a bill lodged in Bank one or two months' ago, and the bill of to-day should be paid one or two months hence."

Neither the one nor the other of these two positions is correct.

In no sense are the notes of the purchasers of the bills, which are taken payable in thirty, forty-five, and sixty days, the same thing to a bank as cash. It is evident it could not pay its own bills with those notes. In this primary particular, therefore, the comparison fails. Neither could it make discounts upon the basis of those notes as cash; because every discount gives a right to a borrower to call and receive in coin, if he pleases, the amount of the sum discounted. Notes are not coin, nor do they confer an equal power to pay. It is true, that a bank will, in its discounts, make some calculation on expected receipts; but it can never consider them as equivalent to cash in hand, nor operate upon them in any degree to the same extent as upon equal sums in cash. If notes payable at future periods were equivalent to cash, then every discount made by a bank would confer a faculty to make another for an equal sum; for there is always a note deposited for the sum discounted, and the power of discounting might, by the mere exercise of it, become infinite. An hypothesis of this kind will never be acted upon by any prudent directors of a bank, and could not be long acted upon without ruin to the institution. It is to be observed, that the great profitable business of a bank consists in discounting.

There is but one light in which the position under examination is in any degree founded. It is this, that, were it not for the instrumentality of the bills, the specie of the Bank would be sometimes remitted for purposes which are answered by the bills. As often as this happens, they are a substitute to the Bank for cash, because they prevent equivalent sums from being carried away. But this only sometimes happens. In numerous instances, the enterprises to which the bills are subservient, would not be undertaken at all, were it not for the power of anticipation which the credits upon them afford. In many other instances, the bills of the Bank itself would be remitted instead of specie; in others, private bills would be substituted; in others, mutual credits between the merchants, to be liquidated in the course of mutual dealings, would supply the call. Hence it is only true that Treasury bills sometimes answer the purpose of cash to the Bank, whence it does not follow that they ought always to be considered and credited definitively as cash. It is also true, though in a less degree, that notes deposited with the Bank by individuals for collection, sometimes answer to it the purposes of cash; but it will be readily perceived that it would be inadmissible, as a general rule, to receive and credit them as such. The effect in both cases would be, that the Bank would make an advance of a present sum without interest, for a sum to be received in future.

An arrangement, indeed, has been for some time depending between the Bank of the United States and the Treasury, for securing to the Government the advantage of an immediate absolute credit for the bills deposited, as so much cash, to be coupled with some collateral accommodations to the Bank. But it has not yet been carried into effect. The fact heretofore has been as stated, and the reasoning, to be just, must proceed on that basis. The last of the two positions which have been cited, has still less foundation than the first.

A sum received to-day, for a bill deposited two months past, can in no view be deemed a substitute for the amount of a bill deposited to-day, to be received two months hence. It is to be remembered, that the amount of the first bill was itself credited at the time of the deposit; and that the sum received to-day on that account, can only realize the antecedent credit. It cannot represent, or be an equivalent for the future receipt upon a different bill. To affirm that it could, is to make one sum the representative of two. The consequence of the reasoning would be, that the Government ought to receive the money paid in to-day as a satisfaction, as well for the bill deposited to-day, as for that which was deposited two months past.

Making the proper deductions on account of the bills, the amount of the effective cash in the banks at Philadelphia, New York, and Baltimore, was, on the 1st of June, $587,091 11; in other banks, there was then also the further sum of $9,591 89, making, together, $596,683. The amount of the effective cash on the 2d of July, in the banks at Philadelphia, New York, and Baltimore, was $217,234 76; there were then also in the other banks, $184,998 85; making, together, $402,233 61. The amount of the effective cash on the 1st of October, in the banks at Philadelphia, New York, and Baltimore, was $244,394 27; there were then also in the other banks, $145,420 24; making, together, $389,814 51.

The deductions for bills at the several periods were, June 1st, $157,508 33; July 2d, $220,900; October 1st, $31,100; so that, including the bills at that epoch, the whole sum in the banks at Philadelphia, New York, and Baltimore, amounted to no more than $275,494 27; the sums in the other banks, to $145,420 24.

On the 1st of June, there were paid on account of the Debt to France, $100,000; the day following, the first instalment of $100,000, on account of the Loan from the Bank, was received. On the 30th of June, the second instalment of $100,000 was received. These two instalments, amounting to $200,000, are included in the sum of $217,234 76, which, on the 2d of July, constituted the cash in all the banks at Philadelphia, New York, and Baltimore.

About the beginning of August, another instalment on account of the Loan of the Bank was received, and on the 29th of September, another, making, with the preceding ones, $400,000. This sum was involved in the balance in the Treasury on the 1st of October, which, it has been seen, did not exceed in the banks at and near the Seat of the Government, including even unsold and unpaid bills, $275,494 27; and comprehending the sums in all the other banks, amounted to no more than $420,914 51.

From the foregoing detail, it appears that, excluding the $200,000 received on Loan of the Bank of the United States in the month of June, there would have been, on the 2d of July, 1792, in the command of the Treasury at those places, from which immediate supplies may be derived, no greater sum than $17,234 76; that, excluding the $400,000 before that time received on Loan of the same Bank, there would have been on the 1st of October, 1792, an absolute deficiency within the scene described, of $124,505 73; that the whole balance then in the Treasury, wheresoever deposited, amounted only to $420,914 51, and, excluding the Loan of the Bank, would not have been more than $20,914 51.

There must be some very radical error in my conceptions of the proper condition of the Treasury, if it was not in a sufficiently low state during the whole period under consideration; and if it be not demonstrated that the moneys taken of the Bank on Loan were necessary for the public service, and were obtained with a due regard to economy.

There are circumstances which still further manifest the attention which has been paid to this point. The powers given to make Loans for domestic purposes at different times, up to the 8th of May, 1792, comprehend an aggregate of $1,053,355 74; the sums which have been actually obtained upon interest, amount to no more than $455,000.

The contract upon which the $400,000 were obtained, was made the 25th of May, 1792, extending to $523,500, and contemplating the payment of $400,000 of that sum by the Bank, in equal monthly instalments, beginning on the 1st of June, and ending the 1st of September; the residue on the 1st of January, 1793.

Previous to the making of that contract, there had been stipulated to be paid, on account of the French Debt, for the supplies to St. Domingo, $400,000, of which one-fourth was paid in March, another fourth was payable on the 1st of June, another fourth on the 1st of September, another fourth on the 1st of December.

Loans.

Particular causes rendered it an accommodation to the agents of France, to postpone and subdivide the September instalment. A similar postponement took place with regard to the instalment payable by the Bank on the 1st of September, which was not demanded till the latter end of the month, and the remainder of the sum contracted for has not yet been demanded. The spirit of the precaution which secured to the public the privilege of making or forbearing its calls, according to circumstances, needs no comment.

There remain to be noticed two circumstances, which will serve to throw additional light upon the conduct which has been observed with regard to the sums from time to time kept on hand. A comparison of the sums in the Treasury, during the years 1791 and 1792, will contradict the idea of any disposition to suffer the public moneys to accumulate for the benefit of the Bank of the United States and its subdivisions, and will at the same time indicate the general rule which has governed. In this comparison, it is necessary to recollect that larger operations were to be performed in 1792.

It may be objected, that the rule laid down has been on several occasions exceeded. How this has happened at certain periods, has been explained. But there is a view of the subject which will throw further light upon it.

The sums which appear on hand at the end of any quarter, are always larger on a retrospective, than on a previous view. This proceeds from the following cause:

The judgment to be formed beforehand of the sums which will be received within any future period, must of necessity be regulated by the returns in the possession of the Treasury, at the time the examination is made. As these come forward with more or less punctuality, that judgment will be more or less accurate; but the appearance on the returns will always be short of the fact, because a certain number of returns, at any period of examination, will necessarily be deficient. What does not appear, must of course be essentially excluded from the calculation of the receipts to be expected within any near period; because the extent of the sums which may have accrued beyond those shown by the returns in hand, is unknown, and it is still more uncertain in what months the payments of them may fall; and the combinations of the Treasury, as to the means of fulfilling the demands upon it, ought to proceed as little as possible upon conjectures and uncertainties. Monthly abstracts of the bonds taken at each port, are the documents which serve to inform the Treasury of the progress of the receipts upon the duties of imports. From these a general abstract is made up once a month at the Treasury, for the information of the Head of the Department, showing the amount payable in each month. But very considerable differences appear from one month to another. The statement CZ will serve as an illustration. It contains a comparison of the sums shown by two successive abstracts, one of the 7th of November, the other of the 7th of December last, for a term of ten months, distributed into monthly subdivisions. The aggregate difference upon the whole term between the two abstracts, is $495,308 73; upon two months, beginning with November, and ending with December, it is $151,789 40; upon a quarter beginning with January, and ending with March, it is $174,471 66; upon a subsequent quarter, it is $81,056 81; upon a still subsequent quarter, it is $87,991 86. Hence it is evident that an arrangement founded upon the abstract of the 7th of November, would suppose a receipt during any part of the time embraced by it, even the most proximate, considerably less than would appear by the abstract only one month later; and it must always happen, from this circumstance, that the actual receipts, while punctuality is preserved, will exceed the anticipations of them, and that greater balances will be found to exist at any given period, than could have been beforehand safely calculated or acted upon. This circumstance, duly considered, will be a further and powerful justification of the conduct pursued generally, in relation to the moneys from time to time kept on hand, and particularly with regard to the Loans of the Bank. Low as the state of the Treasury appears to have been on a retrospective view, when the moneys upon those Loans were called for, the prospect, at each time, must have presented the appearance of a less competent supply, or a greater deficiency, than was afterwards realized.

I am not sure but that I owe an apology to the House for taking up so much of its time in obviating the imputation of partiality or favoritism towards the banks. The aspect under which I view it, admonishes me that I may have annexed to it greater importance than was intended to be given to it by its authors.

That a disposition friendly to the accommodation of those institutions, as far as might be consistent with official duty and the public interest, has characterized the conduct of the Department, will not be denied. No man, placed in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, whatever theoretic doubts he may have brought into it, would be a single month without surrendering those doubts to a full conviction, that banks are essential to the pecuniary operations of the Government. No man, having a practical knowledge of the probable resources of the country in the article of specie, (which he would with caution rate beyond the actual revenues of the Government,) would rely upon the annual collection of $4,500,000, without the instrumentality of institutions that give a continual impulse to circulation, and prevent the stagnation to be otherwise expected from locking up from time to time large sums for periodical disbursements, to say nothing of the accommodations which facilitate to the merchant the payment of the considerable demands made upon him by the Treasury. No man, practically acquainted with the pecuniary ability of individuals in this country, would count upon finding the means of those anticipations of the current revenue for the current service, which have been, and will be necessary, from any other source than that of the banks. No prudent administrator of the finances of the country, therefore, but would yield to the disposition which has been acknowledged as alike essential to the interest of the Government, and to the satisfactory discharge of his trust—a disposition which would naturally lead to good offices, within the proper and justifiable bounds.

After the explanation which has been offered, to manifest the necessity and propriety of the Loans made of the Bank, it can scarcely be requisite to enter into a refutation of the process by which it has been endeavored to establish that the Government pays 17 per cent. upon those Loans. The state of the Treasury rendered it expedient to borrow the sums which were borrowed; they have been duly received, and the rate of interest stipulated upon them is 5 per cent. The Government, then, pays upon them 5 per cent., and no more.

The history which was given in my last Letter, of the course and situation of the Foreign fund, proves that the supposition from which the inference, of paying 17 per cent. upon the Domestic Loan, has been drawn, is erroneous. The balances on hand at the respective periods in question, are the residues of the moneys which had been received from every source, including the Loans, foreign and domestic.

But, if the supposition which appears to have been made had been true, it was still impossible that 17 per cent. could have been paid. By no construction can the rate be extended beyond 10. The mean interest of the money borrowed abroad, including charges, is 5 per cent.; the interest stipulated to be paid on the Loan from the Bank is also 5; the sum of the two is 10. It is immaterial for what purpose the Foreign fund was obtained, whether to pay to France or to purchase the Debt; the worst consequence that can result is double, not treble interest. The interest payable to France is payable for moneys borrowed and spent during the war. It can never be truly said, that that interest is now payable on any existing fund, whether borrowed in Holland or borrowed in the United States, or borrowed there and re-borrowed here. It can never serve to make an addition to the cost or charges of any such fund. It is payable upon one long since procured and used.

But it is not obvious how the supposition came to be entertained, that all the moneys drawn here from the Foreign fund, had been borrowed for the payment of the Debt to France. The presumption would seem to have been more natural, that they had been principally, if not wholly, introduced with a view to purchases of the Debt, and consequently had a more special reference to the act authorizing a Loan for that purpose. And the fact is, that this was the destination of far the greatest proportion of the sums drawn for. It has been stated that a part had an eye to the supplies to St. Domingo, and that another part was introduced with a view to the payment of the foreign officers.

The additional observations to which I shall request the attention of the House will apply to the course and state of the Sinking Fund, concerning which I transmitted with my last communication three statements, numbered I, II, and III.

To give a more collected view of this part of the subject, it may be of use to include here a recapitulation of some ideas which have been stated in other places.

It is the course and practice of the Department, for all public moneys, from whatever source proceeding, to pass into the Treasury, and there form a common mass, subject, under the responsibility of the officers of the Department, to the dispositions which have been prescribed by law.

The surplus at the end of the year 1790, appropriated to the Sinking Fund, amounting to $1,374,656 40, went, as it was received, into the Treasury.

All the proceeds of the bills drawn upon the Foreign fund, prior to April, 1792, except the sum of $177,998 80, left in deposit with the Bank of North America, for reasons which have been explained, passed from time to time into the Treasury. The whole amount of the sums paid in is $907,294 23.

The proceeds of the bills drawn for, in, and subsequent to, April, 1792, have not yet passed into the Treasury, for reasons which have been likewise assigned. It would have been done before this time, as far as the receipts had gone, but for the present inquiry, which temporarily suspended it. I thought it best to make no alteration in the state of things as they stood when it began, at least till all the information desired had been given. Measures will now be taken for a settlement of the accounts, and for a transfer of the proceeds. The whole amount of those bills, paid and unpaid, including an estimated sum of interest, will be, as heretofore stated, $1,220,476 10.

The whole amount of the bills drawn is $2,305,769 13.

Out of the Sinking Fund composed of the surplus of the revenue, to the end of 1790, and the proceeds of the Foreign bills, there were issued from the Treasury, and expended in purchases, to the end of 1792, $957,770 65.

For reasons which have been stated, it was finally deemed advisable to place those purchases wholly to the account of the surplus of 1790.

Consequently, there remained on the 1st of January, of the present year, $416,885 75, of the above-mentioned surplus, unapplied to purchases; and the whole of the Foreign Fund, except the sum of $726,000, paid, and reserved to be paid, for the use of the Colony of St. Domingo, and the sum of $191,316 90 paid, and reserved to be paid, to the foreign officers, became free for future application. The balance of the proceeds of the bills, after deducting for those reservations, is $1,368,452 22.

Since the 1st of January, 1793, there have been issued, on account of the Foreign Fund, for purchases, $284,901 89.

The practice has uniformly been, not to separate any of the moneys belonging to the Sinking Fund, from the common mass of the moneys in the Treasury, but in proportion to the occasions of investing them in purchases.

Hence the sum of $957,770 65, issued previous to the present year, and the sum of $284,901 89 including the present year, making, together, $1,242,-

Loans.

672 54, are all the moneys which have been ever separated from the common mass of the Treasury, for the purpose of the Sinking Fund; the whole of which, except $49,282 74, have been actually expended in purchases.

The unapplied sum remains deposited in the Bank of the United States, except a small balance of $61 76 in the hands of William Heth.

From the above rule, the part of the Sinking Fund arising from interest on the Debt extinguished by purchases or otherwise, is to be excepted. The practice hitherto, has been to include this interest in the general dividend of each quarter, and the warrant issued to the cashier of the Bank for paying it. The statement No. 3, accompanying my last letter, shows the application of this fund hitherto.

The law directs that this fund shall be invested within thirty days after each quarter. This provision began to take effect on the 1st of July last.

But the investments were not made within the respective times prescribed. This proceeded partly from the state of the market, and partly from the regulations adopted by the Commissioners, who were the Secretary of State, the Attorney General, and the Secretary of the Treasury.

Their regulations, applying to the two first quarters, limited the prices to certain rates, and prescribed the mode of sealed proposals. The Treasurer was appointed agent for the Commissioners.

The proposals, with regard to the first quarter, were receivable till 28th of July inclusively; none were offered, as the Treasurer reported to me, and nothing was done.

The experiment of sealed proposals was again tried the second quarter, with somewhat more, though with but little success. The restriction to this mode of proceeding was rescinded, on the last day of the thirty allowed for purchasing, and some further purchases were made, but the whole sum invested was only $25,969 96.

The residue of this fund, except some small sums noted at foot of statement No. 3, was in January past.

The unapplied part of the surplus of 1790 having been expended in aid of the receipts of 1791, according to the provision which was made for that purpose, will remain suspended until the future receipts shall so far exceed the current disbursements as to produce a surplus for replacing it.

In computing the amount of the unapplied Foreign Fund, it is necessary to take into the account the payments made from it during the years 1791 and 1792, on account of the interest of the Foreign Debt.

Provision having been made for paying this interest out of the Domestic revenues, the sums which have been paid on that account, from the Foreign Fund, are to be considered in the same light as if they had been transferred here by drafts.

The amount paid at Amsterdam is one million six hundred thirty-three thousand one hundred and eighty-nine guilders and two stivers, equal at 3 64-11 ninetieths per guilder, to $659,874 34.

There will be additions to be made, which are not at present ascertained.

Adding this sum to the proceeds of the bills, and deducting the sums paid and to be paid for St. Domingo, and the foreign officers, and those applied to purchases during the present year, there will remain a sum of $1,763,424 68, subject to a future application.

Of this sum, $1,715,098 11 will be properly applicable to the purchase of the Debt. But circumstances may render it eligible to appropriate a part of it towards the discharge of the Foreign Debt.

From the plan which has been pursued, it is also liable to this application.

I have the honor to annex to the statements heretofore transmitted, those in the printed schedules marked A, B, and C.

A, exhibits the relative state of revenue and appropriations, to the end of 1792. B, the relative state of appropriations and expenditures to the same period; showing the balance unsatisfied of each head of appropriation. C, applies these statements to an explanation of the demands or charges upon the excess of income, beyond the disbursements, to the end of 1792.

In addition to these are two statements, marked D and E.

D, showing what proportion of the balances unsatisfied of the several appropriations are likely to be real expenditures, and what part are not likely to be so. In this, however, in several instances, probability must guide, the nature of the thing not admitting of certainty.

E, showing the cash on and upon the first of January last, and likely to be received from that day to the first of April next, and the sums paid and payable during that period.

The result, founded upon facts, contradicts very essentially that statement, which aims at showing the ability of the Treasury, besides defraying the current expenses of the quarter, to pay off two millions to the Bank; still leaving a balance in favor of the Treasury of $664,263 54.

It shows that, after satisfying the demands for which the Treasury is bound to be prepared, including a payment to the Bank of only one-tenth part of the $2,000,000, of which the statement alluded to supposes the complete payment, there would remain a balance in favor of the Treasury of no more than $664,180 89.*

It could answer no valuable purpose to delay the House with a particular examination of the various misapprehensions which have led to a result so different from the true one. It will be sufficient, as an example, to state a single instance. It is assumed as an item in the calculation, that a sum of a million of dollars will come into the Treasury by the first of April, on account of the revenue of the current year; while the probability is, that the sum received may not exceed ten thousand dollars; this presumption of a million is evidently founded upon two mistakes.

1st. It proceeds on the basis of an annual revenue of four millions of dollars, and supposes this sum equally distributed between the different quarters of the year, a million to each quarter; when,

* The sum here mentioned was omitted, through hurry, to be inserted in the original, the blank is here filled conformably to the statement E.

Loans.

in fact, there are two seasons of the year incomparably more productive than the other parts of it, viz: Those portions of the Spring and Fall which are embraced by the second and third quarters; the first and fourth being far less productive.

2d. It supposes all the duties which accrue are immediately paid; whereas the cases of prompt payment are confined to those in which the duties on particular articles imported in one vessel, by one person or co-partnership, do not exceed fifty dollars; in all other instances, a credit not less than four months is allowed, which carries the payment on the importations, upon the very first day of the quarter, a month beyond the expiration of it.

If the whole amount of the duties, which accrued during the first quarter of 1792, in cash and bonds, was no more than $307,163 84, adding one seventh for the additional duties, it ought, by analogy, to be the first quarter of the present year, $322,472 94; less, in totality, than the sum which it has been computed would be actually in money in the Treasury, by $677,527 06; and less, by the whole million, nearly, than will probably be in money in the Treasury on that account.

With perfect respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient and most humble servant,

ALEXANDER HAMILTON,
Secretary of the Treasury.

The Hon. the SPEAKER
of the House of Representatives.

ESTIMATE OF APPROPRIATIONS.

Estimate of the expenditures for the Civil List of the United States, together with the incidental and contingent expenses of the several Departments and Offices, for the year 1793.

[Published by the order of the House of Representatives, and referred to in the Secretary's Report of November 30, ante page 1162.]

The Secretary of the Treasury respectfully reports to the House of Representatives the estimates herewith sent, marked A, B, and C.

The first, relating to the Civil List, or the expenditure for the support of Government during the year 1793, including the incidental and contingent expenses of the several Departments and Offices, amounting to - - - - - $352,466 39

The second, relating to certain deficiencies in former appropriations for the support of Government, to a provision in aid of the fund heretofore established for the payment of certain officers of the Courts, jurors, witnesses, &c., to the support of the light-houses, beacons, buoys, and public piers, and to certain other purposes specified therein - - - - - 92,599 66

The third, relating to the War Department, showing the probable expenditure of that Department for the year 1793, including a sum of $82,245 32 for pensions to invalids - - - - - 1,171,719 05

Amounting, together, to - - - - - 1,616,785 10

The funds out of which appropriations may be made for the foregoing purposes, are: 1st. The sum of $600,000 reserved annually for the support of Government out of the duties on imports and tonnage, by the act making provision for the Debt of the United States. 2d. The surplus which may remain unexpended, of the sums appropriated to the use of the War Department for the year 1792. 3d. The unappropriated surplus of the existing revenues to the end of the year 1793; which funds, it is believed, will prove adequate to the object, as is illustrated in the schedule herewith transmitted, marked D. But as some deficiency may possibly happen, and as partial anticipations of the revenue will probably be requisite to face the demands for the public service, as they accrue, it appears to be essential that a power to borrow should accompany the grant.

The Secretary begs leave also to present, for the information of the House of Representatives, two statements (marked E and F) of the expenditure of two several sums: one of $50,000, and the other of $5,000, heretofore appropriated "towards discharging such demands on the United States, not otherwise provided for, as should have been ascertained and admitted in due course of settlement at the Treasury, and which should be of a nature according to the course thereof, to require payment in specie."

All which is humbly submitted.

ALEXANDER HAMILTON, Secretary of the Treasury.

NOTES.

(a) This sum is estimated by adding to the ascertained product of the year 1791 an ascertained excess of the product of the first two quarters of the year 1792, beyond the product of the first two quarters of the year 1791, being $252,319 11, and the estimated product for a half year of the additional duties on imports laid during the last session of Congress, and commencing on the 1st of July last, being $261,750. According to the information hitherto received at the Treasury, there is every probability that the amount of the duties for the last half-year of 1792 will fully equal this calculation of their product, if the ratio of the first half-year will exceed it.

(b) This estimate proceeds on the basis of the product of 1792, making a compromise of two considerations— one, an increase which may be expected equal to the difference between a whole and a half-year's product of the additional duties above mentioned; the other, a decrease which may arise from a defalcation of the duties on foreign spirits, in consequence of the increase of domestic distillation. There is good ground to conclude that the sum stated will rather fall short of than exceed the actual product.

(c) This branch of the revenue is not yet in complete order, but enough is ascertained, by actual returns, to afford a moral certainty that the product cannot be materially less than is here stated.

(d) This surplus is thus deduced:

The total appropriation for the War Department for the year 1792 is	-	$1,081,146	68
The total expenditure to the 27th of October was	-	$690,796	00
The sum at that time estimated by the Secretary of War to be further necessary to the end of the year, exclusive of provision supplies, is	-	218,950	00
For provisions and contingencies may be stated a further sum of	-	30,000	00
		939,746	00
Balance which will probably remain unexpended	-	141,400	68

Some inconsiderable appropriations for particular purposes are unnoticed, because certain casual funds will probably nearly, if not altogether, balance them.

GENERAL ST. CLAIR'S DEFEAT.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, February 15, 1793.

Mr. GILES, from the committee, to whom was recommended the Report of the committee appointed to inquire into the causes of the failure of the expedition under Major General St. Clair, together with the documents relating thereto, including the Letter from the Secretary of War and the memorial of Samuel Hodgdon, have proceeded to re-examine the documents formerly before them, as far as seemed necessary; to hear and examine other testimony, produced to them; to hear and consider the written communications, made by the Secretary of War, Samuel

Hodgdon, and the Commander-in-chief of the expedition; and, as the result of their farther inquiries make the following supplementary Report:

The original report commences in the following words:

"The contract for the supplies of the Army on the route from Fort Pitt was made by Theodosius Fowler with the Secretary of the Treasury, and bears date the twenty-eighth day of October, one thousand seven hundred and ninety; that at the same time a bond in the penalty of one hundred thousand dollars, with Walter Livingston and John Cochran, securities thereto, was entered into for the due execution of the contract; that, on the third day of January, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, the contract was wholly transferred from the said Fowler to William Duer, a copy of which transfer was lodged in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury; that by letter from the Secretary of War, bearing date the twenty-fifth day of February, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, addressed to William Duer, it appears that he was considered as contractor; that no correspondence appears to have taken place subsequently to that time between Theodosius Fowler and either the Treasury or War Departments."

Defeat of General St. Clair.

From documents received by the Committee, since their last appointment, it appears that the copy of the before mentioned transfer was not lodged in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury until the seventh of April, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one; at which time it was received by the Secretary of the Treasury, under cover of a letter from William Duer, informing him of the circumstance of the said transfer, and making requisitions for certain advances of money. That the Secretary of the Treasury, by letter in reply of the same date, agrees to make the advances required to William Duer, as the agent of Theodosius Fowler.

It appears that all the warrants issued from the Treasury, for the purposes of this contract, were issued to William Duer, as the agent of Theodosius Fowler.

The Secretary of the Treasury has furnished the Committee with the written opinions of the Attorney General of the United States, and several other lawyers of eminence, all of whom concur in opinion, that the securities to the bond, originally given by Theodosius Fowler, for the execution of this contract, are now responsible for all damages, consequent upon any breach of that contract.

The Secretary of War, who alone appears to have been the agent on the part of the United States, in all things relating to the execution of the contract, has always corresponded with William Duer, as the contractor, and his correspondence commences at a date prior to that of the copy of the contract lodged at the Treasury.

The original report proceeds—

"That, on the sixth of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, a contract was entered into by William Duer with the Secretary of War, for supplying the troops with provisions, until their arrival at Fort Pitt, and at Fort Pitt. A bond was, at the same time, entered into, by the said William Duer, for the due execution of the said contract, in the penalty of four thousand dollars, without any security whatsoever."

It appears, by a re-examination of the documents formerly before the Committee, that the date and terms of the last mentioned contract were misrepresented; the date being the twenty-sixth, instead of the sixth of April, and the terms of the contract being to furnish provisions for the troops until their arrival at Fort Pitt, but not during their continuance at that place. The first of these mistakes appears to have been merely casual; the second appears to have arisen from paying greater attention to the manner in which the contract was really executed, than to the terms of the contract itself; it having been conceived by the Committee that Colonel Neville, the agent for supplying the troops during their continuance at Fort Pitt, acted under the last mentioned contract. This circumstance is rendered the less material, from the consideration, that according to the plan of campaign, no delay of the troops at Fort Pitt was counted upon. The statement is otherwise correct.

The Secretary of War, in his communication, states that it was not the custom of the office to require other security than that of the contractor, for the due execution of contracts of small amount; and it appears by a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, written since the former report, that the Secretary of War consulted with him upon the occasion alluded to, and that he agreed in opinion, that further security was not necessary.

It is stated in the original report, after speaking of one of the contractor's agents, that—

"It appears by letters from John Kean, another of the contractor's agents, that no moneys had been received by him on the eighth of May, and it appears that on the twenty-third of March there was advanced to William Duer, on the last mentioned contract, the sum of fifteen thousand dollars."

Upon re-examining the letters of John Kean, it appears that he had received the sum of four hundred and fifty dollars, and no more, before the aforesaid eighth day of May, which was before overlooked by the Committee. And it appears from documents received by the Committee since their report, that the sum of fifteen thousand dollars was not advanced to William Duer on account of the last mentioned contract, on the twenty-third of March. The Committee were led into this mistake by a document received from the Treasurer, representing the fact as stated in the original report; which document is still before the Committee. The true state of this transaction as recently stated, appears to be as follows:

A warrant issued in favor of Joseph Howell, on the twenty-third of March, for the sum of fifteen thousand dollars, for the use of the War Department generally, and not for William Duer, as stated in the account rendered by the Treasurer; of which sum, were advanced to William Duer, on the twenty-sixth of March, four thousand dollars; on the eighth day of May following, were paid to James Smith, contracting agent for William Duer, one thousand dollars; and between the twenty-first of May and the twenty-third of July, were paid to John Kean, another agent for William Duer, four hundred and thirty-seven dollars and ninety-one cents—making the whole sum advanced on the last mentioned contract, five thousand four hundred and thirty-seven dollars and ninety-one cents. The residue of the fifteen thousand dollars is suggested to have been applied to the use of the War Department generally.

The original report states that—

"It appears from the correspondence of General Butler, from the ninth of May to the ninth of June, repeated complaints were made of fatal mismanagements and neglects in the Quartermaster's and Military Stores departments, particularly as to tents, knapsacks, camp kettles, cartridge boxes, pack-saddles, &c., all of which articles were deficient in quantity and bad in quality. The pack-saddles, particularly, were made in Philadelphia, which, with the transportation, amounted to more than double the price at which they might have been procured at Fort Pitt, and were found, upon examination, to be unfit for use."

Defeat of General St. Clair.

Mr. Hodgdon has produced to the Committee a number of ex-parte affidavits and certificates to prove that these several articles were furnished in sufficient quantities, and of good quality. Most of these affidavits, however, were made by the manufacturers of the respective articles, or persons in the employment of Mr. Hodgdon, and generally written in a different handwriting from that of the subscribing deponents, and most of the certificates by persons unknown to the Committee. But the testimony formerly taken by the Committee, and the corroboration of it by the evidence of respectable and disinterested persons, lately taken by the Committee, in presence of Mr. Hodgdon, appears abundantly sufficient to justify the statement of facts contained in the original report. With respect to the pack-saddles, however, it is necessary to remark, that some qualification of the expression used in the original report would be proper. They appear to have been made of different sizes; those of the largest size are proved to have been wholly unfit for use, the horses used for pack-horses being generally small. Some of the smaller pack-saddles, however, appear to have been used in the campaign, and to have answered the intended purpose better than was at first expected.

It is stated in the original report that—

"The arms sent forward appear not to have been duly examined, and arrived at Fort Pitt extremely out of order, and many totally unfit for use, which circumstance rendered repairs absolutely necessary, and added to the delay of the troops at Fort Pitt."

The Committee are led to conclude, from authentic information recently received, that the complaint of the arms intended for the regular troops and levies, is unfounded; some of the arms appear to have been damaged, after they were put into the hands of the troops, from their inexperience or carelessness, though delivered to them in good order.

The Committee were induced to make the unqualified statement contained in the original report, from the unqualified manner in which this subject is spoken of by some of the witnesses, formerly examined by the Committee; they not having stated with sufficient precision the causes of the arms being out of repair, nor specifying the probable number requiring repairs.

The original report proceeds with the following expression:

"It appears that a great proportion of the powder, supplied for the use of the Army, was not of good quality, though an experiment was made by Major Ferguson, at Fort Pitt, with a howitzer, who reported in favor of the quality of the powder."

The Committee are satisfied from experiments made since the original report by Captain Ford, at Fort Washington, upon request of the Secretary of War, and by samples of the powder from thence, actually furnished the Committee, that the powder was originally of good quality; but that a certain quantity of it was damaged by exposure to the air and moisture after being issued to the troops. And it appears to have been powder of this description, upon which experiments were made by some of the officers in the expedition, which produced unfavorable impressions as to the quality of the powder in general; for it is certain, a belief was currently entertained amongst the officers, that the powder in general was not of good quality. The insufficiency of the powder, after the Army took the field, is accounted for from the bad quality of the tents. It is in testimony to the Committee, that great quantities of the fixed ammunition were actually rendered useless from that cause.

It is stated in the original report that—

"Mr. Hodgdon was appointed Quartermaster General in the month of March, and continued at Philadelphia until the fourth of June, he then proceeded to Fort Pitt, where he arrived on the tenth of the same month; no sufficient causes have appeared to the Committee to justify this delay, and his presence with the Army appeared to have been essentially necessary previously to that time."

In this statement, the duration of Mr. Hodgdon's stay at Fort Pitt was casually omitted, which appears to have been from the tenth of June, till the twenty-sixth of August. The insertion of this fact will sufficiently explain the sense of the Committee in the inference respecting the time in which the presence of the Quartermaster General was necessary at the Army.

It is stated in the original report that—

"There were six hundred and seventy-five stand of arms at Fort Washington, on the first of June, and most of those totally out of repair."

These arms, the precise number of which appears not to be accurately ascertained, are admitted by the Secretary of War to have been at Fort Washington in the situation described, but he suggests that they were old and useless arms, which had been collected at that place, and were not counted upon as any part of the supply of arms for the expedition. It appears that the regular troops and levies were completely supplied with arms, without recurrence to this stock; but a number of them was repaired, by orders of the Commander-in-chief of the expedition, with a view, as he suggests, to arm the militia from Kentucky, who, it was expected, would arrive, either insufficiently armed, or not armed at all; and he did not conceive the arrangements, made by the War Department, competent to arming the militia, together with the other troops.

The original report states that—

"The privates of the levies received but three dollars pay each, from the time of their respective enlistments to the time of their respective discharges, and were actually discharged without farther pay or settlement; notes of discharge were given them, specifying the time of their service, and bearing endorsements, that some advances had been made to them on account, without stating the amount, the object of which is suggested to have been to prevent transfers; the intended effect was not produced by the measure; the notes were sold for trifling considerations; the real sums due on the notes were various—from ten to twenty-five dollars, and they were frequently sold for one dollar, or one gallon of whiskey. The moneys for the pay of the levies did not leave Philadelphia till the fourth of December, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, nor arrive at Fort Washington, till the third of January, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, some time after the last enlisted levies are known to have been entitled to their discharges."

In addition to the reasons contained in the original report, respecting the discharging of the levies, without their stipulated pay, which are admitted by the Secretary of War to have been justly stated, he has, in his late communication, suggested to the Committee, that, at the time of the discharge of the levies there was actually, in the hands of the Quartermaster General, the sum of sixteen thousand two hundred and ninety-two dollars and seventy cents, which were subject to be applied to any object, agreeably to the discretion of the Commander-in-chief of the expedition, and might have been applied, if he thought proper, to the payment of the discharged levies, and would have been sufficient for two months pay to the officers, and four months pay to the privates. This sum is admitted by the Quartermaster General to have been in his hands at the time of the discharge of the levies, and would have been applied to their pay if orders had been given by the Commander-in-chief of the expedition for that purpose; but that no such orders ever were received by him. The Secretary of War infers, from these circumstances, that no censure should be imputed to the War Department for not having paid implicit attention to this subject.

The circumstances respecting this transaction have been attentively examined by the Committee, and appear to them to be the following: The Quartermaster General, upon his leaving Philadelphia, was furnished with the sum of twenty thousand dollars for the use of that Department. He was afterwards furnished with two other sums, to wit: the sum of seventeen thousand eight hundred and forty-four dollars and fifty cents, on the twenty-third of July; and the sum of two thousand two hundred and twenty-four dollars and sixty cents, on the seventh day of July—making, together, the sum of twenty thousand and sixty-nine dollars and ten cents. It appears by letter from the Secretary of War to the Commander-in-chief of the expedition, that five thousand dollars of this sum were to be applied to the pay of the regular troops, if the Commander-in-chief should deem that a proper application of the money; which, however, was not done. The remaining part of this money was intended to form a kind of military chest, to answer contingent expenses, subject, however, to the control of the Commander-in-chief. It appears that the Quartermaster General, in addition to these supplies of cash, was authorized to draw bills on the Secretary of War, with this restriction—that the Commander-in-chief should approve of all drafts, and certify the necessity or propriety of making them. The Quartermaster General commenced his drafts at Fort Pitt, previously to his arrival at headquarters, to the amount of two thousand six hundred dollars, and continued them after his arrival; but it does not appear that those drafts were certified or sanctioned by the Commander-in-chief; all which drafts were honored by the Secretary of War.

It is suggested by the Commander-in-chief that he never considered the money, before mentioned, appropriated to the pay of the levies, upon their discharges, nor that it was ever intended to be applied to that object. He further suggests a want of knowledge of the money said to be on hand at the time of the discharges of the levies, although he admits that the Quartermaster General shortly after his arrival at headquarters tendered him a statement of the cash on hand, which he returned, without examination, observing, that he had already received sufficient information relatively thereto from the Secretary of War; that he was informed of the amount of moneys originally received by the Quartermaster General, and conceived that he could form some idea of the balance on hand from the sums disbursed in consequence of warrants drawn by him, which he expected were paid from that fund; that his want of information as to the real balance arose from the circumstance of the bills drawn by the Quartermaster General without his knowledge, or the requisite certificate from him, which bills operated as a relief to that fund for their amount. The Commander-in-chief of the expedition further suggested to the Committee, in presence of the Quartermaster General, that, upon making drafts upon the fund before alluded to, he usually inquired of the Quartermaster General whether it was sufficient for the purpose of answering the draft, and upon repeating this inquiry, just before the discharge of the levies, he received for answer, "that the chest was very low." This statement was acquiesced in, or at least not denied, by the Quartermaster General.

The Quartermaster General has furnished the Committee with a statement of his account, by which it appears that he had on hand, on the fifth day of November, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, cash, to the amount of fifteen thousand nine hundred and twelve dollars and forty-two cents, and two-thirds of a cent, which, he suggests, have since been applied to the use of his Department. This balance is denied to have been on hand, by the Commander-in-chief, at that time, and he has furnished a statement of disbursements from the original fund; which leaves the amount of the balance at the time of the discharge of the levies, of one thousand four hundred and eighty-three dollars and eighty-six cents, exclusive of five thousand dollars appropriated to the pay of the old troops.

The Commander-in-chief further suggests, that there was no Paymaster to the Army, nor any person authorized to settle the accounts of the soldiers, and ascertain the real balances due to them, until the arrival of Mr. Swann, on the third day of January, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, and infers that he had no authority to direct a settlement and order pay to the soldiers, until he was informed of the arrangements made at the War Office relatively to that object. This suggestion is strongly confirmed by a letter from the Secretary of War, addressed to the Commander-in-chief, and forwarded by Mr. Swann, which designates Mr. Swann as Paymaster, and contains instructions relatively to the terms of settling the accounts of the soldiery. The same letter serves to show that the twenty thousand and sixty-nine dollars and ten cents, put into the possession of the Quartermaster General, were not conclusively destined for the pay of the levies, nor so considered by the Secretary of War. Because it is asserted in the letter, that Mr. Swann is furnished with a sum of money sufficient for the whole pay of the levies, without making any deduction in consequence of the moneys furnished the Quartermaster General.

It is asserted by the Secretary of War in his communication to the Committee, that the time of the service of the levies did not expire until after the arrival of Mr. Swann at Fort Washington, particularly Gaither's and Rhea's battalions, the term of their enlistments having been to serve six months after their arrival at Fort Washington, which was deemed the place of rendezvous. The time which has elapsed from the period of enlistment to their arrival at Fort Washington, or the evident impropriety of annexing such a condition to the enlistments, caused the condition itself to be dispensed with; and those levies were actually discharged shortly after the twelfth of November, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, in consequence of having served six months, which is the extent of the service authorized by law, and actually received certificates at that time of having performed six months service.

Upon a re-examination of the residue of the original report, and the evidence now before the Committee, they are satisfied with the same, and find no material alterations or corrections necessary.

A regard for candor has induced the Committee to adopt this mode of reporting; because the original report is thereby preserved, mistakes existing in the same, and which are now corrected, and the causes of those mistakes rendered obvious, and the whole subject presented to view, upon the fairest terms, in the opinion of the Committee, to all persons in any degree concerned therein.

RE-ORGANIZATION OF SUPREME COURT.

*Gentlemen of the Senate, and
of the House of Representatives:*

I lay before you a copy of a Letter and representation from the Chief Justice and Associate Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, stating the difficulties and inconveniences which attend the discharge of their duties, according to the present Judiciary system.

A copy of a Letter from the Judges attending the Circuit Court of the United States for the North Carolina district, in June last, containing their observations on an act passed during the last session of Congress, entitled "An act to provide for the settlement of the claims of widows and orphans barred by the limitations heretofore established, and to regulate the claims to invalid pensions."

GEO. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, Nov. 7, 1792.

PHILADELPHIA, Aug. 9, 1792.

SIR: Your official connexion with the Legislature, and the consideration that applications from us to them cannot be made in any manner so respectful to Government as through the President, induce us to request your attention to the enclosed representation, and that you will be pleased to lay it before the Congress.

We really, sir, find the burdens laid upon us so excessive that we cannot forbear representing them in strong and explicit terms.

On extraordinary occasions we shall always be ready, as good citizens, to make extraordinary exertions; but while our country enjoys prosperity, and nothing occurs to require or justify such severities, we cannot reconcile ourselves to the idea of existing in exile from our families, and of being subjected to a kind of life on which we cannot reflect without experiencing sensations and emotions more easy to conceive than proper for us to express.

With the most perfect respect, esteem, and attachment, we have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient and most humble servants,

JOHN JAY,
WILLIAM CUSHING,
JAMES WILSON,
JOHN BLAIR,
JAMES IREDELL,
THOMAS JOHNSON.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The Chief Justice and the Associate Judges of the Supreme Court respectfully represent to the Congress of the United States:

That when the present judicial arrangements took place, it appeared to be a general and well-founded opinion, that the act then passed was to be considered rather as introducing a temporary expedient than a permanent system, and that it would be revised as soon as a period of greater leisure should arrive. The subject was new, and was rendered intricate and embarrassing by local as well as other difficulties; and there was reason to presume that others, not at that time apparent, would be discovered by experience. The ensuing sessions of Congress were so occupied by other affairs of great and pressing importance, that the Judges thought it improper to interrupt the attention of Congress by any application on the subject. That, as it would not become them to suggest what alterations or system ought in their opinion to be formed and adopted, they omit making any remarks on that head; but they feel most sensibly the necessity which presses them to represent—

That the task of holding twenty-seven Circuit Courts a year, in the different States, from New Hampshire to Georgia, besides two sessions of the Supreme Court at Philadelphia, in the two most severe seasons of the year, is a task which, considering the extent of the United States, and the small number of Judges, is too burdensome. That to require of the Judges to pass the greater part of their days on the road, and at inns, and a distance from their families, is a requisition which, in their opinion, should not be made unless in cases of necessity. That some of the present Judges do not enjoy health and strength of body sufficient to enable them to undergo the toilsome journeys through different climates and seasons, which they are called upon to undertake; nor is it probable that any set of Judges, however robust, would be able to support, and punctually execute, such severe duties for any length of time. That the distinction made between the Supreme Court and its Judges, and appointing the same men finally to correct in one capacity the errors which they themselves may have committed in another, is a distinction unfriendly to impartial justice, and to that confidence in the Supreme Court which it is so essential to the public interest should be reposed in it. The Judges decline minute details, and purposely omit many considerations, which they are persuaded will occur whenever the subject is attentively discussed and considered. They most earnestly request that it may meet with early attention, and that the system may be so modified as that they may be relieved from their present painful and improper situation.

JOHN JAY,
WILLIAM CUSHING,
JAMES WILSON,
JOHN BLAIR,
JAMES IREDELL,
THOMAS JOHNSON.

NEWBERN, NORTH CAROLINA, June 8, 1792.

SIR: We, the Judges now attending at the Circuit Court of the United States for the district of North Carolina, conceive it our duty to lay before you some important observations which have occurred to us in the consideration of an act of Congress lately passed, entitled "An act to provide for the settlement of claims of widows and orphans barred by the limitations heretofore established, and to regulate the claims to invalid pensions."

We beg leave to premise, that it is as much an inclination as it is our duty to receive with all possible respect every act of the Legislature, and that we never can find ourselves in a more painful situation than to be obliged to object to the execution of any, more especially to the execution of one founded on the purest principles of humanity and justice, which the act in question undoubtedly is.

But, however lamentable a difference in opinion really may be, or with whatever difficulty we may have formed an opinion, we are under the indispensable necessity of acting according to the best dictates of our own judgment, after duly weighing every consideration that can occur to us, which we have done on the present occasion. The extreme importance of the case, and our desire of being explicit beyond the danger of being misunderstood, will, we hope, justify us in stating our observations in a systematic manner. We, therefore, sir, submit to you the following:

1. That the Legislative, Executive, and Judicial Departments are each formed in a separate and independent manner, and that the ultimate basis of each is the Constitution only, within the limits of which each Department can alone justify any act of authority.

2. That the Legislature, among other important powers, unquestionably possesses that of establishing Courts in such a manner as to their wisdom shall appear best, limited by the terms of the Constitution only; and to whatever extent that power may be exercised, or however severe the duty they may think proper to require, the Judges, when appointed in virtue of any such establishment, owe implicit and unreserved obedience to it.

3. That, at the same time, such Courts cannot be warranted, as we conceive, by virtue of that part of the Constitution delegating Judicial power for the exercise of which any act of the Legislature is provided, in exercising (even under the authority of another act) any power not in its nature Judicial, or, if Judicial, not provided for upon the terms the Constitution requires.

4. That whatever doubt may be suggested, whether the power in question is properly of a Judicial nature, yet inasmuch as the decision of the Court is not made final, but may be at least suspended in its operation by the Secretary of War, if he shall have cause to suspect imposition or mistake, this subjects the decision of the Court to a mode of revision which we consider to be unwarranted by the Constitution; for, though Congress may certainly establish, in instances not yet provided for, Courts of appellate jurisdiction, yet such Courts must consist of Judges appointed in the manner the Constitution requires, and holding their offices by no other tenure than that of their good behaviour, by which tenure the office of Secretary of War is not held; and we beg leave to add, with all due deference, that no decision of any Court of the United States can, under any circumstances, in our opinion, agreeably to the Constitution, be liable to a reversion, or even suspension, by the Legislature itself, in whom no Judicial power of any kind appears to be vested but the important one relative to impeachments.

These, sir, are our reasons for being of opinion, as we are at present, that this Circuit Court cannot be justified in the execution of that part of the act which requires it to examine, and report an opinion on the unfortunate cases of officers and soldiers disabled in the service of the United States. The part of the act requiring the Court to sit five days for the purpose of receiving appli cations from such persons, we shall deem it our duty to comply with; for, whether in our opinion such purpose can or cannot be answered, it is, as we conceive, our indispensable duty to keep open any Court of which we have the honor to be Judges, as long as Congress shall direct.

The high respect we entertain for the Legislature, our feelings as men for persons whose situation requires the earliest as well as the most effectual relief, and our sincere desire to promote, whether officially or otherwise, the just and benevolent views of Congress so conspicuous on the present as well as on many other occasions, have induced us to reflect whether we could be justified in acting under this act personally in the character of Commissioners during the session of a Court; and could we be satisfied that we had authority to do so, we would cheerfully devote such part of our time as might be necessary for the performance of the service. But we confess we have great doubts on this head. The power appears to be given to the Court only, and not to the Judges of it; and as the Secretary of War has not a discretion in all instances, but only in those where he has cause to suspect imposition or mistake, to withhold a person recommended by the Court from being named on the pension list, it would be necessary for us to be well persuaded we possessed such an authority before we exercised a power which might be a means of drawing money out of the public Treasury, as effectually as an express appropriation by law. We do not mean, however, to preclude ourselves from a very deliberate consideration whether we can be warranted in executing the purposes of the act in that manner, in case an application should be made.

No application has yet been made to the Court, or to ourselves individually, and, therefore, we have had some doubts as to the propriety of giving an opinion in a case which has not yet come regularly and judicially before us. None can be more sensible than we are of the necessity of Judges being, in general, extremely cautious in not intimating an opinion in any case extra-judicially, because we well know how liable the best minds are, notwithstanding their utmost care, to a bias which may arise from a preconceived opinion, even unguardedly, much more deliberately given. But in the present instance, as many unfortunate and meritorious individuals, whom Congress have justly thought proper objects of immediate relief, may suffer very great distress even by a short delay, and may be utterly ruined by a long one, we determined at all events to make our sentiments known as early as possible, considering this as a case which must be deemed an exception to the general rule upon every principle of humanity and justice; resolving, however, that so far as we are concerned individually, in case an application should be made, we will most attentively hear it; and if we can be convinced this opinion is a wrong one, we shall not hesitate to act accordingly, being as far from the weakness of supposing that there is any reproach in having committed an error, to which the greatest and best men are sometimes liable, as to we should be from so low a sense of duty as to think it would not be the highest and most deserved reproach that could be bestowed on any men (much more on Judges) that they were capable, from any motive, of persevering against conviction in apparently maintaining an opinion which they really thought to be erroneous.

We take the liberty to request, sir, that you will be pleased to lay this Letter before the Legislature of the United States at their next session, and have the honor to be, with the highest respect, sir, your most obedient and most faithful servants,

JAMES IREDELL,

One of the Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States.

JNO. SITGREAVES,

Judge of the United States for the North Carolina District.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

REPORT ON NEWSPAPER POSTAGE.

[Made to the House of Representatives, second session Second Congress.]

The Committee to whom was referred that part of the President's Speech which relates to the transportation of Newspapers, Report:

That after a communication with the Postmaster General, on the subject under consideration, they beg leave to recommend the following provisions:

1. That the Postmaster General be authorized to direct his deputies to receive subscriptions for newspapers.
2. That every subscriber, at the time of subscribing, pay to the postmaster the amount of a half year's postage on the paper which he engages to take, and half of the annual price of the paper.
3. That of the postage thus advanced, he retain one-fourth of a cent for each paper he will have to receive or deliver, during the first half year; and of the price of the paper, twenty-five per cent.; and remit the residue of the postage to the General Post Office, and the residue of the price of the papers to the printers thereof, with lists of the subscribers.
4. That the postmasters, and not the subscribers, shall be responsible to the printers; they receiving the twenty-five per cent., before mentioned, as compensation for the above intended agency in the business.

They suggest the propriety of securing the printers' money, by the same bonds, of the postmasters, by which postages are secured. That duplicate lists of the subscribers should be sent by the postmasters to the General Post Office; and that, upon the complaint of a printer, against a postmaster, payment may be enforced, under the same bond that secures arrears of postage to the office.

That where the mail shall be carried by private contract, agreeably to the power given to the Postmaster General, by the second section of the law "establishing Post Offices and Post Roads," it may be lawful for the Postmaster General to allow to such contractors, in a settlement with the General Post Office, for the postage on newspapers, a proportion, according to the distance by them carried, and the distance by the public post, so as to make a just dividend, according to the distances carried by each.

That the privilege of franking letters or packets, not exceeding the weight of one ounce, be allowed to postmasters, under restrictions similar to those of the law of last session.

That the postmasters be allowed to charge — per centum on all franked letters, their own excepted, considering them as single letters.

That the Postmaster General be empowered, in the settlement of the account of the deputy postmaster of Philadelphia, to allow him, for office rent and a chief clerk, at the rate of not more than — dollars; and one other clerk, at the rate of not more than — dollars per annum.

That when letters or packets, to go beyond sea, are received by a postmaster, it shall be his duty to make them up into mails; and for each letter or packet be permitted to receive one cent.

That any letter sent among newspapers be subjected to double postage; and where a memorandum or writing, other than the address, be on the newspaper, such newspaper be subjected to double letter postage.

That magazines and pamphlets be transported in the mail, at the following rates:

One cent per sheet for their conveyance not over fifty miles; one and a half cent over fifty and not exceeding one hundred miles; and two cents per sheet for any greater distance.

That members of Congress be allowed to frank letters or packets not exceeding four ounces in weight.

That it be made the duty of the masters or commanders of ships or vessels, sailing from one port of the United States to another, whether by sea or otherwise, as well as of the masters or commanders of all ships or vessels arriving in any port of the United States, from a foreign port or place, to deliver all letters by them brought, to the post office of the port or place, where they may arrive, in — hours after such arrival.

The Committee recommend the following roads as necessary, viz:

A road to connect Sharpsburg, in Maryland, with Shepherdstown, in Virginia.

An alteration of the route from Philadelphia to Reading, so that the road to be established may be from Philadelphia, through Norristown and Pottsgrove, to Reading.

To connect Norwich and New London, in Connecticut, by a road.

That the Postmaster General be authorized to send a mail, by the route of Newport, to Taunton.

That there be established a road from Hampton Falls to Exeter, in New Hampshire.

One from Yorktown, Pennsylvania, to Fredericktown, in Maryland.

One from Richmond, by Powhatan Court-house, Cumberland Court-house, Meredith's Store, New London, and Liberty, to Botetourt Court-house in Virginia; and from New London to Lynchburg; and from Meredith's Store, by Prince Edward Court-house, to Charlotte Court-house.

One from Tarborough, by Greenville, to Washington; and from Fayetteville to Hillsborough, by Chatham Court-house; and to return by Wake Court-house to Fayetteville, once a week; in North Carolina: and One from Danville to Lexington, in Kentucky.

The Committee recommend that the road from Halifax, by Bluntsville, Williamstown, and Daley's, to Plymouth, in North Carolina, be stricken out.

PUBLIC ACTS OF CONGRESS;

PASSED AT THE FIRST SESSION OF THE SECOND CONGRESS, BEGUN AND HELD AT PHILADELPHIA, ON THE TWENTY-FOURTH OF OCTOBER, 1791.

An Act granting further time for making return of the Enumeration of the Inhabitants in the District of South Carolina.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That it shall be lawful for the Marshal of the District of South Carolina to complete and make return of the enumeration of the inhabitants of the said district to the President of the United States, in the form and manner prescribed by the act, entitled "An act providing for the enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States," at any time on or before the first day of March next, anything in the said act to the contrary notwithstanding.

JONATHAN TRUMBULL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

JOHN ADAMS,
Vice President of the United States, and President of the Senate.

Approved, November 8, 1791.

GEORGE WASHINGTON,
President of the United States.

An Act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two.

Be it enacted, &c., That for the service of the year 1792, and the support of the Civil List of the United States, including the incidental and contingent expenses of the several Departments and offices thereof, there shall be appropriated a sum of money, not exceeding three hundred and twenty-nine thousand six hundred and fifty-three dollars and fifty-six cents, that is to say:

For the like compensations to the Governors, Judges, and other officers of the Western Territory of the United States, including contingencies, eleven thousand dollars.

For the payment of the annual grant to Baron Steuben, pursuant to an act of Congress, two thousand five hundred dollars.

For the payment of sundry pensions granted by the late Government, two thousand seven hundred and sixty-seven dollars and seventy-three cents.

For defraying all other incidental and contingent expenses of the Civil List establishments, including firewood, stationery, together with the printing work, and all other contingent expenses of the two Houses of Congress, rent and office expenses of the three several Departments, namely, Treasury, State, War, and of the General Board of Commissioners, twenty-one thousand five hundred and fifty-five dollars, and eighty-three cents.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the compensation to the Doorkeepers of the two Houses, for services which have been heretofore rendered, or may be rendered in the recess of Congress for the year 1792, and certified by the President of the Senate or the Speaker of the House of Representatives, in manner required by law for like services during sessions, shall be discharged out of the money herein before appropriated for the contingent expenses of the two Houses of Congress.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That for discharging certain liquidated claims upon the United States, for making good deficiencies in former appropriations, for the support of the Civil List establishment, and for aiding the fund appropriated for the payment of certain officers of the Courts, jurors, and witnesses, and for the establishment of ten cutters, there shall be appropriated a sum of money not exceeding one hundred and ninety-seven thousand one hundred and nineteen dollars and forty-nine cents, that is to say:

For discharging a balance due on a liquidated claim of his Most Christian Majesty, against the United States, for supplies during the late war, nine thousand and twenty dollars and sixty-eight cents.

For payment of the principal and interest on a liquidated claim of Oliver Pollock, late Commercial Agent of the United States at New Orleans, for supplies of clothing, arms, and military stores, during the late war, one hundred and eight thousand six hundred and five dollars and two cents: Provided, That the said moneys be not paid to the said Oliver Pollock without the consent of the agents of the Court of Spain.

For making good deficiencies in the last appropriations, for the compensations to sundry officers of the Civil List establishments, five thousand four hundred and seventy-one dollars.

For defraying sundry authorized expenses to the Commissioners of Loans in the several States, twenty-one thousand dollars.

For defraying a balance of certain liquidated and contingent expenses in the Treasury Department, two thousand eight hundred dollars.

For defraying the additional expense of the enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States, nineteen thousand seven hundred and seventy-two dollars and seventy-nine cents.

For making good a deficiency in former appropriations, to discharge the expenses to clerks, jurors, and witnesses, in the Courts of the United States, five thousand dollars.

For the maintenance and repair of light-houses, beacons, piers, stakes, and buoys, sixteen thousand dollars.

For the expense of keeping prisoners committed under the authority of the United States, four thousand dollars.

For the expense of clerks and books in arranging the public securities, two thousand four hundred and fifty dollars.

For the purchase of hydrometers for the use of the officers in the execution of the laws of revenue, one thousand dollars.

For the further expense of building and equipping ten cutters, two thousand dollars.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That for the support of the Military Establishment of the United States, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, the payment of the annual allowances to the invalid pensioners of the United States, for defraying all expenses incident to the Indian department, and for defraying the expenses incurred in the defensive protection of the frontiers against the Indians, during the years one thousand seven hundred and ninety, and one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, by virtue of the authority vested in the President of the United States, by the acts relative to the Military Establishment, passed the twenty-ninth of September, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-nine, and the thirtieth of April, one thousand seven hundred and ninety, and for which no appropriations have been made, there shall be appropriated a sum of money not exceeding five hundred and thirty-two thousand four hundred and forty-nine dollars seventy-six cents and two thirds of a cent, that is to say:

For the pay of troops, - - - - $102,686 00

For subsistence, - - - - - 119,688 97

For clothing, - - - - - 48,000 00

For forage, - - - - - 4,152 00

For the Hospital department, - - - - 6,000 00

For the Quartermaster's department, - - 50,000 00

For the Ordnance department, - - - - 7,204 64

For the contingent expenses of the War Department, including maps, hire of expresses, allowances to officers for extra expenses, printing, loss of stores of all kinds, advertising, and apprehending deserters, - 20,000 00

For the discharge of certain sums due for pay and subsistence of sundry officers of the late Army, and for pay of the late Maryland line, for which no appropriations have been made, - - - - - 10,490 36

For the payment of the annual allowances to invalid pensioners, - 87,463 60½

For defraying all expenses incidental to the Indian department, authorized by law, - - - - - 39,424 71

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the several appropriations hereinbefore made, shall be paid and discharged out of the funds following, to wit: First, out of the sum of six hundred thousand dollars, which, by the act, entitled "An act making provision for the Debt of the United States," is reserved yearly for the support of the Government of the United States and their common defence; and secondly, out of such surplus as shall have accrued to the end of the present year, upon the revenues heretofore established, over and above the sums necessary for the payment of interest on the Public Debt during the same year, and for satisfying other prior appropriations.

Approved, December 23, 1791.

An Act for carrying into effect a Contract between the United States and the State of Pennsylvania.

For duly conveying to the State of Pennsylvania a certain tract of land, the right to the government and jurisdiction whereof was relinquished to the said State by a resolution of Congress of the fourth day of September, in the year one thousand seven hundred and eighty-eight, and whereof the right of soil has been sold by virtue of a previous resolution of Congress of the sixth day of June in the said year:

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the

Acts of Congress.

United States be authorized, in fulfilment of the terms stipulated on the part of the State of Pennsylvania, to issue letters patent, in the name and under the seal of the United States, granting and conveying to the said State forever, the said tract of land, as the same was ascertained by a survey made in pursuance of the resolution of Congress of the sixth day of June, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-eight.

Approved, January 3, 1792.

An Act to extend the time limited for settling the Accounts of the United States with the individual States.

Be it enacted, &c., That the powers of the Board of Commissioners, which, by an act passed in the second session of the first Congress, was established to settle the accounts between the United States and individual States, shall continue until the first day of July, 1793, unless the business shall be sooner accomplished.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the aforesaid act shall extend to the settlement of the accounts between the United States and the State of Vermont; and that until the first day of December next, shall be allowed for the said State to exhibit its claims.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the passing of this act, the pay of the principal clerk of the said Board shall be the same as the pay of the principal clerk in the Auditor's office.

Approved, January 23, 1792.

An Act concerning certain Fisheries of the United States, and for the regulation and government of the Fishermen employed therein.

Be it enacted, &c., That the allowance now made upon the exportation of dried fish, of the fisheries of the United States, in lieu of a drawback of the duties paid on the salt used in preserving the same, shall cease on all dried fish exported after the tenth day of June next; and as a commutation and equivalent therefor, there shall be afterwards paid, on the last day of December annually, to the owner of every vessel, or his agent, by the collector of the district where such vessel may belong, that shall be qualified agreeably to law for carrying on the Bank and other cod fisheries, and that shall actually have been employed therein, at sea, for the term of four months at the least of the fishing season next preceding, which season is accounted to be from the last day of February to the last day of November in every year, for each and every ton of such vessel's burden, according to her admeasurement as licensed or enrolled—if of twenty tons, and not exceeding thirty tons, one and a half dollar; and if above thirty tons, two and a half dollars; of which allowance aforesaid, three-eighth parts shall accrue and belong to the owner of such fishing vessel, and the other five-eighths thereof shall be divided by him, his agent or lawful representative, to and among the several fishermen who shall have been employed in such vessel during the season aforesaid, or a part thereof, as the case may be, in such proportions as the fish they shall respectively have taken may bear to the whole quantity of fish taken on board such vessel during such season: Provided, That the allowance aforesaid on any one vessel, for one season, shall not exceed one hundred and seventy dollars.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That on the last day of December, annually, as aforesaid, there shall also be paid to the owner of every fishing boat or vessel of more than five tons, and less than twenty tons, or to his agent or lawful representative, by the collector of the district where such boat or vessel may belong, the sum of one dollar upon every ton admeasurement of such boat or vessel, which allowance shall be accounted for as part of the proceeds of the fares of said boat or vessel, and shall accordingly be so divided among all persons interested therein: Provided, however, That this allowance shall be made only to such boats or vessels as shall have actually been employed at sea in the cod fishery, for the term of four months at the least, of the preceding season: And provided, also, That such boat or vessel shall have landed, in the course of said preceding season, a quantity of fish not less than twelve quintals for every ton of her admeasurement; the said quantity of fish to be ascertained when dried and cured fit for exportation, and according to the weight thereof, as the same shall weigh at the time of delivery when actually sold; which account of the weight, with the original adjustment and settlement of the fare or fares among the owners and fishermen, together with a written account of the length, breadth, and depth of said boat or vessel, and the time she has actually been employed in the fishery in the preceding season, shall in all cases be produced and sworn or affirmed to, before the said collector of the district, in order to entitle the owner, his agent or lawful representative, to receive the allowance aforesaid. And if at any time within one year after payment of such allowance, it shall appear that any fraud or deceit has been practised in obtaining the same, the boat or vessel upon which such allowance shall have been paid, if found within the district aforesaid, shall be forfeited; otherwise the owner or owners, having practised such fraud or deceit, shall forfeit and pay one hundred dollars; to be sued for, recovered, and appropriated, in like manner as forfeitures and penalties are to be sued for, recovered and appropriated for any breach of an act, entitled "An act to provide more effectually for the collection of the duties imposed by law on goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels."

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the owner or owners of every fishing vessel of twenty tons and upwards, his or their agent or lawful representative, shall, previous to receiving the allowance which is provided for in this act, produce to the collector who is authorized to pay the same, the original agreement or agreements which may have been made with the fishermen employed on board such vessel, as is herein before required, and also a certificate, to be by him or them subscribed, therein mentioning the particular days on which such vessel sailed and returned on the several voyages or fares she may have made, in the preceding fishing season; to the truth of which they shall swear or affirm, before the collector aforesaid.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That no ship or vessel of twenty tons or upwards, employed as aforesaid, shall be entitled to the allowance granted by this act, unless the skipper or master thereof shall, before he proceeds on any fishing voyage, make an agreement, in writing or in print, with every fisherman employed therein, excepting only an apprentice or servant of himself or owner; and in addition to such terms of shipment as may be agreed on, shall in such agreement express whether the same is to continue for one voyage or for the fishing season, and shall also express that the fish, or the proceeds of such fishing voyage or voyages, which may appertain to the fishermen, shall be divided among them, in proportion to the quantities or number of said fish they may respectively have caught; which agreement shall be endorsed or countersigned by the owner of such fishing vessel or his agent: And if any fisherman, having engaged himself for a voyage or for the fishing season, in any fishing vessel, and signed an agreement therefor as aforesaid, shall thereafter, and while such agreement remains in force and to be performed, desert or absent himself from such vessel, without leave of the master or skipper thereof, or of the owner or his agent, such deserter shall be liable to the same penalties as deserting seamen or mariners are subject to in the merchant service, and may in the like manner, and upon the like complaint and proof, be apprehended and detained; and all costs of process and commitment, if paid by the master or owner, shall be deducted out of the share of the fish or proceeds of any fishing voyage to which such deserter had or shall become entitled. And any fisherman, having engaged himself as aforesaid, who shall, during such fishing voyage, refuse or neglect his proper duty on board the fishing vessel, being thereto ordered or required by the master or skipper thereof, or shall otherwise resist his just commands, to the hindrance or detriment of such voyage, besides being answerable for such damages arising thereby, shall forfeit, to the use of the owner of such vessel, his share of the allowance which shall be paid upon such voyage, as is herein granted.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That where an agreement or contract shall be so made and signed, for a fishing voyage or for the fishing season, and any fish which may have been caught on board such vessel during the same shall be delivered to the owner or to his agent, for cure, and shall be sold by said owner or agent, such vessel shall, for the term of six months after such sale, be liable and answerable for the skipper's and every other fisherman's share of such fish, and may be proceeded against in the same form, and to the same effect, as any other vessel is by law liable and may be proceeded against, for the wages of seamen or mariners in the merchant service. And upon such process, for the value of a share or shares of the proceeds of fish delivered and sold as aforesaid, it shall be incumbent on the owner or his agent, to produce a just account of the sales and division of such fish, according to such agreement or contract, otherwise the said vessel shall be answerable upon such process for what may be the highest value of the share or shares demanded: But, in all cases, the owner of such vessel or his agent, appearing to answer to such process, may offer thereupon his account of general supplies made for such fishing voyage, and of other supplies thereto made, to either of the demandants, and shall be allowed to produce evidence thereof, in answer to the demands respectively, and judgment shall be rendered upon such process, for the respective balances which, upon such an inquiry, shall appear: Provided, always, That when process shall be issued against any vessel liable as aforesaid, if the owner thereof or his agent will give bond to each fisherman in whose favor such process shall be instituted, with sufficient security, to the satisfaction of two justices of the peace, one of whom shall be named by such owner or agent, and the other by the fisherman or fishermen pursuing such process; or if either party shall refuse, then the justice first appointed shall name his associate, with condition to answer and pay whatever sum shall be recovered by him or them on such process, there shall be an immediate discharge of such vessel: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent any fisherman from having his action at common law for his share or shares of fish, or the proceeds thereof, as aforesaid.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the drawback heretofore allowed on the exportation of foreign dried and pickled fish, and other foreign salted provisions, be, and the same is hereby repealed.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the moneys which shall remain, in consequence of the abolition of the allowance on the exportation of the dried fish of the United States, and of the drawback on foreign dried and pickled fish, and other foreign salted provisions, be, and the same are hereby, appropriated to the payment of the allowances granted by this act; and in case the moneys so appropriated shall be inadequate, the deficiency shall be supplied out of any moneys which from time to time shall be in the Treasury of the United States, and not otherwise appropriated.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That any person who shall declare falsely in any oath or affirmation required by this act, being duly convicted thereof in any Court of the United States having jurisdiction of such offence, shall suffer the same penalties as are provided for false swearing or affirming, by the act before mentioned, and to be in like manner sued for, recovered, and appropriated.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That this act shall continue and be in force for the term of seven years, and from thence to the end of the next session of Congress, and no longer.

Approved, February 16, 1792.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for the Postmaster General to enter into contracts, for a term not exceeding eight years, for extending the line of posts, and to authorize the person or persons, so contracting, to receive, during the continuance of such contract, according to the rates by this act established, all the postage which shall arise on letters, newspapers and packets, conveyed by any such post; and the roads, therein designated, shall, during the continuance of such contract, be deemed and considered as Post Roads, within the terms and provisions of this act: Provided, That no such contract shall be made, to the diminution of the revenue of the General Post Office, and that a duplicate of every such contract, under hand and seal, shall, within sixty days after the execution thereof, be lodged in the office of the Comptroller of the Treasury of the United States.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That there shall be established, at the Seat of the Government of the United States, a General Post Office. And there shall be one Postmaster General, who shall have authority to appoint an Assistant, and Deputy Postmasters, at all the places where such shall be found necessary. And he shall provide for carrying the mail of the United States, by stage-carriages or horses, as he may judge most expedient; and as often as he, having regard to the productiveness thereof, as well as other circumstances shall think proper, and defray the expense thereof, with all other expenses arising on the collection and management of the revenue of the Post Office. He shall also have power to prescribe such regulations to the Deputy Postmasters, and others employed under him, as may be found necessary, and to superintend the business of the Department, in all the duties that are, or may be assigned to it, and also to direct the route or road, where there are more than one, between the places above established, which route or road shall be considered as the Post Road.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General shall, once in three months, obtain from his deputies, the accounts and vouchers of their receipts and expenditures, and the balances due thereon, and render to the Secretary of the Treasury, a quarterly account of all the receipts and expenditures in the said Department, to be adjusted and settled, as other public accounts, and shall pay, quarterly, into the Treasury of the United States, the balance in his hands. And the Postmaster General, and his Assistant, the Deputy Postmasters, and such as they may employ in their offices, shall, respectively, before they enter upon the duties, or be entitled to receive the emoluments of their offices, and the contractors for carrying the mail, and their agents or servants, to whom the mail shall be intrusted, before they commence the execution, of said trust, shall respectively, take and subscribe before some Justice of the Peace, the following oath or affirmation, and cause a certificate thereof to be filed in the office of the Postmaster General: "I do swear (or affirm as the case may be) that I will faithfully perform all the duties required of me, and abstain from everything forbidden by the law in relation to the establishment of Post Offices and Post Roads within the United States."

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall obstruct or retard the passage of the mail, or of any horse or carriage carrying the same, he shall, upon conviction for every such offence, pay a fine not exceeding one hundred dollars. And if any ferryman shall, by wilful negligence, or refusal to transport the mail across any ferry, delay the same, he shall forfeit, and pay, for each half hour that the same shall be so delayed, a sum not exceeding ten dollars.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Postmaster General, to give public notice in one or more of the newspapers published at the Seat of Government of the United States, and in one or more of the newspapers published in the State or States where the contract is to be performed, for at least six weeks before the entering into any contract for the conveyance of the mail that such contract is to be intended to be made, and the day on which it shall be concluded; describing the places, from and to which such mail is to be conveyed; the time at which it is to be made up; the day and hour, at which it is to be delivered; and the penalty or penalties for non-performance of the stipulations. He shall, moreover, within thirty days after the making of any contract, lodge the same, together with the proposals which he shall have received respecting the same, in the office of the Comptroller of the Treasury of the United States.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That every Deputy Postmaster shall keep an office in which one or more persons shall attend at such hours as the Postmaster General shall direct, for the purpose of performing the duties thereof. And all letters brought to any Post Office, half an hour before the time of making up the mail at such office, shall be forwarded therein.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That, from and after of the passing of this act, the Postmaster General shall be allowed, for his services, at the rate of two thousand dollars per annum, his Assistant at the rate of one thousand per annum, to be paid, quarterly, out of the revenues of the Post Office. And no fees or perquisites shall be received by either them, on account of the duties to be performed in virtue of their appointments.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the 1st day of June next, the Deputy Postmaster and persons authorized by the Postmaster General, shall demand and receive, for the postage and conveyance of letters and packets, except such as are hereinafter excepted, according to the several rates and sums following: For the postage of every single letter, to or from any place by land not exceeding thirty miles, six cents; over thirty miles, and not exceeding sixty, eight cents; over sixty miles, and not exceeding one hundred, ten cents; over one hundred miles, and not exceeding one hundred and fifty, twelve cents and a-half; over one hundred and fifty miles, and not exceeding two hundred, fifteen cents; over two hundred miles, and not exceeding two hundred and fifty, seventeen cents; over two hundred and fifty miles, and not exceeding three hundred and fifty, twenty cents; over three hundred and fifty miles, and not exceeding four hundred and fifty, twenty-two cents; and to or from any place by land, more than four hundred and fifty miles, twenty-five cents; and every double letter shall pay double the said rates; every triple letter, triple; every packet weighing one ounce avoirdupois, to pay, at the rate of four single letters for each ounce, and in that proportion, for any greater weight.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That all letters and packets, passing by sea to and from the United States, or from one port to another therein, in packet boats or vessels, the property of, or provided by the United States, shall be rated and charged, as follows: For every single letter, eight cents; for every double letter, sixteen cents; for every triple letter or packet, twenty-four cents; for every letter or packet brought into the United States, or carried from one port therein to another by sea, in any private ship or vessel, four cents, if delivered at the place where the same shall arrive; and if directed to be delivered at any other place, with the addition of the like postage, as other letters are made subject to the payment of by this act.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That, if any Deputy Postmaster, or other person authorized by the Postmaster General, to receive the postages of letters, shall fraudulently demand or receive any rate of postage, or any gratuity or reward, other than is provided by this act for the postage of letters or packets, on conviction thereof, he shall forfeit for every such offence, one hundred dollars, and shall be rendered incapable of holding any office under the United States.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That no ship or vessel, arriving at any port within the United States, where a Post Office is established, shall be permitted to report, make entry or break bulk, till the master or commander shall have delivered to the Postmaster, all letters directed to any person or persons within the United States, which, under his care or within his power, shall be brought in such ship or vessel, other than such as are directed to the owner or consignee; but when a vessel shall be bound to another port, than that, at which she may enter, the letters belonging to, or to be delivered at the said port of delivery, shall not be delivered to the Postmaster at the port of entry. And it shall be the duty of the Collector or other officer of the port, empowered to receive entries of ships or vessels, to require from every master or commander of such ship or vessel, an oath or affirmation, purporting that he has delivered all such letters, except as aforesaid.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That the Postmasters to whom such letters may be delivered, shall pay to the master, commander, or other person delivering the same, except the commanders of foreign packets, two cents for every such letter or packet; and shall obtain from the person delivering the same, a certificate specifying the number of letters and packets, with the name of the ship or vessel, and the place from whence she last sailed; which certificate, together with a receipt for the money, shall be with his half-yearly accounts, transmitted to the Postmaster General, who shall credit the amount thereof to the Postmaster forwarding the same.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That, if any person, other than the Postmaster General, or his deputies, or persons by them employed, shall take up, receive, order, despatch, convey, carry or deliver any letter or letters, packet or packets, other than newspapers, for hire or reward, or shall be concerned in setting up any foot or horse post, wagon or other carriage, by or in which any letter or packet shall be carried for hire, on any established Post Road, or any packet, or other vessel or boat, or any conveyance whatever, whereby the revenue of the General Post Office may be injured, every person, so offending, shall forfeit, for every such offence, the sum of two hundred dollars: Provided, That it shall and may be lawful for every person to send letters or packets by special messenger.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That the Deputy Postmasters or agents of the Postmaster General, shall duly account and answer to him, for all by or way letters, and shall specify the number and rates in the Post Bill. And if any Deputy Postmaster or agent shall neglect so to account, he or they so offending, shall on conviction thereof, forfeit, for every such offence, a sum not exceeding one hundred dollars.

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That, if any person, employed in any of the Departments of the General Post Office, shall unlawfully detain, delay, or open any letter, packet, bag or mail of letters, with which he shall be intrusted, or which shall have come to his possession, and which are intended to be conveyed by post: or if any such person shall secrete, embezzle or destroy any letter or packet, intrusted to him, as aforesaid, and which shall not contain any security for, or assurance relating to money, as hereinafter described, every such offender, being thereof duly convicted, shall, for every such offence, be fined not exceeding three hundred dollars, or imprisoned not exceeding six months, or both, according to the circumstances and aggravations of the offence. And if any person, employed as aforesaid, shall secrete, embezzle, or destroy, any letter, packet, bag, or mail of letters, with which he shall be intrusted, or which shall have come to his possession, and are intended to be conveyed by post, containing any bank note, or bank post bill, bill of exchange, warrant of the Treasury of the United States, note of assignment of stock in the funds, letters of attorney for receiving annuities or dividends, or for selling stock in the funds, or for receiving the interest thereof, or any letter of credit, or note for, or relating to the payment of money, or other bond or warrant, draft, bill, or promissory note whatsoever, for the payment of money; or if any such person, employed as aforesaid, shall steal or take any of the same out of any letter, packet, bag, or mail of letters, that shall come to his possession, he shall, on conviction, for any such offence, suffer death. And if any person, who shall have taken charge of the mail of the United States, shall quit or desert the same, before his arrival at the next Post Office, every such person, so offending, shall forfeit and pay a sum, not exceeding five hundred dollars, for every such offence. And if any person, concerned in carrying the mail of the United States, shall collect, receive or carry any letter or packet, or shall cause or procure the same to be done, contrary to this act, every such offender shall forfeit and pay, for every such offence, a sum not exceeding fifty dollars.

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That, if any person or persons shall rob any carrier of the mail of the United States, of such mail, or if any person shall rob the mail, in which letters are sent to be conveyed by post, of any letter or packet, or shall steal such mail, or shall steal and take from or out of the same, or from or out of any Post Office, any letter or packet, such offender or offenders shall, on conviction thereof, suffer death.

SEC. 18. And be it further enacted, That the Deputy Postmasters shall, respectively, publish at the expiration of every three months, in one of the newspapers published at, or nearest the place of his residence, for three successive weeks, a list of all the letters then remaining in their respective offices; and at the expiration of the next three months, shall send such of the said letters as then remain on hand, as dead letters, to the General Post Office, where the same shall be opened and inspected; and if any valuable papers or matter of consequence, shall be found therein, it shall be the duty of the Postmaster General, to cause a descriptive list thereof to be inserted in one of the newspapers, published at the place most convenient to where the owner may be supposed to reside, if within the United States, and such letter and the contents shall be preserved, to be delivered to the person, to whom the same shall be addressed, upon payment of the postage, and the expense of publication.

Sec. 19. And be it further enacted, That the following letters and packets, and no other, shall be received and conveyed by post, free of postage, under such restrictions as are hereinafter provided; that is to say, all letters and packets to or from the President or Vice President of the United States, and all letters and packets, not exceeding two ounces in weight, to or from any member of the Senate or House of Representatives, the Secretary of the Senate or Clerk of the House of Representatives, during their actual attendance in any session of Congress, and twenty days after such session. All letters to and from the Secretary of the Treasury, and his Assistant, Comptroller, Register, and Auditor of the Treasury, the Treasurer, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of War, the Commissioners for settling the accounts between the United States and individual States, the Postmaster General and his Assistant: Provided, That no person shall frank or enclose any letter or packet, other than his own; but any public letter or packet from the Department of the Treasury may be franked by the Secretary of the Treasury, or the Assistant Secretary, or by the Comptroller, Register, Auditor or Treasurer. And that each person before named shall deliver to the Post Office every letter or packet enclosed to him, which may be directed to any other person, noting the place, from whence it came by post, and the usual postage shall be charged thereon.

Sec. 20. And be it further enacted, That, if any person shall counterfeit the handwriting of any other person, in order to evade the payment of postage, such person or persons so offending, and being thereof duly convicted, shall forfeit and pay, for every such offence, the sum of one hundred dollars.

Sec. 21. And be it further enacted, That every printer of newspapers may send one paper to each and every other printer of newspapers within the United States, free of postage, under such regulations as the Postmaster General shall provide.

Sec. 22. And be it further enacted, That all newspapers conveyed in the mail shall be under a cover open at one end, carried in separate bags from the letters, and charged with the payment of one cent for any distance not more than one hundred miles, and one cent and a half for any greater distance. And it shall be the duty of the Postmaster General and his Deputy to keep a separate account for the newspapers, and the Deputy Postmasters shall receive fifty per cent. on the postage of all newspapers; and if any other matter or thing be enclosed in such papers, the whole packet shall be charged, agreeably to the rates established by this act, for letters or packets.

And if any of the persons employed in any department of the Post Office shall unlawfully detain, delay, embezzle, or destroy any newspaper with which he shall be intrusted, such offenders, for every such offence, shall forfeit a sum not exceeding fifty dollars: Provided, That the Postmaster General, in any contract he may enter into for the conveyance of the mail, may authorize the person with whom such contract is made to carry newspapers other than those conveyed in the mail.

Sec. 23. And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized to allow to the Deputy Postmasters, respectively, such commission on the moneys arising from the postage of letters and packets as he shall think adequate to their respective services: Provided, That the said commission shall not exceed forty per cent. to any Deputy whose compensation thereby shall not exceed fifty dollars, nor thirty per cent. to any Deputy whose compensation thereby shall not exceed one hundred dollars, nor twenty per cent. to any other Deputy, except the Postmaster at the port where the European packets do or shall steadily arrive, to whom such farther allowance, in addition to the emoluments of his office, shall be made as the Postmaster General shall deem a reasonable compensation for his extra services in the receipt and despatch of letters originally received into his office from on board such packets, and by him forwarded to other offices: And provided, also, That the compensations aforesaid shall not exceed eighteen hundred dollars per annum to any one Postmaster for all services by him rendered.

Sec. 24. And be it further enacted, That, if any Deputy Postmaster or other person authorized to receive the postage of letters and packets, shall neglect or refuse to render his accounts and pay over to the Postmaster General the balance by him due, at the end of every three months, it shall be the duty of the Postmaster General to cause a suit to be commenced against the person or persons so neglecting or refusing; and if the Postmaster General shall not cause such suit to be commenced within three months from the end of every such three months, the balances due from every such delinquent shall be charged to, and recoverable from, the Postmaster General.

Sec. 25. And be it further enacted, That all pecuniary penalties and forfeitures incurred under this act shall be, one-half for the use of the person or persons informing and prosecuting for the same, the other half to the use of the United States.

Sec. 26. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the Postmaster General to make provision, where it may be necessary, for the receipt of all letters and packets intended to be conveyed by any ship or vessel beyond sea, or from any port of the United States to another port therein; and the letters so received shall be formed into a mail, sealed up, and directed to the Postmaster of the port to which such ship or vessel shall be bound. And for every letter or packet so received there shall be paid, at the time of its reception, a postage of one cent; and the Postmaster General may make arrangements with the

Acts of Congress.

Postmasters in any foreign country for the reciprocal receipt and delivery of letters and packets through the Post Offices.

Sec. 27. And be it further enacted, That the Deputy Postmasters, and the persons employed in the transportation of the mail, shall be exempt from militia duties, or any fine or penalty for neglect thereof.

Sec. 28. And be it further enacted, That all the surplus revenue of the General Post Office which shall have accrued previous to the first day of June next, not heretofore appropriated, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated towards defraying any deficiency which may arise in the revenue of the said Department for the year next ensuing.

Sec. 29. And be it further enacted, That the act passed at the last session of Congress entitled "An act to continue in force, for a limited time, an act entitled 'An act for the temporary establishment of the Post Office,'" be, and the same is hereby, continued in full force until the first day of June next, and no longer.

Sec. 30. And be it further enacted, That this act shall be in force for the term of two years, from the said first day of June next, and no longer.

Approved, February 20, 1792.

An Act relative to the election of a President and Vice President of the United States, and declaring the officer who shall act as President in case of vacancies in the offices both of President and Vice President.

Be it enacted, &c., That, except in case of an election of a President and Vice President of the United States, prior to the ordinary period, as hereinafter specified, Electors shall be appointed in each State for the election of a President and Vice President of the United States, within thirty-four days preceding the first Wednesday in December, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, and within thirty-four days preceding the first Wednesday in December in every fourth year succeeding the last election, which Electors shall be equal to the number of Senators and Representatives, to which the several States may by law be entitled at the time, when the President and Vice President, thus to be chosen, should come into office: Provided, always, That where no apportionment of Representatives shall have been made after any enumeration, at the time of choosing Electors, then the number of Electors shall be according to the existing apportionment of Senators and Representatives.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Electors shall meet and give their votes on the said first Wednesday in December, at such place in each State as shall be directed by the Legislature thereof; and the Electors in each State shall make and sign three certificates of all the votes by them given, and shall seal up the same, certifying on each that a list of the votes of such State for President and Vice President is contained therein, and shall by writing under their hands, or under the hands of a majority of them, appoint a person to take charge of and deliver to the President of the Senate, at the Seat of Government, before the first Wednesday in January then next ensuing, one of the said certificates; and the said Electors shall forthwith forward, by the Post Office, to the President of the Senate, at the Seat of Government, one other of the said certificates; and shall forthwith cause the other of the said certificates to be delivered to the Judge of that District in which the said Electors shall assemble.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Executive authority of each State shall cause three lists of the names of the Electors of such State to be made and certified and to be delivered to the Electors on or before the said first Wednesday in December; and the said Electors shall annex one of the said lists to each of the lists of their votes.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That if a list of votes from any State shall not have been received at the Seat of Government on the said first Wednesday in January, that then the Secretary of State shall send a special messenger to the District Judge in whose custody such list shall have been lodged, who shall forthwith transmit the same to the Seat of Government.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That Congress shall be in session on the second Wednesday in February, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, and on the second Wednesday in February succeeding every meeting of the Electors, and the said certificates, or so many of them as shall have been received, shall then be opened, the votes counted, and the persons who shall fill the offices of President and Vice President ascertained and declared, agreeably to the Constitution.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That, in case there shall be no President of the Senate at the Seat of Government on the arrival of the persons intrusted with the lists of the votes of the Electors, then such persons shall deliver the lists of votes in their custody into the office of the Secretary of State, to be safely kept, and delivered over as soon as may be to the President of the Senate.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the persons appointed by the Electors to deliver the lists of votes to the President of the Senate, shall be allowed, on the delivery of the said lists, twenty-five cents for every mile of the estimated distance, by the most usual road, from the place of meeting of the Electors to the Seat of the Government of the United States.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That, if any person appointed to deliver the votes of the Electors to the President of the Senate, shall, after accepting of his appointment, neglect to perform the services required of him by this act, he shall forfeit the sum of one thousand dollars.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That, in case of removal, death, resignation, or inability both of the President and Vice President of the United States, the President of the Senate pro tempore, and in case there shall be no President of the Senate, then the Speaker of the House of Representatives, for the time being, shall act as President of the United States until the disability be removed or a President shall be elected.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That, whenever the offices of President and Vice President shall both become vacant, the Secretary of State shall forthwith cause a notification thereof to be made to the Executive of every State, and shall also cause the same to be published in at least one of the newspapers printed in each State, specifying that Electors of the President of the United States shall be appointed or chosen in the several States within thirty-four days preceding the first Wednesday in December then next ensuing: Provided, There shall be the space of two months between the date of such notification and the said first Wednesday in December; but if there shall not be the space of two months between the date of such notification and the first Wednesday in December, and if the term for which the President and Vice President last in office were elected shall not expire on the third day of March next ensuing, then the Secretary of State shall specify in the notification that the Electors shall be appointed or chosen within thirty-four days preceding the first Wednesday in December in the year next ensuing, within which time the Electors shall accordingly be appointed or chosen; and the Electors shall meet and give their votes on the said first Wednesday in December, and the proceedings and duties of the said Electors and others shall be pursuant to the directions prescribed in this act.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That the only evidence of a refusal to accept, or of a resignation of the office of President or Vice President shall be an instrument in writing declaring the same, and subscribed by the person refusing to accept, or resigning, as the case may be, and delivered into the office of the Secretary of State.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That the term of four years, for which a President and Vice President shall be elected, shall, in all cases, commence on the fourth day of March next succeeding the day on which the votes of the Electors shall have been given.

Approved, March 1, 1792.

An Act for making further and more effectual provision for the protection of the Frontiers of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That the battalion of artillery now in service be completed according to the establishment, and that the two regiments of infantry now in service be completed to the number of nine hundred and sixty non-commissioned officers, privates, and musicians, each.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That there shall be raised for a term not exceeding three years, three additional regiments, each of which, exclusively of the commissioned officers, shall consist of nine hundred and sixty non-commissioned officers, privates, and musicians; and that one of the said regiments be organized in the following manner: that is to say—two battalions of infantry, each of which, exclusively of the commissioned officers, shall consist of three hundred and twenty non-commissioned officers, privates, and musicians; and one squadron of light dragoons, which, exclusively of the commissioned officers, shall consist of three hundred and twenty non-commissioned officers, privates, and musicians; and that it shall be a condition in the enlistment of the said dragoons, to serve as dismounted dragoons, whenever they shall be ordered thereto: That the organization of the said squadron of light dragoons shall be as follows, to wit: One major, one adjutant, one quartermaster, one surgeon's mate, and four troops, each of which shall consist of one captain, one lieutenant, one cornet, four sergeants, four corporals, one farrier, one saddler, one trumpeter, and sixty-nine dragoons; and the President may arm the said troops as he shall think proper. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to organize the said five regiments of infantry and the said corps of horse and artillery as he shall judge expedient, diminishing the number of corps, or taking from one corps and adding to another, as shall appear to him proper; so that the whole number of officers and men shall not exceed the limits above prescribed: Provided, That the said three regiments shall be discharged as soon as the United States shall be at peace with the Indian tribes.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the non-commissioned officers, privates, and musicians of the said three regiments shall be enlisted for the term of three years, unless previously discharged.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That every recruit, who shall be enlisted by virtue of this act, shall receive eight dollars bounty, and that the same shall be made up to the non-commissioned officers, privates, and musicians now in service, who have enlisted for three years, since the passing of the act entitled "An act for regulating the military establishment of the United States."

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the commissioned officers, who shall be employed to recruit for the military establishment, shall be entitled to receive, for every recruit, duly enlisted and mustered, two dollars.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the monthly pay of the commissioned officers, non-commissioned officers, privates, and musicians, on the military establishment of the United States, and of the three regiments authorized by this act, shall be, in future, as follows, free of all deductions, to wit:

GENERAL STAFF—A major general, one hundred and sixty-six dollars; a brigadier general, one hundred and four dollars; quartermaster, one hundred dollars; adjutant, to do also the duty of inspector, seventy-five dollars; chaplain, fifty dollars; surgeon, seventy dollars; deputy quartermaster, fifty dollars; aid-de-camp, in addition to his pay in the line, twenty-four dollars; brigade major, to act also as deputy inspector, in addition to his pay in the line, twenty-four dollars; principal artificer, forty dollars; second artificer, twenty-six dollars.

REGIMENTAL—Lieutenant colonel commandant, seventy-five dollars; major commandant of artillery and major of dragoons, fifty-five dollars; paymaster, in addition to his pay in the line, ten dollars; quartermaster, in addition to his pay in the line, eight dollars; adjutant, in addition to his pay in the line, ten dollars; majors of infantry, fifty dollars; captains, forty dollars; lieutenants, twenty-six dollars; ensigns and cornets, twenty dollars; surgeons, forty-five dollars; mates, thirty dollars; sergeant major and quartermaster sergeants, seven dollars; senior musicians, six dollars; corporals, five dollars; privates, three dollars; musicians, four dollars; artificers allowed to the infantry, light dragoons, and artillery, and included as privates, eight dollars; matrons and nurses in the hospital, eight dollars.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the rations, or money in lieu thereof, for the commissioned, non-commissioned officers, privates, and musicians, of the additional troops herein mentioned, shall be the same as described in the aforesaid act, entitled, "An act for regulating the military establishment of the United States," and in the act passed in the third session of the first Congress, entitled "An act for raising and adding another regiment to the military establishment of the United States, and for making further provision for the protection of the frontiers."

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That the forage to be allowed to the officers of the additional regiments authorized by this act, be the same as described by the acts before mentioned.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That the allowance of clothing for non-commissioned officers and privates of the infantry of the said three regiments, shall be the same as is by law established: that suitable clothing be provided for the cavalry, and adapted to the nature of the service, and conformed as near as may be to the value of the clothing allowed to the infantry and artillery.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That all the commissioned and non-commissioned officers, privates, and musicians, of the said three regiments, shall take the same oaths, shall be governed by the same rules and regulations, and, in cases of disabilities, shall receive the same compensations, as are described in the before mentioned act, entitled "An act for regulating the military establishment of the United States."

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to forbear to raise, or to discharge after they shall be raised, the whole or any part of the said three additional regiments, in case events shall, in his judgment, render his so doing consistent with the public safety.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That the President be, and he hereby is authorized, from time to time, to call into service, and for such periods as he may deem requisite, such number of cavalry as, in his judgment, may be necessary for the protection of the frontiers: Provided, That non-commissioned officers shall not be allowed more than one dollar per day, nor the privates more than seventy-five cents per day; each person finding his horse, arms, and accoutrements, and at his own risk; and twenty-five cents per day in lieu of rations and forage, provided he furnish himself therewith.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That the President alone be, and he hereby is, authorized to appoint, for the cavalry so to be engaged, the proper commissioned officers, who shall not exceed, in number and rank, the proportions assigned to the said three regiments, and whose pay and other allowances shall not, exclusively of fifty cents per day for the use and risk of their horses, exceed those of officers of corresponding rank in the said regiments.

Sec. 14. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be authorized, in case he shall deem the measure expedient, to employ such number of the Indians, and for such compensations, as he may think proper: Provided, The said compensations do not, in the whole, exceed twenty thousand dollars.

Approved, March 5, 1792.

An Act declaring the consent of Congress to a certain act of the State of Maryland, and to continue for a longer time an act declaring the assent of Congress to certain acts of the States of Maryland, Georgia, and Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, so far as the same respects the States of Georgia and Rhode Island and Providence Plantations.

Be it enacted, &c., That the consent of Congress be, and is hereby, granted and declared to the operation of an act of the General Assembly of Maryland, made and passed at a session begun and held at the city of Annapolis, on the first Monday in November last, entitled "An act empowering the wardens of the port of Baltimore to levy and collect the duty therein mentioned."

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the act entitled "An act declaring the assent of Congress to certain acts of the States of Maryland, Georgia, and Rhode Island and Providence Plantations," shall be continued, and is hereby declared to be in full force, so far as the same respects the States of Georgia, and Rhode Island and Providence Plantations.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That this act shall be and continue in force for the term of three years, and from thence to the end of the next session of Congress, and no longer.

Approved, March 19, 1792.

An Act to provide for the settlement of the claims of widows and orphans, barred by the limitations heretofore established, and to regulate the claims to invalid pensions.

Be it enacted, &c., That the operation of the resolutions of the late Congress of the United States, passed on the second day of November, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-five, and the twenty-third day of July, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven, so far as they have barred, or may be construed to bar, the claims of the widow or orphans of any officer of the late Army, to the seven years half-pay of such officer, shall, from and after the passing this act, be suspended for and during the term of two years.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That any commissioned officer, not having received the commutation of half-pay, and any non-commissioned officer, soldier, or seaman, disabled in the actual service of the United States, during the late war, by wounds or other known cause; who did not desert from the said service, shall be entitled to be placed on the pension list of the United States during life or the continuance of such disability, and shall also be allowed such further sum for the arrears of pension, from the time of such disability, not exceeding the rate of the annual allowance, in consequence of his disability, as the Circuit Court of the district in which they respectively reside may think just: Provided, That in every such case the rules and regulations following shall be complied with; that is to say, first, every applicant shall attend the Court in person, except where it shall be certified by two magistrates that he is unable to do so, and shall produce to the Circuit Court the following proofs, to wit: a certificate from the commanding officer of the ship, regiment, corps, or company in which he served, setting forth his disability, and that he was thus disabled while in the service of the United States; or the affidavits of two credible witnesses to same effect; the affidavits of three reputable freeholders of the city, town, or county in which he resides, ascertaining of their own knowledge the mode of life, employment, labor, or means of support of such applicant, for the last twelve months. Secondly, the Circuit Court, upon receipt of the proofs aforesaid, shall forthwith proceed to examine into the nature of the wound, or other cause of disability of such applicant, and having ascertained the degree thereof, shall certify the same, and transmit the result of their inquiry, in case in their opinion the applicant should be put on the pension list, to the Secretary of War, together with their opinion in writing, what proportion of the monthly pay of such applicant will be equivalent to the degree of disability ascertained in manner aforesaid.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the clerk of the District Court, in each district, shall publish this act in such manner as the Judge of the District Court shall think effectual to give general information thereof to the people of the district, and shall give like information of the times and places of holding the Circuit Courts in such district. And in districts wherein a Circuit Court is not directed by law to be holden, the Judge of the District Court shall be, and he hereby is, authorized to exercise all the powers given by this act to the respective Circuit Courts. And it shall be the duty of the Judges of the Circuit Courts, respectively, during the term of two years from the passing of this act, to remain at the places where the said Courts shall be holden five days at the least, from the time of opening the sessions thereof, that persons disabled as aforesaid may have full opportunity to make their application for the relief proposed by this act.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War, upon receipt of the proofs, certificate, and opinion aforesaid, shall cause the same to be duly filed in his office, and place the name of such applicant on the pension list of the United States, in conformity thereto: Provided, always, That, in any case where the said Secretary shall have cause to suspect imposition or mistake, he shall have power to withhold the name of such applicant from the pension list, and make report of the same to Congress at their next session.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That all non-commissioned officers, soldiers, and seamen, disabled in the actual service of the United States, during the late war, whose disability and rate of allowance have been ascertained, pursuant to the regulations prescribed by the late Congress, and have not applied to be placed on the pension list until after the time limited by the act of Congress for that purpose was expired, shall now be placed on the pension list, and be entitled to demand and receive their respective pensions, according to the allowances ascertained as aforesaid, any thing in this act, or any act of the late Congress, to the contrary, notwithstanding.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the passing of this act, no sale, transfer, or mortgage of the whole, or any part of the pension or arrearages of pension, payable to any non-commissioned officer, soldier, or seaman, before the same shall become due, shall be valid. And every person claiming such pension or arrears of pension, or any part thereof, under power of attorney or substitution, shall, before the same is paid, make oath or affirmation before some Justice of the Peace of the place where the same is payable, that such power or substitution is not given by reason of any transfer of such pension, or arrears of pension, and any person who shall swear or affirm falsely in the premises, and be afterwards convicted, shall suffer as for wilful and corrupt perjury.

Approved, March 23, 1792.

An Act providing for the settlement of the claims of persons under particular circumstances, barred by the limitations heretofore established.

Be it enacted, &c., That the operation of the resolutions of the late Congress of the United States, passed on the second day of November, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-five, and the twenty-third day of July, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven, so far as they have barred, or may be construed to bar, the claims of any officer, soldier, artificer, sailor, or marine, of the late Army or Navy of the United States, for personal services rendered to the United States, in the Military or Naval Department, shall, from and after the passing of this act, be suspended for and during the term of two years. And that every such officer, soldier, artificer, sailor, and marine, having claims for services rendered to the United States in the Military or Naval Departments, who shall exhibit the same for liquidation at the Treasury of the United States, at any time during the said term of two years, shall be entitled to an adjustment and allowance thereof on the same principles, as if the same had been exhibited within the term prescribed by the aforesaid resolutions: of Congress: Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed to extend to claims for rations or subsistence money.

Acts of Congress

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That no balances hereafter to be certified as due from the United States, shall be registered in any other name than that of the original claimant, or of his heirs, executors, or administrators; and such balances shall be transferable only at the Treasury, by virtue of powers actually executed after such registry, expressing the sum to be transferred, and in pursuance of such general rules as have been, or shall be prescribed for that purpose.

Approved, March 27, 1792.

An Act for the relief of certain widows, orphans, invalids, and other persons.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Comptroller of the Treasury adjust the claims of the widows and orphans, respectively, as the case may be, of the late Colonel Owen Roberts, Captain William White, Lieutenant Colonel Bernard Elliott, Major Samuel Wise, Major Benjamin Huger, Lieutenant John Bush, and Major Charles Motte, deceased, all of whom were killed or died in the service of the United States, for the seven years' half-pay stipulated by the resolve of Congress of the twenty-fourth day of August, one thousand seven hundred and eighty; and that the Register of the Treasury do issue his certificates accordingly.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Department of War be, and he hereby is, required to place on the Invalid List, Timothy Mix, disabled in the late war, by the loss of his right hand, while in the service of the United States, at the rate of five dollars per month, to commence on the fourth day of February, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-three; that the said Secretary place on the Invalid List, Abel Turney, mariner, disabled while in the service of the United States, at the rate of one dollar per month, to commence on the first day of January, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-one.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the arrears of the said pensions be paid as the laws direct in similar cases.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Comptroller of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, required to adjust the accounts of Joseph Pannil, a Lieutenant Colonel in the service of the United States, as a deranged officer upon the principles of the act of the late Congress of the third of October, one thousand seven hundred and eighty, and to allow him the usual commutation of the half-pay for life of a Lieutenant Colonel; and that the Register of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, required to grant a certificate for the amount of the balance due to him; that the Comptroller adjust the account of the late Brigadier General De Haas, admitting to the credit of the said account such sums as, by evidence, shall appear to have been advanced for the public service, and which have been charged by the United States to the officers who have received the same for the public service; and that the said Register do grant a certificate for the balance due on such settlement; that the said Comptroller adjust the account of Thomas McIntire, a Captain in the service of the United States during the late war, and allow him the usual commutation of the half-pay for life of a Captain, and that the said Register grant a certificate for the amount thereof accordingly.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the Comptroller of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, required to adjust the account of Francis Suzor Debevere, a surgeon's mate in the service of the United States during the late war, and who remained in captivity to the end thereof, and that the Register of the Treasury be, and hereby is, required to grant a certificate for the amount which shall be found due for the services of the said Francis Suzor Debevere; that the said Comptroller adjust the account of Robert King, as a Lieutenant, deranged upon the principles of the act of the late Congress, passed the twenty-fourth day of November, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-eight, and that the said Register grant a certificate accordingly; that the Comptroller adjust the account of Lemuel Sherman, as a sailing-master of a galley on Lake Champlain, and as such taken prisoner; and that the said Register grant a certificate accordingly.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That there be granted to Nicholas Ferdinand Westfall, who left the British service, and joined the Army of the United States during the late war, one hundred acres of unappropriated land in the Western Territory of the United States, free of all charges, and also the sum of three hundred and thirty-six dollars, out of any money appropriated to the contingent charges of Government.

Approved, March 27, 1792.

An Act supplemental to the Act for making further and more effectual provision for the protection of the frontiers of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint such number of Brigadier Generals as may be conducive to the good of the public service: Provided, The whole number appointed, or to be appointed, shall not exceed four.

Approved, March 28, 1792.

An Act for finishing the Light-house on Bald Head, at the mouth of Cape Fear river, in the State of North Carolina.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury, under the direction of the President of the United States, be authorized, as soon as may be, to cause to be finished, in such manner as shall appear advisable, the light-house heretofore begun under the authority of the State of North Carolina, on Bald Head, at the mouth of Cape Fear river, in the said State; and that a sum, not exceeding four thousand dollars, be appropriated for the same, out of any moneys heretofore appropriated, which may remain unexpended, after satisfying the purposes for which they were appropriated, or out of any other moneys which may be in the Treasury, not subject to any prior appropriation.

Approved, April 2, 1792.

An Act establishing a Mint, and regulating the Coins of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That a Mint, for the purpose of national coinage, be, and the same is established, to be situate and carried on at the Seat of the Government of the United States, for the time being; and that for the well conducting of the business of the said Mint, there shall be the following officers and persons, namely: a Director, an Assayer, a Chief Coiner, an Engraver, a Treasurer.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Director of the Mint shall employ as many clerks, workmen, and servants, as he shall from time to time find necessary, subject to the approbation of the President of the United States.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the respective functions and duties of the officers above mentioned shall be as follows: The Director of the Mint shall have the chief management of the business thereof, and shall superintend all other officers and persons who shall be employed therein. The Assayer shall receive and give receipts for all metals which may lawfully be brought to the Mint to be coined; shall assay all such of them as may require it, and shall deliver them to the Chief Coiner, to be coined. The Chief Coiner shall cause to be coined all metals which shall be received by him for that purpose, according to such regulations as shall be prescribed by this or any future law. The Engraver shall sink and prepare the necessary dies for such coinage, with the proper devices and inscriptions; but it shall be lawful for the functions and duties of Chief Coiner and Engraver to be performed by one person. The Treasurer shall receive from the Chief Coiner all the coins which shall have been struck, and shall pay or deliver them to the persons respectively to whom the same ought to be paid or delivered; he shall, moreover, receive and safely keep all moneys which shall be for the use, maintenance, and support of the Mint, and shall disburse the same upon warrants signed by the Director.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That every officer and clerk of the said Mint shall, before he enters upon the execution of his office, take an oath or affirmation, before some Judge of the United States, faithfully and diligently to perform the duties thereof.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the said Assayer, Chief Coiner, and Treasurer, previously to entering upon the execution of their respective offices, shall each become bound to the United States of America, with one or more sureties, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury, in the sum of ten thousand dollars, with condition for the faithful and diligent performance of the duties of his office.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That there shall be allowed and paid, as compensations for their respective services: To the said Director, a yearly salary of two thousand dollars; to the said Assayer, a yearly salary of one thousand five hundred dollars; to the said Chief Coiner, a yearly salary of one thousand five hundred dollars; to the said Engraver, a yearly salary of one thousand two hundred dollars; to the said Treasurer, a yearly salary of one thousand two hundred dollars; to each clerk who may be employed, a yearly salary not exceeding five hundred dollars; and to the several subordinate workmen and servants, such wages and allowances as are customary and reasonable, according to their respective stations and occupations.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the accounts of the officers and persons employed in and about the said Mint, and for services performed in relation thereto, and all other accounts concerning the business and administration thereof, shall be adjusted and settled in the Treasury Department of the United States; and a quarter-yearly account of the receipts and disbursements of the said Mint, shall be rendered at the said Treasury for settlement, according to such forms and regulations as shall have been prescribed by that Department; and that once in each year a report of the transactions of the said Mint, accompanied by an abstract of the settlements which shall have been from time to time made, duly certified by the Comptroller of the Treasury, shall be laid before Congress for their information.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That in addition to the authority vested in the President of the United States, by a resolution of the last session, touching the engaging of artists and the procuring of apparatus for the said Mint, the President be authorized, and he is hereby authorized, to cause to be provided and put in proper condition such buildings, and in such manner, as shall appear to him requisite for the purpose of carrying on the business of the said Mint; and that as well the expenses which shall have been incurred pursuant to the said resolution, as those which may be incurred in providing and preparing the said buildings, and all other expenses which may hereafter accrue for the maintenance and support of the said Mint, and in carrying on the business thereof, over and above the sums which may be received by reason of the rate per centum for coinage hereinafter mentioned, shall be defrayed from the Treasury of the United States, out of any moneys which from time to time shall be therein, not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That there shall be from time to time struck and coined, at the said Mint, coins of gold, silver, and copper, of the following denominations, values, and descriptions, viz: Eagles, each to be of the value of ten dollars or units, and to contain two hundred and forty-seven grains and four eighths of a grain of pure, or two hundred and seventy grains of standard gold; Half Eagles, each to be of the value of five dollars, and to contain one hundred and twenty-three grains and six eighths of a grain of pure, or one hundred and thirty-five grains of standard gold; Quarter Eagles, each to be of the value of two dollars and a half dollar, and to contain sixty-one grains and seven eighths of a grain of pure, or sixty-seven grains and four eighths of a grain of standard gold; Dollars or Units, each to be of the value of a Spanish milled dollar, as the same is now current, and to contain three hundred and seventy-one grains and four sixteenth parts of a grain of pure, or four hundred and sixteen grains of standard silver; Half Dollars, each to be of half the value of the dollar or unit, and to contain one hundred and eighty-five grains and ten sixteenth parts of a grain of pure, or two hundred and eight grains of standard silver; Quarter Dollars, each to be of one fourth the value of the dollar or unit, and to contain ninety-two grains and thirteen sixteenth parts of a grain of pure, or one hundred and four grains of standard silver; Dimes, each to be of the value of one tenth of a dollar or unit, and to contain thirty-seven grains and two sixteenth parts of a grain of pure, or forty-one grains and three fifth parts of a grain of standard silver; Half Dimes, each to be of the value of one twentieth of a dollar, and to contain eighteen grains and nine sixteenth parts of a grain of pure, or twenty grains and four fifth parts of a grain of standard silver; Cents, each to be of the value of the one hundredth part of a dollar, and to contain eleven pennyweights of copper; Half Cents, each to be of the value of half a cent, and to contain five pennyweights and half a pennyweight of copper.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That upon the said coins respectively there shall be the following devices and legends, namely: Upon one side of each of the said coins there shall be an impression emblematic of Liberty, with an inscription of the word Liberty, and the year of the coinage; and upon the reverse of each of the gold and silver coins there shall be the figure or representation of an eagle, with this inscription, "United States of America;" and upon the reverse of each of the copper coins, there shall be an inscription which shall express the denomination of the piece, namely, cent or half cent, as the case may require.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That the proportional value of gold to silver, in all coins which shall by law be current as money within the United States, shall be as fifteen to one, according to quantity in weight, of pure gold or pure silver; that is to say, every fifteen pounds weight of pure silver shall be of equal value in all payments with one pound weight of pure gold, and so in proportion as to any greater or less quantities of the respective metals.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That the standard for all gold coins of the United States, shall be eleven parts fine, to one part alloy; and, accordingly, that eleven parts in twelve of the entire weight of each of the said coins shall consist of pure gold, and the remaining one twelfth part of alloy; and the said alloy shall be composed of silver and copper, in such proportions, not exceeding one half silver, as shall be found convenient, to be regulated by the Director of the Mint for the time being, with the approbation of the President of the United States, until further provision shall be made by law. And to the end that the necessary information may be had in order to the making of such further provision, it shall be the duty of the Director of the Mint, at the expiration of a year after commencing the operations of the said Mint, to report to Congress the practice thereof during the said year, touching the composition of the alloy of the said gold coins, the reasons for such practice, and the experiments and observations which shall have been made concerning the effects of different proportions of silver and copper in the said alloy.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That the standard for all silver coins of the United States, shall be one thousand four hundred and eighty-five parts fine, to one hundred and seventy-nine parts alloy; and accordingly, that one thousand four hundred and eighty-five parts in one thousand six hundred and sixty-four parts of the entire weight of each of the said coins, shall consist of pure silver, and the remaining one hundred and seventy-nine parts of alloy, which alloy shall be wholly of copper.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for any person or persons to bring to the said Mint gold and silver bullion, in order to their being coined; and that the bullion so brought shall be there assayed and coined as speedily as may be after the receipt thereof, and that free of expense to the person or persons by whom the same shall have been brought. And as soon as the said bullion shall have been coined, the person or persons by whom the same shall have been delivered shall, upon demand, receive in lieu thereof coins of the same species of bullion which shall have been so delivered, weight for weight, of the pure gold or pure silver therein contained: Provided, nevertheless, That it shall be at the mutual option of the party or parties bringing such bullion, and of the Director of the said Mint, to make an immediate exchange of coins for standard bullion, with a deduction of one half per cent. from the weight of the pure gold or pure silver contained in the said bullion, as an indemnification to the Mint for the time which will necessarily be required for coining the said bullion, and for the advance which shall have been so made in coins. And it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish the said Mint from time to time, whenever the state of the Treasury will admit thereof, with such sums as may be necessary for effecting the said exchanges, to be replaced as speedily as may be, out of the coins which shall have been made of the bullion for which the moneys so furnished shall have been exchanged; and the said deduction of one half per cent. shall constitute a fund towards defraying the expenses of the said Mint.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That the bullion which shall be brought as aforesaid to the Mint to be coined, shall be coined, and the equivalent thereof in coins rendered, if demanded, in the order in which the said bullion shall have been brought or delivered, giving priority according to priority of delivery only, and without preference to any person or persons; and if any preference shall be given, contrary to the direction aforesaid, the officer by whom such undue preference shall be given shall in each case forfeit and pay one thousand dollars, to be recovered with costs of suit. And to the end that it may be known if such preference shall at any time be given, the Assayer or officer to whom the said bullion shall be delivered to be coined, shall give to the person or persons bringing the same, a memorandum in writing, under his hand, denoting the weight, fineness, and value thereof, together with the day and order of its delivery into the Mint.

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That all the gold and silver coins which shall have been struck at, and issued from the said Mint, shall be a lawful tender in all payments whatsoever; those of full weight according to the respective values herein before declared, and those of less than full weight at values proportional to their respective weights.

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the respective officers of the said Mint, carefully and faithfully to use their best endeavors that all the gold and silver coins which shall be struck at the said Mint shall be, as nearly as may be, conformable to the several standards and weights aforesaid, and that the copper whereof the cents and half cents aforesaid may be composed, shall be of good quality.

SEC. 18. And the better to secure a due conformity of the said gold and silver coins to their respective standards, Be it further enacted, That from every separate mass of standard gold or silver, which shall be made into coins at the said Mint, there shall be taken, set apart by the Treasurer, and reserved in his custody, a certain number of pieces, not less than three; and that once in every year the pieces so set apart and reserved shall be assayed, under the inspection of the Chief Justice of the United States, the Secretary and Comptroller of the Treasury, the Secretary for the Department of State, and the Attorney General of the United States, (who are hereby required to attend for that purpose at the said Mint, on the last Monday in July in each year,) or under the inspection of any three of them, in such manner as they or a majority of them shall direct, and in the presence of the Director, Assayer, and Chief Coiner of the said Mint; and if it shall be found that the gold and silver so assayed shall not be inferior to their respective standards herein before declared more than one part in one hundred and forty-four parts, the officer or officers of the said Mint whom it may concern shall be held excusable, but if any greater inferiority shall appear, it shall be certified to the President of the United States, and the said officer or officers shall be deemed disqualified to hold their respective offices.

SEC. 19. And be it further enacted, That if any of the gold or silver coins which shall be struck or coined at the said Mint, shall be debased or made worse, as to the proportion of fine gold or fine silver therein contained, or shall be of less weight or value than the same ought to be, pursuant to the directions of this act, through the default or with the connivance of any of the officers or persons who shall be employed at the said Mint, for the purpose of profit or gain, or otherwise with a fraudulent intent, and if any of the said officers or persons shall embezzle any of the metals which shall at any time be committed to their charge for the purpose of being coined, or any of the coins which shall be struck or coined at the said Mint, every such officer or person who shall commit any or either of the said offences, shall be deemed guilty of felony, and shall suffer death.

SEC. 20. And be it further enacted, That the money of account of the United States shall be expressed in dollars or units, dimes or tenths, cents or hundredths, and mills or thousandths; a dime being the tenth part of a dollar, a cent the hundredth part of a dollar, a mill the thousandth part of a dollar; and that all accounts in the public offices, and all proceedings in the Courts of the United States shall be kept and had in conformity to this regulation.

Approved, April 2, 1792.

An Act supplementary to the act for the establishment and support of light-houses, beacons, buoys, and public piers.

Be it enacted, &c., That all expenses which shall accrue from the first day of July next, inclusively, for the necessary support, maintenance, and repairs of all light-houses, beacons, buoys, the stakeage of channels on the sea-coast, and public piers, shall continue to be defrayed by the United States, until the first day of July, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, notwithstanding such light-houses, beacons, or public piers, with the lands and tenements thereunto belonging, and the jurisdiction of the same, shall not in the mean time be ceded to or vested in the United States by the State or States respectively in which the same may be, and that the said time be further allowed to the States respectively to make such cession.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to cause to be provided, erected, and placed, a floating beacon, and as many buoys as may be necessary for the security of navigation, at and near the entrance of the harbor of Charleston, in the State of South Carolina; and also, to have affixed three floating beacons in the Bay of Chesapeake—one at the north end of Willoughby's Spit, another at the tail of the Horse Shoe, and the third on the shoalest place of the Middle Ground.

Approved, April 12, 1792.

An Act to erect a light-house on Montauk Point, in the State of New York.

Be it enacted, &c., That, as soon as the jurisdiction of such land on Montauk Point, in the State of New York, as the President of the United States shall deem sufficient and most proper for the convenience and accommodation of a light-house, shall have been ceded to the United States, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to provide, by contract, which shall be approved by the

Acts of Congress.

President of the United States, for building a light-house thereon, and for furnishing the same with all necessary supplies, and also to agree for the salaries or wages of the person or persons who may be appointed by the President for the superintendence and care of the same; and the President is hereby authorized to make the said appointments; that the number and disposition of the lights in said light-house shall be such as may tend to distinguish it, from others, and, as far as is practicable, prevent mistakes.

Approved, April 12, 1792.

An Act for ascertaining the bounds of a tract of land purchased by John Cleves Symmes.

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized, at the request of John Cleves Symmes, or his agent or agents, to alter the contract made between the late Board of Treasury and the said John Cleves Symmes for the sale of a tract of land of one million of acres, in such manner that the said tract may extend from the mouth of the Great Miami to the mouth of the Little Miami, and be bounded by the river Ohio on the south, by the Great Miami on the west, by the Little Miami on the east, and by a parallel of latitude on the north, extending from the Great Miami to the Little Miami, so as to comprehend the proposed quantity of one million of acres: Provided, That the northern limits of the said tract shall not interfere with the boundary-line established by the treaty of Fort Harmar, between the United States and the Indian nations: And provided, also, That the President reserve to the United States such lands at and near Fort Washington as he may think necessary for the accommodation of a garrison at that fort.

Approved, April 12, 1792.

An Act for fixing the compensations of the Doorkeepers of the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress.

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the termination of the present session of Congress, the Doorkeepers of the Senate and House of Representatives shall each be allowed a salary of five hundred dollars per annum, in full compensation for their services in the said offices; and that the Assistant Doorkeeper to each House shall be allowed, in full compensation for all his services, the sum of four hundred and fifty dollars per annum; and it shall be the duty of the said Doorkeepers to do the usual services pertaining to their respective offices during the session of Congress, and, in the recess, under the direction of the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives, to take care of the apartments occupied by the respective Houses, and provide fuel and other accommodations for their subsequent session; and the said compensation shall be certified and paid in like manner as is provided by law for the other officers of the Senate and House of Representatives.

Approved, April 12, 1792.

An Act for altering the times for holding the Circuit Courts, in certain districts of the United States, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the passing of this act, the Circuit Courts in the districts of North Carolina and Georgia shall be held as follows, to wit: In the district of North Carolina, on the first day of June and the thirtieth day of November, at Newbern, in the present and each succeeding year; and all writs and recognizances returnable, and suits and other proceedings that were continued to the Circuit Court for the district of North Carolina on the eighteenth day of June next, shall now be returned and held continued to the same Court on the first day of June next. In the district of Georgia, on the twenty-fifth day of April, at Savannah, and on the eighth day of November, at Augusta, in the present and each succeeding year, except when any of those days shall happen on Sunday, in which case, the Court shall be held on the Monday following.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the sessions of the Circuit Courts in the Eastern Circuit shall, in the present and every succeeding year, commence at the times following; that is to say: In New York district on the fifth day of April and the fifth day of September; in Connecticut district, on the twenty-fifth day of April and the twenty-fifth day of September; in Massachusetts district, on the twelfth day of May and twelfth day of October; in New Hampshire district, on the twenty-fourth day of May and the twenty-fourth day of October; and in Rhode Island district, on the seventh day of June and the seventh day of November, except when any of those days shall happen on a Sunday, and then the session shall commence on the next day following. And the sessions of the Circuit Court shall be held in the district of Virginia, at the city of Richmond only; in New Hampshire district, at Portsmouth and Exeter alternately, beginning at the first; in Massachusetts district, at Boston; in Rhode Island district, at Newport and Providence alternately, beginning at the first; in Connecticut district, at Hartford and New Haven alternately, beginning at the last; and in New York district, at the city of New York only.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That, at each session of the Supreme Court of the United States, or as soon after as may be, the Judges of the Supreme Court attending at such session shall, in writing, subscribed with their names, (which writing shall be lodged with the Clerk of the Supreme Court, and safely kept in his office,) assign to the said Judges, respectively, the circuits which they are to attend at the ensuing sessions of the Circuit Courts; which assignment shall be made in such manner that no Judge, unless by his own consent, shall have assigned to him any circuit which he has already attended, until the same has been afterwards attended by every other of the said Judges: Provided, always, That if the public service or the convenience of the Judges shall at any time, in their opinion, require a different arrangement, the same may take place, with the consent of any four of the Judges of the Supreme Court.

Acts of Congress.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the District Court for the district of Maine, which, by the act entitled "An act to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States," is holden on the first Tuesday of June, annually, at Portland, shall, from and after the passing of this act, be holden on the third Tuesday of June, annually, anything in the act aforesaid to the contrary notwithstanding; and all writs and recognizances returnable, and suits and other proceedings that were continued to the District Court for the district of Maine on the first Tuesday of June next, shall now be returnable and held continued to the same Court on the third Tuesday of June next.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the stated District Courts for the district of North Carolina shall, in future, be held at the towns of Newbern, Wilmington, and Edenton, in rotation, beginning at Newbern, as the said Court now stands adjourned.

Approved, April 13, 1792.

An Act to compensate the Corporation of Trustees of the Public Grammar School and Academy of Wilmington, in the State of Delaware, for the occupation of, and damages done to, the said school during the late war.

Be it enacted, &c., That, as an indemnification to the Corporation of Trustees of the Public Grammar School and Academy of Wilmington, in the State of Delaware, for the use and occupation of the said school, and the damages done to the same by the troops of the United States, during the late war, there be granted to the said Corporation of Trustees a reasonable compensation, payable out of any unappropriated money in the Treasury of the United States, which compensation shall be ascertained by the accounting officers of the Treasury.

Approved, April 13, 1792.

An Act for apportioning Representatives among the several States according to the First Enumeration.

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the third day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, the House of Representatives shall be composed of members elected agreeably to a ratio of one member for every thirty-three thousand persons in each State, computed according to the rule prescribed by the Constitution, that is to say: Within the State of New Hampshire, four; within the State of Massachusetts, fourteen; within the State of Vermont, two; within the State of Rhode Island, two; within the State of Connecticut, seven; within the State of New York, ten; within the State of New Jersey, five; within the State of Pennsylvania, thirteen; within the State of Delaware, one; within the State of Maryland, eight; within the State of Virginia, nineteen; within the State of Kentucky, two; within the State of North Carolina, ten; within the State of South Carolina, six; and within the State of Georgia, two members.

Approved, April 14, 1792.

An Act concerning Consuls and Vice Consuls.

For carrying into full effect the Convention between the King of the French and the United States of America, entered into for the purpose of defining and establishing the functions and privileges of their respective Consuls and Vice Consuls—

Be it enacted, &c., That where, in the seventh article of the said Convention, it is agreed that, when there shall be no Consul or Vice Consul of the King of the French, to attend to the saving of the wreck of any French vessels stranded on the coasts of the United States, or that the residence of the said Consul or Vice Consul (he not being at the place of the wreck) shall be more distant from the said place than that of the competent Judge of the country, the latter shall immediately proceed to perform the office therein prescribed; the District Judge of the United States of the district in which the wreck shall happen, shall proceed therein according to the tenor of the said article; and, in such cases, it shall be the duty of the officers of the customs within whose districts such wrecks shall happen, to give notice thereof, as soon as may be, to the said Judge, and to aid and assist him to perform the duties hereby assigned to him. The District Judges of the United States shall also, within their respective districts, be the competent judges for the purposes expressed in the ninth article of the said Convention; and it shall be incumbent on them to give aid to the Consuls and Vice Consuls of the King of the French, in arresting and securing deserters from vessels of the French nation, according to the tenor of the said article. And where, by any article of the said Convention, the Consuls and Vice Consuls of the King of the French are entitled to the aid of the competent executive officers of the country, in the execution of any precept, the Marshals of the United States and their deputies shall, within their respective districts, be the competent officers, and shall give their aid according to the tenor of the stipulations. And whenever commitments to the jails of the country shall become necessary, in pursuance of any stipulation of the said Convention, they shall be to such jails within the respective Districts as other commitments under the authority of the United States are, by law, made.

And for the direction of the Consuls and Vice Consuls of the United States, in certain cases—

SEC. 2. Be it enacted by the authority aforesaid, That they shall have right, in the ports or places to which they are or may be severally appointed, of receiving the protests or declarations which such captains, masters, crews, passengers, and merchants as are citizens of the United States, may respectively choose to make there; and also such as any foreigner may choose to make before them relative to the personal interest of any citizens of the United States; and the copies of the said acts, duly authenticated by the said Consuls or Vice Consuls, under the seal of their consulates, respectively, shall receive faith in law equally as their originals would in all Courts in the United States. It shall be their duty, where the laws of the country permit, to take possession of the personal estate left by any citizen of the United States, other than seamen belonging to any ship or vessel, who shall die within their Consulate, leaving there no legal representative, partner in trade, or trustee by him appointed to take care of his effects; they shall inventory the same, with the assistance of two merchants of the United States, or, for want of them, of any others, at their choice; shall collect the debts due to the deceased in the country where he died, and pay the debts due from his estate which he shall have there contracted; shall sell at auction, after reasonable public notice, such part of the estate as shall be of a perishable nature, and such further part, if any, as shall be necessary for the payment of his debts, and, at the expiration of one year from his decease, the residue; and the balance of the estate they shall transmit to the Treasury of the United States, to be holden in trust for the legal claimants; but, if, at any time before such transmission, the legal representative of the deceased shall appear and demand his effects in their hands, they shall deliver them up, being paid their fees, and shall cease their proceedings. For the information of the representative of the deceased, it shall be the duty of the Consul or Vice Consul authorized to proceed, as aforesaid, in the settlement of his estate, immediately to notify his death in one of the gazettes published in the Consulate, and also to the Secretary of State, that the same may be notified in the State to which the deceased shall belong; and he shall also, as soon as may be, transmit to the Secretary of State an inventory of the effects of the deceased, taken as before directed.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the said Consuls and Vice Consuls, in cases where ships or vessels of the United States shall be stranded on the coasts of their Consulates, respectively, shall, as far as the laws of the country will permit, take proper measures as well for the purpose of saving the said ships or vessels, their cargoes, and appurtenances, as for storing and securing the effects and merchandise saved, and for taking an inventory or inventories thereof; and the merchandise and effects saved, with the inventory or inventories thereof, taken as aforesaid, shall, after deducting therefrom the expense, be delivered to the owner or owners: Provided, That no Consul or Vice Consul shall have authority to take possession of any such goods, wares, merchandise, or other property, when the master, owner, or consignee thereof is present or capable of taking possession of the same.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for every Consul and Vice Consul of the United States to take and receive the following fees of office for the services which he shall have performed: For authenticating under the Consular seal every protest, declaration, deposition, or other act, which such captains, masters, mariners, seamen, passengers, merchants, or others, as are citizens of the United States, may respectively choose to make, the sum of two dollars; for the taking into possession, inventorying, selling, and finally settling and paying, or transmitting as aforesaid, the balance due on the personal estate left by any citizen of the United States who shall die within the limits of his Consulate, five per centum on the gross amount of such estate; for taking into possession and otherwise proceeding on any such estate which shall be delivered over to the legal representative before a final settlement of the same, as is hereinbefore directed, two-and-a-half per centum on such part delivered over as shall not be in money, and five per centum on the gross amount of the residue. And it shall be the duty of the Consuls and Vice Consuls of the United States to give receipts for all fees which they shall receive by virtue of this act, expressing the particular services for which they are paid.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That, in case it be found necessary for the interest of the United States that a Consul or Consuls be appointed to reside on the coast of Barbary, the President be authorized to allow an annual salary, not exceeding two thousand dollars to each person so to be appointed: Provided, That such salary be not allowed to more than one Consul for any one of the States on the said coast.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That every Consul and Vice Consul shall, before they enter on the execution of their trusts, or if already in the execution of the same, within one year from the passing of this act, or if resident in Asia, within two years, give bond, with such sureties as shall be approved by the Secretary of State, in a sum of not less than two thousand nor more than ten thousand dollars, conditioned for the true and faithful discharge of the duties of his office according to law, and also for truly accounting for all moneys, goods, and effects, which may come into his possession by virtue of this act; and the said bond shall be lodged in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That, to prevent the mariners and seamen employed in vessels belonging to citizens of the United States, in cases of shipwreck, sickness, or captivity, from suffering in foreign ports, it shall be the duty of the Consuls and Vice Consuls, respectively, from time to time, to provide for them in the most reasonable manner, at the expense of the United States, subject to such instructions as the Secretary of State shall give, and not exceeding an allowance of twelve cents to a man per diem. And all masters and commanders of vessels belonging to citizens of the United States, and bound to some port of the same, are hereby required and enjoined to take such mariners or seamen on board of their ships or vessels, at the request of the said Consuls or Vice Consuls, respectively, and to transport them to the port in the United States to which such ships or vessels may be bound, free of costs or charge; but that the said mariners or seamen shall, if able, be bound to do duty on board such ships or vessels, according to their several abilities: Provided, That no master or captain of any ship or vessel shall be obliged to take a greater number than two men to every one hundred tons burden of the said ship or vessel, on any one voyage; and if any such captain or master shall refuse the same, on the request or order of the Consul or Vice Consul, such captain or master shall forfeit and pay the sum of thirty dollars for each mariner or seaman so refused, to be recovered for the benefit of the United States by the said Consul or Vice Consul, in his own name, in any Court of competent jurisdiction.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That, where a ship or vessel, belonging to citizens of the United States, is sold in a foreign port or place, the master, unless the crew are liable by their contract, or do consent to be discharged there, shall send them back to the State where they entered on board, or furnish them with means sufficient for their return, to be ascertained by the Consul or Vice Consul of the United States having jurisdiction of the port or place; and, in case of the master's refusal, the said Consul or Vice Consul may (if the laws of the land permit it) cause his ship, goods, and person, to be arrested and held until he shall comply with his duty herein.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That the specification of certain powers and duties, in this act, to be exercised or performed by the Consuls and Vice Consuls of the United States, shall not be construed to the exclusion of others resulting from the nature of their appointments, or any Treaty or Convention under which they may act.

Approved, April 14, 1792.

An Act authorizing the grant and conveyance of certain lands to the Ohio Company of Associates.

Be it enacted, &c., That a certain contract expressed in an indenture executed on the twenty-seventh day of October, in the year one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven, between the then Board of Treasury for the United States of America, of the one part, and Manasseh Cutler and Winthrop Sargent, as agents for the Directors of the Ohio Company of Associates, of the other part, so far as the same respects the following described tract of land, that is to say: Beginning at a station where the western boundary line of the seventh range of townships (laid out by the authority of the United States in Congress assembled) intersects the river Ohio; thence extending along that river southwesterly to a place where the western boundary line of the fifteenth range of townships (when laid out agreeably to the land ordinance passed the twentieth day of May, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-five) would touch the said river; thence running northerly on the said western bounds of the said fifteenth range of townships, till a line drawn due east to the western boundary line of the said seventh range of townships, will comprehend, with the other lines of this tract, seven hundred and fifty thousand acres of land, besides the several lots and parcels of land in the said contract reserved or appropriated to particular purposes; thence running east to the western boundary line of the said seventh range of townships; and thence along the said line to the place of beginning, be, and the same is hereby, confirmed; and that the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized and empowered to issue letters patent in the name and under the seal of the United States, thereby granting and conveying to Rufus Putnam, Manasseh Cutler, Robert Oliver, and Griffin Green, and to their heirs and assigns, in fee simple, the said described tract of land, with the reservations in the said indenture expressed, in trust for the persons composing the said Ohio Company of Associates, according to their several rights and interests, and for their heirs and assigns, as tenants in common.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President be, and he hereby is, further authorized and empowered, by letters patent as aforesaid, to grant and convey to the said Rufus Putnam, Manasseh Cutler, Robert Oliver, and Griffin Green, and to their heirs and assigns, in trust, for the uses above expressed, one other tract of two hundred and fourteen thousand two hundred and eighty-five acres of land: Provided, That the said Rufus Putnam, Manasseh Cutler, Robert Oliver, and Griffin Green, or either of them, shall deliver to the Secretary of the Treasury, within six months, warrants which issued for Army bounty rights sufficient for that purpose, according to the provision of a resolve of Congress of the twenty-third day of July, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the President be, and he hereby is, further authorized and empowered, by letters patent as aforesaid, to grant and convey to the said Rufus Putnam, Manasseh Cutler, Robert Oliver, and Griffin Green, and to their heirs and assigns, in fee simple, in trust for the uses above expressed, a further quantity of one hundred thousand acres of land: Provided, always, nevertheless, That the said grant of one hundred thousand acres shall be made on the express condition of becoming void for such part thereof as the said Company shall not have, within five years from the passing of this act, conveyed in fee simple, as a bounty, and free of expense, in tracts of one hundred acres, to each male person not less than eighteen years of age, being an actual settler at the time of such conveyance.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the said quantities of two hundred and fourteen thousand two hundred and eighty-five acres, and of one hundred thousand acres, shall be located within the limits of the tract of one million five hundred thousand acres of land, described in the indenture aforesaid, and adjoining to the tract of land described in the first section of this act, and in such form as the President, in the letters patent, shall prescribe for that purpose.

Approved, April 21, 1792.

An Act for raising a further Sum of Money for the Protection of the Frontiers, and for other purposes therein mentioned.

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the last day of June next, the duties now in force upon the articles hereinafter enumerated and described, at their importation into the United States, shall cease, and that in lieu thereof, there shall be thenceforth laid, levied, and collected upon the said articles, at their said importation, the several and respective rates or duties following, viz:

All other wines, forty per centum ad valorem, provided that the amount of the duty thereupon shall, in no case, exceed thirty cents per gallon.

Spirits, distilled wholly or, chiefly from grain: Of the first class of proof, per gallon, twenty-eight cents; of the second class of proof, per gallon, twenty-nine cents; of the third class of proof, per gallon, thirty-one cents; of the fourth class of proof, per gallon, thirty-four cents; of the fifth class of proof, per gallon, forty cents; of the sixth class of proof, per gallon, fifty cents.

All other distilled spirits: Of the second class of proof and under, per gallon, twenty-five cents; of the third class of proof and under, per gallon, twenty-eight cents; of the fourth class of proof and under, per gallon, thirty-two cents; of the fifth class of proof and under, per gallon, thirty-eight cents; of the sixth class of proof and under, per gallon, forty-six cents. Which several classes or denominations of proof shall be deemed and taken to correspond with those mentioned in the "act repealing, after the last day of June next, the duties heretofore laid upon distilled spirits imported from abroad, and laying others in their stead; and also upon spirits distilled within the United States and for appropriating the same."

Beer, ale, and porter, per gallon, eight cents; steel, per hundred weight, one hundred cents; nails, per pound, two cents; cocoa, per pound, two cents; chocolate, per pound, three cents; playing cards, per pack, twenty-five cents; shoes and slippers of silk, twenty cents; all other shoes and slippers for men and women, clogs and golo-shoes, ten cents; all other shoes and slippers for children, seven cents; on hemp, for every one hundred and twelve pounds, one hundred cents; on cables, for every one hundred and twelve pounds, one hundred and eighty cents; on tarred cordage, for every one hundred and twelve pounds, one hundred and eighty cents; on untarred cordage and yarn, for every one hundred and twelve pounds, two hundred and twenty-five cents; on twine and packthread, for every one hundred and twelve pounds, four hundred cents; on coal, per bushel, four and a half cents; on salts, called Glauber salts, for every one hundred and twelve pounds, two hundred cents.

Articles ad valorem: China wares, looking glass, window and other glass, and all manufactures of glass, black quart bottles excepted; muskets, pistols, and other fire-arms; swords, cutlasses, hangars and other side arms; starch; hair powder; wafers; glue; laces, lines, fringes, tassels, and trimmings commonly used by upholsterers, coach-makers and saddlers, and paper-hangings; painters' colors, whether dry or ground in oil—fifteen per centum ad valorem—cast, slit, and rolled iron, and, generally, all manufactures of iron, steel, tin, pewter, copper, brass, or of which either of these metals is the article of chief value, not being otherwise particularly enumerated, brass and iron wire excepted; cabinet wares; leather tanned and tawed, and all manufactures of leather, or of which leather is the article of chief value, not otherwise particularly enumerated; medicinal drugs, except those commonly used in dyeing; hats, caps, and bonnets of every sort; gloves and mittens; stockings; millinery ready made; artificial flowers, feathers and other ornaments for women's head-dresses; fans; dolls, dressed and undressed; toys; buttons of every kind; carpets and carpeting, mats and floor cloths; sail cloth; sheathing and cartridge paper; all powders, pastes, balls, balsams, ointments, oils, waters, washes, tinctures, essences, or other preparations or compositions commonly called sweet scents, odors, perfumes, or cosmetics; all dentifrice-powders, tinctures, preparations, or compositions whatsoever, for the teeth or gums—ten per centum ad valorem.

SEC. 2. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That all articles which are excepted and exempted from duty by the "act making further provision for the payment of the Debts of the United States," shall continue to be so excepted and exempted; and that, to the articles heretofore made free from duty, the following shall be added, namely: copper in pigs and bars, lapis calaminaris, unmanufactured wool, wood, and sulphur.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the last day of June next, in computing the duty heretofore laid upon salt, a bushel of salt shall be deemed not to exceed the weight of fifty-six pounds avoirdupois; and as often as the actual bushel of salt shall exceed the said weight, such salt shall be charged in the proportion of the present rate of duty per bushel for every fifty-six pounds of its actual weight.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That, after the said last of June next, there shall be laid, levied, and collected, in addition to the present duty thereupon, a duty of two and a half per centum ad valorem, upon all goods, wares, and merchandises, not above enumerated or described, which, if imported in ships or vessels of the United States, are now chargeable with a duty of five per centum ad valorem.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the addition of ten per centum made by the second section of the "act making further provision for the Debts of the United States," to the rates of duties on goods, wares and merchandise, imported in ships or vessels not of the United States, shall continue in full force and operation, after the said last day of June next, in relation to the articles herein before enumerated and described.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That all drawbacks and allowances authorized by the act aforesaid, which have not been heretofore abolished or changed, shall continue to operate, as in the said act prescribed in relation to the several duties which shall become payable by virtue of this act; and that, in addition thereto, there shall be allowed and paid upon provisions salted within the United States, except upon dried fish, upon the exportation thereof to any foreign port or place, as follows, to wit: On pickled fish, at the rate of eight cents per barrel, and on other provisions at the rate of five cents per barrel; and from and after the first day of January next, there shall be an addition of twenty per centum to the allowances, respectively granted to ships or vessels employed in the Bank or other cod-fisheries, and in the terms provided by an act, entitled "An act concerning certain fisheries of the United States, and for the regulation and government of the fishermen employed therein," and during the continuance of the said act.

Acts of Congress.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That all duties, drawbacks, and allowances, which, by virtue of this act, shall be payable or allowable on any specific quantity of goods, wares, and merchandise, shall be deemed to apply, in proportion, to any quantity more or less than such specific quantity.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the term of credit for the payment of duties on salt shall be nine months, and on all articles, the produce of the West Indies, salt excepted, where the amount of the duty to be paid by one person or co-partnership shall exceed fifty dollars, shall be four months, and that the duties on all other articles, except wines and teas, which shall be imported after the last day of June next, shall be payable, one half in six, one quarter in nine, and the other quarter in twelve calendar months, from the time of each respective importation.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the act, entitled, "An act to provide more effectually for the collection of duties imposed by law on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships and vessels," and as touching the duties on distilled spirits only, the act entitled "An act repealing, after the last day of June next, the duties heretofore laid upon distilled spirits imported from abroad, and laying others in their stead; and also upon spirits distilled within the United States, and for appropriating the same," shall extend to, and be in full force for the collection of the duties specified and laid in and by this act, and generally for the execution thereof, as fully and effectually, as if every regulation, restriction, penalty, provision, clause, matter, and thing therein contained, had been herein inserted and re-enacted.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That all wines which, after the said last day of June next, shall be imported into the United States, shall be landed under the care of the inspector of the port where the same shall be landed, and for that purpose, every permit for landing any wines, which shall be granted by a collector, shall, prior to such landing, be produced to the said inspector who, by endorsement thereupon under his hand, shall signify the production thereof to him, and the time when, after which, and not otherwise, on pain of forfeiture, it shall be lawful to land the said wines. And the said inspector shall make an entry of all such permits, and of the contents thereof, and each pipe, butt, hogshead, cask, case, box, or package whatsoever, containing such wines, shall be marked by the officer under whose immediate inspection the same shall be landed, in legible and durable characters, with progressive numbers, the name of the said officer, and the quality or kind of wine, as herein before enumerated and distinguished. And the said officer shall grant a certificate for each such pipe, butt, hogshead, cask, case, box, or package, specifying therein the name or names of the importer or importers, the ship or vessel in which the same shall have been imported, and the number thereof, to accompany the same wheresoever it shall be sent. And if any pipe, butt, hogshead, cask, case, box, or package, containing wine, shall be found without such marks and certificates, the same shall be liable to be seized, and the want of such marks and certificates shall be presumptive evidence that such wine was unlawfully imported and landed.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That every person who shall have in his or her possession wines which are intended for sale, in quantity exceeding one hundred and fifty gallons, shall, prior to the said last day of June next, make entry thereof, in writing, at some office of inspection in the city, town, or county where he or she shall reside, specifying and describing the casks, cases, boxes, and other packages containing the same; and the kinds, qualities, and quantities thereof, and where and in whose possession they are; and the officer of inspection, at whose office such entry may be made, shall, as soon as may be thereafter, visit and inspect, or cause to be visited and inspected, the wines so reported; and shall mark, or cause to be marked, the casks, cases, boxes, and packages, containing the same, with progressive numbers, with the name of the person to whom the same may belong, the kind or kinds thereof, and the words "Old Stock," and shall grant a certificate for each cask, case, box, or package, containing such wine, describing therein the said cask, case, box, or package, and the wines therein contained, which certificate shall accompany the same, wherever it may be sent. And if any person who may have wines in his or her possession for sale, shall not, prior to the said last day of June next, make entry thereof, as above directed, he or she, for such omission or neglect, shall forfeit and pay the value of the wine omitted to be entered, to be recovered with costs of suit, for the benefit of any person who shall give information thereof; and the wines, so omitted to be entered, shall be forfeited.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the last day of December next, no beer, ale, or porter, shall be brought into the United States, from any foreign port or place, except in casks or vessels, the capacity whereof shall not be less than forty gallons, or in packages containing not less than six dozen of bottles, on pain of forfeiture of the said beer, ale, or porter, and of the ship or vessel, in which the same shall be brought.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That the several and respective duties, aforesaid, except that mentioned in the fourth section of this act, shall continue to be levied, collected, and paid, until the debts and purposes, to and for which the duties, hereby directed to cease after the last day of June next, were pledged and appropriated, shall have been fully paid and satisfied; and that so much thereof, as may be necessary, shall be, and are hereby pledged and appropriated, in the same manner, for the same purposes, and with the same force and effect, as those, which are hereby directed to cease after the said last day of June next; and that so much of the residue thereof, as may be necessary, shall be, and are hereby appropriated for making good deficiencies in any funds which may have been designated for satisfying grants and appropriations heretofore made.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That the additional duty of two-and-a-half per centum ad valorem, specified in the fourth section of this act, shall continue for the term of two years, from the commencement thereof, and no longer.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That the sum of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, out of the surplus of the duties, which accrued to the end of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, and a further sum of five hundred and twenty-three thousand five hundred dollars, out of the surplus of the duties hereby established as the same shall accrue, making, together, the sum of six hundred and seventy-three thousand five hundred dollars, shall be, and are hereby appropriated and applied, in addition to any former appropriation for the Military Establishment of the United States, towards carrying into execution the act, entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the protection of the frontiers of the United States."

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be empowered to take on loan, on account of the United States, from the President, Directors, and Company of the Bank of the United States, who are hereby authorized and empowered to lend the same, or from any other body politic or corporate within the United States, or from any other person or persons, the whole or any part of the aforesaid sum of five hundred and twenty-three thousand five hundred dollars, to be applied to the purpose, to and for which the same is above appropriated, and to be reimbursed out of the aforesaid surplus of the duties by this act imposed, which surplus is, accordingly, appropriated to the said reimbursement: Provided, That the rate of interest of such loans shall not exceed five per centum per annum, and that the principal thereof may be reimbursed at pleasure of the United States.

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That so much of the act, entitled, "An act to provide more effectually for the collection of duties imposed by law on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels," as hath rated the livre tournois of France at eighteen-and-a-half cents, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

SEC. 18. And be it enacted and declared, That if the principal, in any bond which shall be given to the United States, for duties on goods, wares, and merchandise imported, shall be insolvent; or if such principal being dead, his or her estate and effects, which shall have come to the hands of his or her executors, or administrators, shall be insufficient for the payment of his or her debts; and if in either of the said cases any surety in the said bond, or the executors and administrators of such surety, shall pay to the United States the moneys thereupon due, such surety, his or her executors or administrators shall have and enjoy the like advantage, priority, and preference, for the recovery and receipt of the said moneys out of the estate and effects of such insolvent or deceased principal, as are reserved and secured to the United States, by the forty-fourth section of the act, entitled "An act to provide more effectually for the collection of duties imposed by law on goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels," and shall and may bring and maintain a suit upon the said bond, in law or equity, in his, her, or their own name or names, for the recovery of the moneys which shall have been paid thereupon. And it is further declared, That the cases of insolvency in the said forty-fourth section mentioned, shall be deemed to extend, as well to cases in which a debtor, not having sufficient property to pay all his or her debts, shall have made a voluntary assignment thereof, for the benefit of his or her creditors, or in which the estate and effects of an absconding, concealed, or absent debtor, shall have been attached by process of law, as to cases in which an act of legal bankruptcy shall have been committed.

SEC. 19. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and hereby is, authorized to appoint such place within the district of Vermont to be the port of entry and delivery within the said district, as he may deem expedient, anything in the act, entitled "An act giving effect to the laws of the United States within the State of Vermont," to the contrary notwithstanding.

Approved, May 2, 1792.

An Act to provide for calling forth the Militia to execute the Laws of the Union, to suppress insurrections, and repel invasions.

Be it enacted, &c., That whenever the United States shall be invaded, or be in imminent danger of invasion from any foreign nation or Indian tribe, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to call forth such number of the militia of the State or States most convenient to the place of danger or scene of action as he may judge necessary to repel such invasion, and to issue his orders for that purpose to such officer or officers of the militia as he shall think proper; and, in case of an insurrection in any State against the Government thereof, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, on application of the Legislature of such State, or of the Executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) to call forth such number of the militia of any other State or States as may be applied for, or as he may judge sufficient to suppress such insurrection.

Acts of Congress.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That whenever the laws of the United States shall be opposed, or the execution thereof obstructed, in any State, by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the marshals by this act, the same being notified to the President of the United States by an Associate Justice or the District Judge, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to call forth the militia of such State to suppress such combinations, and to cause the laws to be duly executed; and if the militia of a State where such combinations may happen shall refuse, or be insufficient to suppress the same, it shall be lawful for the President, if the Legislature of the United States be not in session, to call forth and employ such numbers of the militia of any other State or States most convenient thereto as may be necessary; and the use of militia so to be called forth may be continued, if necessary, until the expiration of thirty days after the commencement of the ensuing session.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That whenever it may be necessary, in the judgment of the President, to use the military force hereby directed to be called forth, the President shall forthwith, and previous thereto, by proclamation, command such insurgents to disperse, and retire peaceably to their respective abodes within a limited time.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the militia employed in the service of the United States shall receive the same pay and allowances as the troops of the United States who may be in service at the same time, or who were last in service, and shall be subject to the same rules and articles of war; and that no officer, non-commissioned officer, or private of the militia, shall be compelled to serve more than three months in any one year, nor more than in due rotation with every other able-bodied man of the same rank in the battalion to which he belongs.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That every officer, non-commissioned officer, or private of the militia, who shall fail to obey the orders of the President of the United States, in any of the cases before recited, shall forfeit a sum not exceeding one year's pay and not less than one month's pay, to be determined and adjudged by a court-martial; and such officer shall, moreover, be liable to be cashiered by sentence of a court-martial; and such non-commissioned officers and privates shall be liable to be imprisoned by a like sentence on failure of payment of the fines adjudged against them, for the space of one calendar month for every five dollars of such fine.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That courts-martial for the trial of militia shall be composed of militia officers only.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That all fines, to be assessed as aforesaid, shall be certified by the presiding officer of the court-martial before whom the same shall be assessed to the marshal of the district in which the delinquent shall reside, or to one of his deputies, and also to the supervisor of the revenue of the same district, who shall record the said certificate in a book to be kept for that purpose; the said marshal or his deputy shall forthwith proceed to levy the said fines, with costs, by distress and sale of the goods and chattels of the delinquent, which costs, and the manner of proceeding with respect to the sale of the goods distrained, shall be agreeably to the laws of the State in which the same shall be in other cases of distress; and where any non-commissioned officer or private shall be adjudged to suffer imprisonment, there being no goods or chattels to be found whereof to levy the said fines, the marshal of the district or his deputy may commit such delinquent to jail during the term for which he shall be so adjudged to imprisonment, or until the fine shall be paid, in the same manner as other persons condemned to fine and imprisonment at the suit of the United States may be committed.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the marshals and their deputies shall pay all such fines by them levied to the supervisor of the revenue, in the district in which they are collected, within two months after they shall have received the same, deducting therefrom five per centum as a compensation for their trouble; and in case of failure, the same shall be recoverable by action of debt or information in any Court of the United States, of the district in which such fines shall be levied having cognizance thereof, to be sued for, prosecuted and recovered, in the name of the supervisor of the district, with interest and costs.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the marshals of the several districts and their deputies shall have the same powers in executing the laws of the United States as sheriffs and their deputies in the several States have by law, in executing the laws of their respective States.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That this act shall continue and be in force for and during the term of two years, and from thence to the end of the next session of Congress thereafter, and no longer.

Approved, May 2, 1792.

An Act for the relief of persons imprisoned for Debt.

Be it enacted, &c., That persons imprisoned on executions issuing from any Court of the United States for satisfaction of judgments in any civil actions, shall be entitled to like privileges of the yards or limits of the respective jails, as persons confined in such jails for debt on judgments rendered in the Courts of the several States are entitled to, and under the like regulations and restrictions.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That any person imprisoned as aforesaid may have the oath or affirmation hereinafter expressed administered to him by any Judge of the United States, or of the General or Supreme Court of Law of the State in which the debtor is imprisoned, the creditor, his agent, or attorney, if either live within one hundred miles of the place of imprisonment, or within the district in which the judgment was rendered, having at least thirty days' previous notice, by a citation served on him, issued by any such Judge, to appear at the time therein mentioned at the said jail, if he see fit, to show cause why the said oath or affirmation should not be so administered; at which time and place, if no sufficient cause, in the opinion of the Judge, be shown, or doth from examination appear to the contrary, he may, at the request of the debtor, proceed to administer to him the following oath or affirmation, as the case may be, viz: "You, ———, solemnly swear (or affirm) that you have not estate, real or personal, nor is any to your knowledge, holden in trust for you to the amount or value of twenty dollars, nor sufficient to pay the debt for which you are imprisoned." Which oath or affirmation being administered, the Judge shall certify the same, under his hand, to the prison-keeper, and shall fix a reasonable allowance for the debtor's support, not exceeding one dollar per week; and, if the creditor shall thereafter, any week fail to furnish the debtor with such weekly support, by paying or advancing the money to him, or to the prison-keeper, for his use, the debtor shall be discharged from his imprisonment, on such judgment, and shall not be liable to be imprisoned again for the said debt; but the judgment shall remain good and sufficient in law, and may be satisfied out of any estate which may then, or at any time afterwards, belong to the debtor.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall falsely take the oath or affirmation aforesaid, such person shall be deemed guilty of perjury, and suffer the pains and penalties in that case provided.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That this act shall continue and be in force for the space of one year from the passing thereof, and from thence to the end of the next session of Congress, and no longer.

Approved, May 5, 1792.

An Act authorizing the grant and conveyance of certain lands to John Cleves Symmes and his associates.

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized and empowered to issue letters patent in the name and under the seal of the United States, thereby granting and conveying to John Cleves Symmes and his associates, and to their heirs and assigns, in fee simple, such number of acres of land as the payments already made by the said John Cleves Symmes, his agents, or associates, under their contract of the fifteenth day of October, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-eight, will pay for, estimating the lands at two-thirds of a dollar per acre, and making the reservations specified in the said contract.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President be, and he hereby is, further authorized and empowered, by letters patent as aforesaid, to grant and convey to the said John Cleves Symmes and his associates, and to their heirs and assigns, in fee simple, one other tract of one hundred and six thousand eight hundred and fifty-seven acres, with the reservations as aforesaid: Provided, That the said John Cleves Symmes, or his agents or associates, or any of them, shall deliver to the Secretary of the Treasury, within six months, warrants which issued for Army bounty rights sufficient for that purpose, according to the provision of the resolves of Congress of the twenty-third of July and second of October, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven; but, in case so many warrants should not be delivered, then the letters patent last aforesaid to be given for such number of acres as shall be in proportion to the warrants so delivered.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered, by letters patent as aforesaid, to grant and convey unto the said John Cleves Symmes and his associates, their heirs, and assigns, in trust for the purpose of establishing an Academy and other Public Schools and Seminaries of Learning, one complete township, conformably to an order of Congress of the second of October, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven, made in consequence of the application of the said John Cleves Symmes, for the purchase of the tract aforesaid.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the several quantities of land to be granted and conveyed as aforesaid, shall be included and located within such limits and lines of boundary as the President may judge expedient, agreeably to an act passed the twelfth day of April, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, "for ascertaining the bounds of a tract of land purchased by John Cleves Symmes."

Approved, May 5, 1792.

An Act to alter the time for the next annual meeting of Congress.

Be it enacted, &c., That, after the adjournment of the present session, the next annual meeting of Congress shall be on the first Monday in November next.

Approved, May 5, 1792.

An Act concerning the Duties on Spirits distilled within the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the last day of June next, the present duties upon spirits distilled within the United States, and on stills, shall cease, and that, in lieu thereof, upon all spirits which, after the said day, shall be distilled within the United States wholly or in part from molasses, sugar, or other foreign materials, there shall be paid the duties following: that is to say—

For every gallon of those spirits of the first class of proof, ten cents; for every gallon of those spirits of the second class of proof, eleven cents; for every gallon of those spirits of the third class of proof, twelve cents; for every gallon of those spirits of the fourth class of proof, fourteen cents; for every gallon of those spirits of the fifth class of proof, eighteen cents; for every gallon of those spirits of the sixth class of proof, twenty-five cents. And upon all spirits which after the said day shall be distilled within the United States from materials of the growth or produce of the United States, in any city, town, or village, at any distillery at which there shall be one or more stills which singly or together shall be of the capacity of four hundred gallons or upwards, there shall be paid the duties following: that is to say—

For every gallon of those spirits of the first class of proof, seven cents; for every gallon of those spirits of the second class of proof, eight cents; for every gallon of those spirits of the third class of proof, nine cents; for every gallon of those spirits of the fourth class of proof, eleven cents; for every gallon of those spirits of the fifth class of proof, thirteen cents; for every gallon of those spirits of the sixth class of proof, eighteen cents. And upon stills which after the said day shall be employed in distilling spirits from materials of the growth or produce of the United States, at any other place than a city, town, or village, or at any distillery in a city, town, or village at which there shall be one or more stills, which singly, if only one, or together, if more than one, shall be of less capacity than four hundred gallons, there shall be paid the yearly duty of fifty-four cents for every gallon English wine measure of the capacity or content of each and every such still, including the head thereof: Provided, That it shall be at the option of the proprietor or possessor of any such still, instead of the said yearly duty, either to pay seven cents for every gallon of spirits by him or her distilled, or to pay at the rate of ten cents per gallon of the capacity for each and every month of the employment of any such still; and in case the said proprietor or possessor shall elect to pay either the said rate of seven cents per gallon, of the spirits by him or her distilled, or the said monthly rate of ten cents, according to the capacity of his or her still or stills, he or she at the time of making entry of his or her still or stills in manner herein-after directed, shall by writing under his or her hand, left at the office of inspection where such entry shall be made, notify the said election, and if the same shall be to pay the said monthly rate of ten cents, shall demand a license for the term of time, specifying the day of commencing and the day of ending, during which he or she shall intend to work his or her still or stills, which license shall, without delay or expense to the said proprietor or possessor, be granted, and shall be signed by the supervisors of the revenue, and countersigned by the officer at whose office application for the same shall have been made. And in the case of an election, to pay the said monthly rate of ten cents, it shall not be lawful for any person by whom the same shall have been made, to work his or her still or stills, at any time, within the year from the date of his or her entry thereof, other than that for which a license shall have been granted, unless he or she shall have previously obtained another license for such further time, which upon like application shall and may be granted in like manner; and if any such person shall work his or her still or stills contrary to the direction or provision aforesaid, he or she shall forfeit and pay for every such offence two hundred dollars. And in every case in which any proprietor or possessor of a still or stills subject to the payment of duty according to the capacity of such still or stills, shall not make election to pay according to one or the other of the alternatives aforesaid, or shall not duly comply therewith, he or she shall be liable to pay, and shall pay, the said yearly rate of fifty-four cents for every gallon of the capacity or capacities of his or her still or stills.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That there be in each county comprehended within any district at least one office of inspection, at which every person having or keeping a still or stills within such county shall, between the last day of May and the first day of July in each year, make entry of such still or stills, and at which every person, who, being a resident within the county, shall procure a still or stills, or who, removing within a county, shall bring therein a still or stills, shall, within thirty days after such procuring or removal, and before he or she shall begin to use such still or stills, make entry thereof. And every entry, besides describing each still and the capacity thereof, shall specify the place where, and the person in whose possession it is, and the purpose for which it is intended, as whether for sale or use in distilling; and, in the case of removal, shall specify the place from which every such still shall have been brought.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That every proprietor and possessor of a still shall be jointly and severally liable for the duty thereupon; and that every owner of land upon which any still shall be worked shall be liable for the duty thereupon, unless the same shall be worked by a lawful and bona fide tenant of the land of an estate, not less than for the term of one year, or unless such owner can make it appear that the possessor of, or person by whom, such still shall have been worked, was, during the whole time of working the same, a trespasser or intruder on his land.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That every officer of inspection within whose survey any distillery of geneva or sweet cordials, subject to the payment of duty by the gallon of the spirits distilled thereon may be, shall forbear to visit or inspect for a space not exceeding two hours in each day such part of the said distillery as he may be required by the proprietor, possessor, or manager of such distillery to forbear to visit and inspect, for which purpose it shall be necessary for the said proprietor, possessor, or manager to give notice, in writing, to the said officer, describing therein particularly the part of such distillery which it shall be his desire that the said officer may forbear to visit and inspect, and specifying the time of each day for which such forbearance shall be desired.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That it shall be in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury to regulate as well the marks to be set upon the casks, vessels, and packages, containing distilled spirits, as the forms of the certificates which are to accompany the same; and that when any cask or vessel in which distilled spirits have been contained shall have been emptied of its contents, it shall be lawful for the marks thereupon to be effaced by, or in the presence of, an officer of inspection; and if the said cask or vessel shall afterwards be used for putting therein other spirits, the same may be marked anew.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That, instead of a notice of twenty-four hours, heretofore required to be given, of the intent to export distilled spirits, in order to the benefit of the drawback of the duties thereupon, six hours shall be sufficient.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That there be an abatement for leakage at the rate of two per cent., in every case in which the duty shall be payable by the gallon of the spirits distilled, to be allowed at the distillery where such spirits shall be made.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That the officer of inspection within whose survey any still shall be, the duty whereupon is payable according to the capacity of the still, shall identify, by progressive numbers and other proper marks, every such still within his survey, and the duty thereupon shall operate as a specific lien upon the said still.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That every distiller of, and dealer in, spirits who may have in his or her possession distilled spirits not made or certified, pursuant to the act entitled "An act repealing, after the last day of June next, the duties heretofore laid upon distilled spirits imported from abroad, and laying others in their stead, and also upon spirits distilled within the United States, and for appropriating the same," shall, prior to the last day of September next, report the spirits in his or her possession, in writing, at some office of inspection, to the end that such spirits may be marked and certified as Old Stock. And that, from and after the last day of September next, casks and vessels of the capacity of twenty gallons and upwards, containing distilled spirits, which shall be found in the possession of any distiller or dealer in spirits, except at a distillery where the same were made, or in going from one place to another, without being marked according to law, or without having a certificate from some proper officer, shall be liable to seizure and forfeiture; and that it shall be the duty of the several officers of inspection, upon request of any dealer or distiller, to take measures for the marking of casks, vessels, and packages containing distilled spirits, and to furnish such dealer or distiller, free from expense, with certificates to accompany the same: Provided, That it shall not be incumbent upon any such officer to mark or certify any cask, vessel, or package which ought to have been before marked or certified according to any law of the United States.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the last day of April, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, no distilled spirits, except arrack and sweet cordials, shall be brought into the United States from any foreign port or place, except in casks or vessels of the capacity of ninety gallons and upwards.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That no drawback of the duty on distilled spirits which shall be exported after the last day of June next, shall be allowed upon any quantity less than one hundred gallons.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That, after the last day of June next, no distilled spirits shall be brought into the United States from any foreign port or place in any cask or vessel which shall have been marked pursuant to any law of the United States concerning distilled spirits, on pain of forfeiture of the spirits so brought, and of the ship or vessel in which they shall be brought.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That if the owner or possessor of any still or stills shall neglect to make entry thereof, within the time and in the manner prescribed by the second section of this act, such owner or possessor shall forfeit and pay the sum of two hundred and fifty dollars; and if any distilled spirits, except arrack and sweet cordials, shall, after the last day of April next, be brought into the United States in casks or vessels of less capacity than ninety gallons, all such spirits, and the casks and vessels containing the same, shall be subject to seizure and forfeiture, and every such penalty or forfeiture shall be one-half to the use of the United States, and the other half to the use of the person who shall first discover and make known the matter or thing whereby the same shall have been incurred.

Sec. 14. And be it further enacted and declared, That the duties hereby laid shall continue in force for the same time, and are hereby pledged and appropriated to and for the same purposes as those in lieu of which they are laid, and pursuant to the act entitled "An act repealing, after the last day of June next, the duties heretofore laid upon distilled spirits imported from abroad, and laying others in their stead, and also upon spirits distilled within the United States, and for appropriating the same."

Sec. 15. And be it further enacted, That to make good any deficiency which may happen in consequence of the reduction hereby made in the rates of the duties on spirits distilled within the United States, and on stills, so much of the product of the duties laid by the act entitled "An act for raising a further sum of money for the protection of the frontiers, and for other purposes therein mentioned," as may be necessary, shall be, and is hereby, pledged and appropriated to the same purposes, to and for which the duties hereby reduced were pledged and appropriated.

Sec. 16. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be authorized to make such allowances for their respective services to the supervisors, inspectors, and other officers of inspection as he shall deem reasonable and proper, so as the said allowances, together with the incidental expenses of collecting the duties on spirits distilled within the United States shall not exceed seven-and-a-half per centum of the total product of the duties on distilled spirits for the period to which the said allowances shall relate, computing from the time the act entitled "An act repealing, after the last day of June next, the duties heretofore laid upon distilled spirits imported from abroad, and laying others in their stead, and also upon spirits distilled within the United States, and for appropriating the same," took effect: And, provided, also, That such allowance shall not exceed the annual amount of seventy thousand dollars, until the same shall be further ascertained by law.

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That the act entitled "An act repealing, after the last day of June next, the duties heretofore laid upon distilled spirits imported from abroad, and laying others in their stead, and also upon spirits distilled within the United States, and for appropriating the same," shall extend to, and be in full force for, the collection of the several duties herein before mentioned, and for the recovery and distribution of the penalties and forfeitures herein contained, and generally for the execution of this act, as fully and effectually as if every regulation, restriction, penalty, provision, clause, matter, and thing therein contained were inserted in, and re-enacted by, this present act, subject only to the alterations hereby made.

Approved, May 8, 1792.

An Act relative to the compensations to certain officers employed in the collection of the duties of Impost and Tonnage.

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the last day of June next, in addition to the fees and emoluments which may accrue to the officers employed in the collection of the duties of impost and tonnage, by the provisions already made, they shall severally have, and be entitled to the respective allowances following, to wit: The surveyors of Newburyport, Salem, Saint Mary's and Wilmington, in North Carolina, the yearly sum of one hundred dollars, each; the surveyors of Beverley, North Kingston, East Greenwich, Warren, Bristol, Pawcatuck River, Providence, Patuxet, New Haven, Lewellensburg, Alexandria, Beaufort, Hertford, Winton, Bennet's Creek, Plymouth, Windsor, Skewarkey, Murfreesborough, Nixonton, Indian Town, Currituck Inlet, Pasquotank River Bridge and Newbiggen Creek, the yearly sum of eighty dollars each; the surveyor of Portsmouth, the yearly sum of sixty dollars; the surveyor of Ipswich, Portland, Newport, Stonington, Middleton, Bermuda Hundred, Petersburg, Richmond, and Savannah, the yearly sum of fifty dollars, each; the surveyors of Gloucester, New London, and Swansborough, the yearly sum of thirty dollars, each; the surveyors of Hudson, Little Egg Harbor, Suffolk, Smithfield, Urbanna, and Fredericksburg, the yearly sum of twenty dollars, each; the collector of the district of Wilmington, in North Carolina, the yearly sum of one hundred and fifty dollars; the collectors of the districts of Portsmouth, Gloucester, Albany, Annapolis, Vienna, Nottingham, Yorktown, Dumfries and Louisville, the yearly sum of one hundred dollars, each; the collector of the district of Fairfield, the yearly sum of eighty dollars; the collectors of the districts of Marblehead, Plymouth, Barnstable, Nantucket, New Bedford, Dighton, York, Biddeford and Pepperelborough, Bath, Wiscasset, Machias, Newport, New Haven, Perth Amboy, Great Egg Harbor, Wilmington, in Delaware, Chester, Cedarpoint,

Georgetown, Hampton, South Quay, Washington, Plank-bridge and Georgetown, in South Carolina, the yearly sum of fifty dollars, each; the naval officer of the district of Portsmouth, the yearly sum of one hundred dollars; the naval officers of the districts of Newburyport, Newport, Providence, Wilmington, in North Carolina, and Savannah, the yearly sum of fifty dollars, each; the collector of the district of Salem and Beverly, one fourth of one per centum on the amount of all moneys by him received on account of the said duties; and to the collectors of the districts of Portsmouth, Newburyport, Gloucester, Marblehead, Plymouth, Nantucket, Edgartown, New Bedford, Dighton, York, Biddeford and Pepperelborough, Portland, Bath, Wiscasset, Penobscot, Frenchman's Bay, Machias, Newport, Providence, New Haven, Fairfield, Perth Amboy, Burlington, Great Egg Harbor, Wilmington, in Delaware, Oxford, Vienna, Snow Hill, Annapolis, Nottingham, Cedarpoint, Georgetown, in Maryland, Hampton, Yorktown, Yeocomico, Dumfries, Foley Landing, Cherrystone, South Quay, Wilmington, in North Carolina, Newbern, Washington, Edenton, Plank-bridge, Georgetown, in South Carolina, Beaufort, and Savannah, each, one-half of one per centum on the amount of all moneys by them respectively received on account of the duties aforesaid.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the last day of June next, the allowance of three-fourths of one per centum to the collectors of the districts of Pennsylvania and the city of New York, on the amount of all moneys by them respectively received, on account of the duties of impost and tonnage, shall cease, and instead thereof, they shall, after that time, be entitled to one-half of one per centum on all such moneys by them respectively received.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the last day of June next, the expense of fuel, office rent, and necessary stationery, for the collectors of the districts of Salem and Beverley, Boston and Charlestown, the cities of New York, Philadelphia and Charleston, the towns of Baltimore, Norfolk and Portsmouth, shall be paid, three-fourths by the said collectors, and the other fourth by the respective naval officers in those districts.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That, whenever a collector shall die, the commissions, to which he would have been entitled on the receipt of all duties bonded by him, shall be equally divided between the legal representatives of such deceased collector and his successor in office, whose duty it shall be collect the same; and for this purpose the said representatives shall deliver over to such successor all the public or official books, papers, and accounts of the said deceased.

Approved, May 8, 1792.

An Act to continue in force the act, entitled "An act to provide for mitigating or remitting the penalties and forfeitures accruing under the revenue laws in certain cases," and to make further provision for the payment of Pensions to Invalids.

Be it enacted, &c., That the act, entitled "An act to provide for mitigating or remitting the forfeitures and penalties accruing under the revenue laws in certain cases therein mentioned," shall be, and hereby is continued in full force for the term of three years, from the passing of this act, and no longer. Provided, That nothing in the said act shall be construed to limit or restrain the power of the President of the United States to grant pardons for offences against the United States.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the yearly pensions which have been or may be, allowed by, or in pursuance of, any act or law of the United States, to persons who were wounded and disabled in the public service, shall, for the space of one year from the fourth day of March last, be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, under such regulations as the President of the United States may direct.

Approved, May 8, 1792.

An Act supplementary to the Act for making provision for the Debt of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That the term for receiving on Loan that part of the Domestic Debt of the United States, which hath not been subscribed pursuant to the terms proposed in the act entitled "An act making provision for the Debt of the United States," shall be, and it is hereby extended on the same terms as in and by the said act is provided, to the first day of March next; and books for receiving such further subscriptions shall be opened at the Treasury of the United States, and by the Commissioners of Loans in each of the said States, on the first day of June next, which shall continue open until the said first day of March next, inclusively; for which purpose, the said Commissioners, respectively, are hereby invested with the like powers, and required to perform the like duties, as in and by the said act is directed.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That such of the creditors of the United States as have not subscribed, and shall not subscribe to the said Loan, shall nevertheless receive a rate per centum on the amount of so much of their respective demands, as well for interest as principal, as, on or before the first day of March shall be registered conformably to the directions of the said act, as shall be equal to the interest payable to the subscribing creditors, which shall be payable at the same times and places, and by the same persons, as in and by the said act is directed.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the term for receiving upon Loan that part of the Debts of the respective States which hath not been subscribed pursuant to the terms proposed in the act aforesaid, shall be, and it is hereby, enlarged on the same terms as in and by the said act is provided, until the first day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, inclusively; for which purpose, books shall be opened at the Treasury of the United States, and by the Commissioners of Loans in each of the said States, on the first day of June next, which shall continue open until the first day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three inclusively; for which purposes, the said Commissioners are hereby invested with the like powers, and required to perform the like duties, as in and by the said act is directed.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner of Loans for North Carolina shall not be allowed to receive any certificate issued by Patrick Travers, Commissioner of Cumberland county, or by the Commissioners of Army accounts at Warrenton.

SEC. 5. And, whereas the United States are indebted to certain foreign officers, on account of pay and services during the late war, the interest whereof, pursuant to the certificates granted to the said officers by virtue of a resolution of the United States in Congress assembled, is payable at the house of ———, grand banker, at Paris, and it is expedient to discharge the same: Be it therefore enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized to cause to be discharged the principal and interest of the said Debt, out of any of the moneys which have been, or shall be obtained on Loan, in virtue of the act aforesaid, and which shall not be necessary ultimately to fulfil the purposes for which the said moneys are, in and by the said act, authorized to be borrowed.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the President of the Senate, the Chief Justice, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Attorney General, for the time being, shall be Commissioners who, or any three of whom, are hereby authorized, with the approbation of the President of the United States, to purchase the Debt of the United States, at its market price, if not exceeding the par or true value thereof; for which purchase, the interest on so much of the Public Debt as has already been, or may hereafter be, purchased for the United States, or as shall be paid into the Treasury, and so much of the moneys appropriated for the payment of the interest on the Foreign and Domestic Debt as shall exceed what may be sufficient for the payment of such interest to the creditors of the United States, shall be, and are hereby appropriated. And it shall be the duty of the said Commissioners to render to the Legislature, within two months after the commencement of the first session thereof in every year, a full and precise account of all such purchases made and Public Debt redeemed in pursuance of this act.

SEC. 7. And, whereas it is expedient to establish a fund for the gradual reduction of the Public Debt: Be it further enacted, That the interest on so much of the Debt of the United States as has been or shall be purchased or redeemed for or by the United States, or as shall be paid into the Treasury thereof in satisfaction of any debt or demand, and the surplus of any sum or sums appropriated for the payment of the interest upon the said Debt, which shall remain after paying such interest, shall be, and hereby are, appropriated and pledged firmly and inviolably for and to the purchase and redemption of the said Debt, to be applied under the direction of the President of the

Acts of Congress.

Senate, the Chief Justice, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Attorney General, for the time being, or any three of them, with the approbation of the President of the United States, for the time being, in manner following, that is to say: First, to the purchase of the several species of stock constituting the Debt of the United States, at their respective market prices, not exceeding the par or true value thereof, and, as nearly as may be, in equal proportions, until the annual amount of the said funds, together with any other provisions which may be made by law, shall be equal to two per centum of the whole amount of the outstanding funded stock, bearing a present interest of six per centum; thenceforth, secondly, to the redemption of the said last-mentioned stock, according to the right for that purpose reserved to the United States, until the whole amount thereof shall have been redeemed; and lastly, after such redemption, to the purchase, at its market price, of any other stock consisting of the Debt of the United States, which may then remain unredeemed; and such purchase, as far as the fund shall at any time extend, shall be made within thirty days next after each day on which a quarterly payment of interest on the Debt of the United States shall become due, and shall be made by a known agent, to be named by the said Commissioners.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That all future purchases of Public Debt on account of the United States, shall be made at the lowest price at which the same can be obtained by open purchase, or by receiving sealed proposals, to be opened in the presence of the Commissioners, or persons authorized by them to make purchases, and the persons making such proposals.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That quarter-yearly accounts of the application of the said fund shall be rendered for settlement, as other public accounts, accompanied with returns of the sums of the said Debt, which shall have been from time to time purchased or redeemed; and full and exact report of the proceedings of the said Commissioners, including a statement of the disbursements which shall have been made, and of the sums which shall have been purchased or redeemed under their direction, and specifying dates, prices, parties, and places, shall be laid before Congress within the first fourteen days of each session which may ensue the present, during the execution of the said trust.

Approved, May 8, 1792.

An Act making alterations in the Treasury and War Departments.

Be it enacted, &c., That there be an accountant to the Department of War, who shall be charged with the settlement of all accounts relative to the pay of the Army, the subsistence of officers, bounties to soldiers, the expenses of the recruiting service, the incidental and contingent expenses of the Department; and who shall report, from time to time, all such settlements as shall have been made by him, for the inspection and revision of the accounting officers of the Treasury; and the said accountant shall also be charged with the settlement of all claims for personal service authorized by the act of this Congress, of the 27th of March last, and of all military claims lodged in the late office of the Paymaster General and Commissioner of Army accounts, which are not foreclosed by the acts of limitation of the late Congress, and he shall report, from time to time, all such settlements as have been made by him, for the inspection and revision of the Comptroller of the Treasury. The compensation of the said accountant shall be a yearly salary of one thousand two hundred dollars.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Treasurer of the United States shall disburse all such moneys as shall have been previously ordered for the use of the Department of War, by warrants from the Treasury; which disbursements shall be made pursuant to warrants from the Secretary of War, countersigned by the accountant.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That there be a Paymaster to reside near the headquarters of the troops of the United States. That it shall be the duty of the said Paymaster to receive from the Treasurer all the moneys which shall be intrusted to him for the purpose of paying the pay, the arrears of pay, subsistence, or forage due to the troops of the United States. That he shall receive the pay abstracts of the Paymasters of the several regiments or corps, and compare the same with the returns or muster-rolls, which shall accompany the said pay abstracts. That he shall certify accurately, to the commanding officer, the sums due to the respective corps, which shall have been examined as aforesaid, who shall thereon issue his warrant on the said Deputy Paymaster for the payment accordingly. That copies of all reports to the commanding officer, and the warrants thereon, shall be duly transmitted to the office of the accountant of the War Department, in order to be there examined and finally adjusted at the Treasury. That the said Paymaster shall give bond in the sum of twenty thousand dollars, with two sufficient sureties, for the faithful discharge of his duty, and he shall take an oath faithfully to execute the duties of his office. That the compensation to the said Paymaster shall be sixty dollars monthly, with the same rations and forage as a Major.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That no assignment of pay, made after the first day of June next, by a non-commissioned officer or private, shall be valid.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That all purchases and contracts for supplying the Army with provisions, clothing, supplies in the Quartermaster's department, military stores, Indian goods, and all other supplies or articles for the use of the Department of War, be made by or under the direction of the Treasury Department.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall direct the superintendence of the collection of the duties on import and tonnage as he shall judge best. That the present office of assistant to the Secretary of the Treasury be abolished, and that instead thereof there be an officer in the Department of the Treasury, to be denominated Commissioner of the Revenue, who shall be charged with superintending, under the direction of the Head of the Department, the collection of the other revenues of the United States, and shall execute such other services, being conformable to the constitution of the Department, as shall be directed by the Secretary of the Treasury. That the compensation of the said Commissioner shall be a salary of one thousand nine hundred dollars per annum.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That in every case of an account or claim not finally adjusted, upon which the present Comptroller of the Treasury, as Auditor, may have decided, it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of the Revenue, and of the Auditor of the Treasury, finally to adjust the same; and in case of disagreement between the said Commissioner and Auditor, the decision of the Attorney General shall be final.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That, in case of the death, absence from the Seat of Government, or sickness of the Secretary of State, Secretary of the Treasury, or of the Secretary of the War Department, or of any officer of either of the said Departments whose appointment is not in the head thereof, whereby they cannot perform the duties of their said respective offices, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, in case he shall think it necessary, to authorize any person or persons, at his discretion, to perform the duties of the said respective offices until a successor be appointed, or until such absence or inability by sickness shall cease.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the forms of keeping and rendering all public accounts whatsoever, shall be prescribed by the Department of the Treasury.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That, in addition to the compensations allowed to the Comptroller, Auditor, Treasurer, and Register of the Treasury, by the "Act for establishing the salaries of the Executive officers of Government, their assistants and clerks," and to the Attorney General, by the "Act for allowing certain compensations to the Judges of the Supreme and other Courts, and to the Attorney General of the United States," the said officers respectively shall be allowed the following yearly sums, viz: the Comptroller four hundred dollars; the Auditor four hundred dollars; the Treasurer four hundred dollars; the Register five hundred dollars; the Attorney General four hundred dollars.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to have two principal clerks, each of whom to have a salary of eight hundred dollars per annum; and that the salary of the chief clerk of the Department of War be at the rate of eight hundred dollars per year.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That the restriction on the clerks of the Department of the Treasury, so far as respects the carrying on of any trade or business, other than in the funds or debts of the United States, or of any State, or any kind of public property, be abolished, and that such restriction, so far as respects the funds or debts of the United States, or of any State, or any public property of either, be extended to the Commissioner of the Revenue, to the several Commissioners of Loans, and to all persons employed in their respective offices, and to all officers of the United States concerned in the collection or disbursement of the revenues thereof, under the penalties prescribed in the eighth section of the act, entitled "An act to establish the Treasury Department," and the provisions relative to the officers in the Treasury Department, contained in the "Act to establish the Post Office and Post Roads," shall be, and hereby are, extended and applied to the Commissioner of the Revenue.

Approved, May 8, 1792.

An Act making certain appropriations therein specified.

Be it enacted, &c., That there be granted and appropriated the following sums for the following purposes, to wit: For the discharge of a balance to the Commissioners appointed under the act of Congress of the fifteenth of March, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-five, two thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven dollars and eighty-eight cents; for additional salary to the first clerk of the Commissioners for settling accounts between the United States and individual States, one hundred and eighty-seven dollars and ninety-one cents; for defraying the expense of stating and printing certain public accounts, pursuant to the order of the House of Representatives of the thirtieth of December, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, eight hundred dollars; for discharging the accounts of officers of the Courts of the United States, jurors, and witnesses, in aid of the fund heretofore appropriated, seventeen thousand dollars; for making good deficiencies in former appropriations, for defraying the expense of the enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States, four thousand six hundred and ninety-five dollars and fifty-nine cents; for discharging certain accounts against the Treasury Department, to the end of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, including a sum of six hundred dollars for furnishing the supervisors of the revenue with screw presses, seals, and other articles, one thousand nine hundred and fifty-five dollars and sixty-one cents; for a balance due to Lieutenant John Freeman, of the late Maryland line, on account of subsistence for the years one thousand seven hundred and eighty-two, and one thousand seven hundred and eighty-three, forty-one dollars and seventy-five cents; for compensation to the clerks of the acting Commissioners of Army accounts, and contingencies of his office, one thousand three hundred and twenty-nine dollars and sixteen cents; for additional compensation to the Doorkeepers of the House of Representatives, pursuant to a resolution of the House of the twenty-fourth of March last, seven hundred dollars; for the discharge of such demands against the United States, not otherwise provided for, as shall have been ascertained and admitted in due course of settlement at the Treasury, and which are of a nature, according to the usage thereof, to require payment in specie, five thousand dollars. All which said sums, amounting together to thirty-four thousand four hundred and ninety-seven dollars and ninety cents, shall and may be paid out of the funds following, any or all of them, namely: the surplusses which may remain of appropriations heretofore made, after satisfying the purposes of such appropriations; moneys which have been paid into the Treasury in consequence of balances which have been found due from individuals, relating to transactions prior to the present Government of the United States; the surplus, not heretofore appropriated, of the duties on imports and tonnage, which accrued to the end of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That so much of the aforesaid surplus of the duties on imports and tonnage, which accrued to the end of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, as may be necessary, shall be and is hereby appropriated, in addition to the provision heretofore made, towards defraying the expenses which shall have been incurred in the execution of the act for raising and adding another regiment to the Military Establishment of the United States, and for making farther provision for the protection of the frontiers, within the limits of the sum of three hundred and twelve thousand six hundred and eighty-six dollars and twenty cents thereby authorized; and towards reimbursing any sums which may have been borrowed, or advances of money which may have been obtained for that purpose.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That a sum of fifty thousand dollars, in addition to the provision heretofore made, be appropriated to defray any expense which may be incurred in relation to the intercourse between the United States and foreign nations, to be paid out of any moneys which may be in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to be applied under the direction of the President of the United States, who, if necessary, is authorized to borrow on the credit of the United States the said sum of fifty thousand dollars; an account of the expenditure whereof, as soon as may be, shall be laid before Congress.

Approved, May 8, 1792.

An Act to provide for a Copper coinage.

Be it enacted, &c. That the Director of the Mint, with the approbation of the President of the United States, be authorized to contract for and purchase a quantity of copper, not exceeding one hundred and fifty tons; and that the said Director, as soon as the needful preparations shall be made, cause the copper by him purchased to be coined at the Mint into cents and half cents, pursuant to the "Act establishing a Mint and regulating the Coins of the United States;" and that the said cents and half cents, as they shall be coined, be paid into the Treasury of the United States, thence to issue into circulation.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, after the expiration of six calendar months from the time when these shall have been paid into the Treasury by the said Director, in cents and half cents, a sum not less than fifty thousand dollars, which time shall forthwith be announced by the Treasurer in at least two gazettes or newspapers, published at the Seat of the Government of the United States for the time being, no copper coins or pieces whatsoever, except the said cents and half cents, shall pass current as money, or shall be paid, or offered to be paid, or received in payment for any debt, demand, claim, matter, or thing whatsoever; and all copper coins or pieces, except the said cents and half cents, which shall be paid or offered to be paid or received in payment contrary to the prohibition aforesaid, shall be forfeited; and every person by whom any of them shall have been so paid, or offered to be paid, or received in payment, shall also forfeit the sum of ten dollars; and the said forfeiture and penalty shall and may be recovered, with costs of suit, for the benefit of any person or persons by whom information of the incurring thereof shall have been given.

Approved, May 8, 1792.

An Act for regulating processes in the Courts of the United States, and providing compensation for the officers of the said Courts, and for jurors and witnesses.

Be it enacted, &c. That all writs and processes issuing from the Supreme or a Circuit Court, shall bear teste of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court (or if that office shall be vacant) of the Associate Justice next in precedence, and all writs and processes issuing from a District Court shall bear teste of the Judge of such Court (or if that office shall be vacant) of the clerk thereof, which said writs and processes shall be under the seal of the Court from whence they issue, and signed by the clerk thereof. The seals shall be provided at the expense of the United States.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the form of writs, executions, and other process, except their style and the forms and modes of proceeding in suits, in those of Common Law, shall be the same as are now used in the said Courts respectively, in pursuance of the act, entitled "An act to regulate processes in the Courts of the United States;" in those of Equity and in those of Admiralty and Maritime jurisdiction, according to the principles, rules, and usages, which belong to Courts of Equity and to Courts of Admiralty respectively, as contra-distinguished from Courts of Common Law; except so far as may have been provided for by the act to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States, subject, however, to such alterations and additions as the said Courts respectively shall, in their discretion, deem expedient, or to such regulations as the Supreme Court of the United States shall think proper from time to time by rule to prescribe to any Circuit or District Court concerning the same: Provided, That, on judgments in any of the cases aforesaid, where different kinds of executions are issuable in succession, a copias ad satisfaciendum being one, the plaintiff shall have his election to take out a capias ad satisfaciendum in the first instance.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the passing of this act, the fees and compensations to the several officers and other persons hereinafter mentioned, shall be as follows; that is to say: To the Marshals of the several districts of the United States, for the service of any writ, warrant, attachment, or process, in Chancery, on each person named in the same, two dollars; for his travel out in serving each writ, warrant, attachment, or process, aforesaid, five cents per mile, to be computed from the place of service to the Court where the writ or process shall be returned; and if more persons than one are named therein, the travel shall be computed from the Court to the place of service which is most remote, adding thereto the extra travel necessary to serve it on the other: Provided, That the fee for travel, where there is one person named in each writ, warrant, attachment, or process, shall in no case exceed seven dollars; and when there are more than one the fee for extra travel shall not exceed one dollar above seven dollars for each person. For each bail-bond, fifty cents; for selling goods and vessels condemned, and receiving and paying the money, three per cent.; for every commitment or discharge of a prisoner, fifty cents; for summoning witnesses, where he does it, each, thirty cents; for summoning a grand or petit jury, each, three dollars: Provided, That in those States where jurors, by the laws of the State, are drawn by constables or other officers of corporate towns or places by lot, the Marshals shall receive for the use of such constable or officers the fees allowed for summoning juries; for attending the Supreme, Circuit, or District Courts, five dollars per day, and at the rate of ten cents per mile for his expenses and time in traveling from the place of his abode to either of the said Courts; for levying an execution, and for all other services, not herein enumerated, such fees or compensation as are allowed in the Supreme Court of the State where the services shall be rendered. To the clerk of the Supreme Court of the United States, ten dollars per day for his attendance in Court, and for his other services in discharging the duties of his office, double the fees of the clerk of the Supreme Court of that State in which the Supreme Court of the United States shall be holden. To the clerk of the District and Circuit Courts such fees in each State respectively as are allowed in the Supreme Courts of the same; and five dollars per day for his attendance on any Circuit or District Court, and at the rate of ten cents per mile for his expenses and time in traveling from the place of his abode to either of the said Courts. And in case any clerk of a Court of the United States shall, in discharging the duties of his office, perform any kind of service which is not performed by the clerks of the Courts of the State, and for which the laws of the State make no allowance, the Court in which such service shall be rendered may allow a reasonable compensation therefor. To each grand and petit juror, fifty cents per day for attending in Court, and for traveling at the rate of five cents per every mile from their respective places of abode to the place where the Court is held, and the like allowance for returning. To witnesses summoned in any of the Courts of the United States the same compensations in each State respectively as are allowed in the Supreme Courts of the same. To the Attorney of the United States for the District, such fees in each State respectively as are allowed in the Supreme Courts of the same, and also the like compensation for traveling as is above allowed to the clerk of the District and Circuit Courts.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Marshal shall have the custody of all vessels and goods seized by any officer of the revenue, and shall be allowed such compensation therefor as the Court may judge reasonable. And there shall be paid to the Marshal the amount of the expense for fuel, candles, and other reasonable contingencies, that may accrue in holding the Courts within his District, and providing the books necessary to record the proceedings thereof; and such amount, as also the compensations aforesaid, to the grand and petit jurors, to the witnesses summoned on the part of the United States, to the clerk of the Supreme Court for his attendance; to the clerks of the District and Circuit Courts for their traveling and attendance; to the Attorney of the District for traveling to Court; to the Marshal for his attendance at Court; for summoning grand and petit jurors and witnesses in behalf of any prisoner to be tried for a capital offence; for the maintenance of prisoners confined in jail for any criminal offence, and for the commitment or discharge of such prisoner, and also the legal fees of the Clerk, Attorney, and Marshal, in criminal prosecutions, shall be included in the account of the Marshal; and the same having been examined and certified by the Court, or one of the Judges of it, in which the service shall have been rendered, shall be passed in the usual manner at, and the amount thereof paid out of, the Treasury of the United States, to the Marshal, and by him shall be paid over to the persons entitled to the same, and the Marshal shall be allowed two and a-half per cent. on the amount by him so paid over, to be charged in his future account.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That, in every prosecution for any fine or forfeiture incurred under any statutes of the United States, if judgment is rendered against the defendant he shall be subject to the payment of costs; and on every conviction for any other offence, not capital, the Court may, in their discretion, award that the defendant shall pay the costs of prosecution. And if any informer or plaintiff, on a penal statute, to whose benefit the penalty, or any part thereof, if recovered is directed by law to accrue, shall discontinue his suit or prosecution, or shall be non-suit in the same, or if, upon trial, a verdict shall pass for the defendant, the Court shall award to the defendant his costs, unless such informer or plaintiff be an officer of the United States, specially authorized to commence such prosecution, and the Court before whom the action or information shall be tried, shall, at the trial in open Court, certify, upon record, that there was reasonable cause for commencing the same, in which case no costs shall be adjudged to the defendant.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the fees and compensations to the several officers and persons herein before mentioned, other than those which are above directed to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, shall be recovered in like manner as the fees of the officers of the States respectively for like services are recovered.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That, if any officer herein before mentioned, or his deputy, shall, by reason or color of his office, wilfully and corruptly demand and receive any greater fees than those allowed by this act, he shall, on conviction thereof in any Court of the United States, forfeit and pay a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars, or be imprisoned not exceeding six months, at the discretion of the Court before whom the conviction shall be.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the act passed at the last session of Congress, entitled "An act to continue in force for a limited time, an act passed at the first session of Congress, entitled 'An act to regulate processes in the Courts of the United States;'" and also another act passed at the last session of Congress, entitled "An act providing compensations for the officers of the Judicial Courts of the United States and for jurors and witnesses and for other purposes," be and the same are hereby repealed.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the clerk of the Supreme Court of the United States forthwith to transmit to the clerks of the several Circuit Courts the form of a writ of error, to be approved by any two of the Judges of the Supreme Court, and it shall be lawful for the clerks of the said Circuit Courts to issue writs of error agreeably to such forms, as nearly as the case may admit, under the seal of the said Circuit Courts, returnable to the Supreme Court, in the same manner as the clerk of the Supreme Court may issue such writs, in pursuance of the act, entitled "An act to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States."

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for the clerks of the District and Circuit Courts, in the absence, or in case of the disability, of the Judges, to take recognizances of special bail, de bene esse, in any action depending in either of the said Courts, and also the affidavits of all surveyors relative to their reports, and to administer oaths to all persons identifying papers found on board of vessels or elsewhere, to be used on trials in Admiralty causes.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That, in all suits and actions in any District Court of the United States, in which it shall appear that the Judge of such Court is, any ways, concerned in interest, or has been of counsel, for either party, it shall be the duty of such Judge, on application of either party, to cause the fact to be entered on the minutes of the Court, and also to order an authenticated copy thereof, with all the proceedings in such suit or action, to be forthwith certified to the next Circuit Court of the District, which Circuit Court shall, thereupon, take cognizance thereof, in the like manner, as if it had been originally commenced in that Court, and shall proceed to hear and determine the same accordingly.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That all the records and proceedings of the Court of Appeals heretofore appointed, previous to the adoption of the present Constitution, shall be deposited in the office of the Clerk of the Supreme Court of the United States, who is hereby authorized and directed to give copies of all such records and proceedings, to any person requiring and paying for the same, in like manner as copies of the records and other proceedings of the said Court are by law directed to be given: which copies shall have like faith and credit as all other proceedings of the said Court.

Approved, May 8, 1792.

An act more effectually to provide for the National Defence, by establishing an uniform Militia throughout the United States.

Be it enacted, &c. That each and every free able-bodied white male citizen of the respective States, resident therein, who is or shall be of the age of eighteen years, and under the age of forty-five years, (except as hereinafter excepted) shall severally, and respectively, be enrolled in the Militia by the Captain or commanding officer of the company, within whose bounds such citizen shall reside, and that within twelve months after the passing of this act. And it shall at all times hereafter be the duty of every such Captain or commanding officer of a company, to enrol every such citizen, as aforesaid, and also those who shall, from time to time, arrive at the age of eighteen years, or being of the age of eighteen years and under the age of forty-five years (except as before excepted) shall come to reside within his bounds; and shall without delay notify such citizen of the said enrolment, by a proper non-commissioned officer of the company, by whom such notice may be proved. That every citizen, so enrolled and notified, shall, within six months thereafter, provide himself with a good musket or firelock, a sufficient bayonet and belt, two spare flints, and a knapsack, a pouch with a box therein to contain not less than twenty-four cartridges, suited to the bore of his musket or firelock, each cartridge to contain a proper quantity of powder and ball; or with a good rifle, knapsack, shot-pouch and powder-horn, twenty balls suited to the bore of his rifle, and a quarter of a pound of powder; and shall appear, so armed, accoutred, and provided, when called out to exercise or into service, except, that when called out on company days to exercise only, he may appear without a knapsack. That the commissioned officers shall severally be armed with a sword or hanger, and espartoon; and that, from and after five years from the passing of this act, all muskets for arming the Militia as is herein required, shall be of bores sufficient for balls of the eighteenth part of a pound; and every citizen so enrolled, and providing himself with the arms, ammunition, and accoutrements, required as aforesaid, shall hold the same exempted from all suits, distresses, executions, or sales for debt, or for the payment of taxes.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Vice President of the United States; the officers, Judicial and Executive, of the Government of the United States; the members of both Houses of Congress, and their respective officers; all custom-house officers, with their clerks; all post-officers, and stage-drivers, who are employed in the care and conveyance of the mail of the Post Office of the United States; all ferry-men employed at any ferry on the Post Roads; all inspectors of exports; all pilots; all mariners actually employed in the sea-service of any citizen or merchant within the United States; and all persons who now are or may hereafter be exempted by the laws of the respective States, shall be, and are hereby exempted from Militia duty, notwithstanding their being above the age of eighteen, and under the age of forty-five years.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That, within one year after the passing of this act, the Militia of the respective States shall be arranged into divisions, brigades, regiments, battalions, and companies, as the Legislature of each State shall direct; and each division, brigade, and regiment, shall be numbered at the formation thereof; and a record made of such numbers in the Adjutant General's office in the State; and when in the field, or in service in the State, each division, brigade, and regiment shall, respectively, take rank according to their numbers, reckoning the first or lowest number highest in rank. That if the same be convenient, each brigade shall consist of four regiments; each regiment of two battalions; each battalion of five companies; each company of sixty-four privates. That the said Militia shall be officered by the respective States, as follows: To each division, one Major General and two Aides-Camp, with the rank of Major; to each brigade, one Brigadier General with one Brigade Inspector, to serve also as Brigade Major, with the rank of a Major; to each regiment, one Lieutenant-Colonel Commandant; and to each battalion, one Major; to each company, one Captain, one Lieutenant, one Ensign, four Sergeants, four Corporals, one Drummer, and one Fifer or Bugler. That there shall be a regimental staff, to consist of one Adjutant, and one Quartermaster, to rank as Lieutenants; one Paymaster; one Surgeon, and one Surgeon's-Mate; one Sergeant-Major; one Drum-Major, and one Fife-Major.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That out of the Militia enrolled, as is herein directed, there shall be formed for each battalion, at least one company of grenadiers, light infantry, or riflemen; and that to each division there shall be, at least, one company of artillery, and one troop of horse. There shall be to each company of artillery, one Captain, two Lieutenants, four Sergeants, four Corporals, six Gunners, six Bombardiers, one Drummer, and one Fifer. The officers to be armed with a sword or hanger, a fusée, bayonet and belt, with a cartridge box to contain twelve cartridges; and each private or matross shall furnish himself with all the equipments of a private in the infantry, until proper ordnance and field artillery is provided. There shall be to each troop of horse, one Captain, two Lieutenants, one Cornet, four Sergeants, four Corporals, one Sadler, one Farrier, and one Trumpeter. The commissioned officers to furnish themselves with good horses of, at least fourteen hands and an half high, and to be armed with a sword and pair of pistols, the holsters of which to be covered with bearskin caps. Each dragoon to furnish himself with a serviceable horse, at least fourteen hands and an half high, a good saddle, bridle, mail-pillion, and valise, holsters, and a breast-plate and crupper, a pair of boots and spurs, a pair of pistols, a sabre, and cartridge box to contain twelve cartridges for pistols. That each company of artillery and troop of horse shall be formed of volunteers from the brigade, at the discretion of the Commander-in-Chief of the State, not exceeding one company each to a regiment, nor more in number than one-eleventh part of the infantry, and shall be uniformly clothed in regimentals, to be furnished at their own expense; the color and fashion to be determined by the Brigadier commanding the brigade to which they belong.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That each battalion and regiment shall be provided with the State and regimental colors by the field officers, and each company with a drum and fife or bugle horn, by the commissioned officers of the company, in such manner as the Legislature of the respective States shall direct.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That there shall be an Adjutant General appointed in each State, whose duty it shall be to distribute all orders from the Commander-in-Chief of the State to the several corps; to attend all public reviews, when the Commander-in-Chief of the State shall review the Militia, or any part thereof; to obey all orders from him relative to carrying into execution and perfecting the system of military discipline established by this act; to furnish blank forms of different returns that may be required, and to explain the principles on which they should be made; to receive from the several officers of the different corps throughout the State, returns of the Militia under their command, reporting the actual situation of their arms, accoutrements, and ammunition, their delinquencies, and every other thing which relates to the general advancement of good order and discipline. All which, the several officers of the divisions, brigades, regiments, and battalions, are hereby required to make in the usual manner, so that the said Adjutant General may be duly furnished therewith. From all which returns he shall make proper abstracts, and lay the same annually before the Commander-in-Chief of the State.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the rules of discipline approved and established by Congress, in their resolution of the twenty-ninth of March, 1779, shall be the rules of discipline to be observed by the Militia throughout the United States, except such deviations from the said rules, as may be rendered necessary by the requisitions of this act, or by some other unavoidable circumstances. It shall be the duty of the commanding officer at every muster, whether by battalion, regiment, or single company, to cause the Militia to be exercised and trained agreeably to the said rules of discipline.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That all commissioned officers shall take rank according to the date of their commissions; and when two of the same grade bear an equal date, then their rank to be determined by lot, to be drawn by them before the commanding officer of the brigade, regiment, battalion, company, or detachment.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That if any person, whether officer or soldier, belonging to the Militia of any State, and called out into the service of the United States, be wounded or disabled while in actual service, he shall be taken care of and provided for at the public expense.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Brigade Inspector to attend the regimental and battalion meetings of the Militia composing their several brigades, during the time of their being under arms, to inspect their arms, ammunition, and accoutrements; superintend their exercise and manœuvres, and introduce the system of military discipline before described throughout the brigade, agreeably to law, and such orders as they shall, from time to time, receive from the Commander-in-Chief of the State; to make returns to the Adjutant General of the State, at least once in every year, of the Militia of the brigade to which he belongs, reporting therein the actual situation of the arms, accoutrements, and ammunition of the several corps, and every other thing which, in his judgment, may relate to their government and the general advancement of good order and military discipline; and the Adjutant General shall make a return of all the Militia of the State, to the Commander-in-Chief of the said State, and a duplicate of the same to the President of the United States.

And whereas sundry corps of artillery, cavalry, and infantry, now exist in several of the said States, which, by the laws, customs, or usages thereof, have not been incorporated with or subject to the general regulations of the Militia—

Sec. 11. Be it further enacted, That such corps retain their accustomed privileges, subject, nevertheless, to all other duties required by this act, in like manner with the other Militia.

Approved, May 8, 1792.

An Act respecting the Government of the Territories of the United States Northwest and South of the River Ohio.

Be it enacted, &c., That the laws of the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio, that have been or hereafter may be enacted by the Governor and Judges thereof, shall be printed under the direction of the Secretary of State, and two hundred copies thereof, together with ten sets of the laws of the United States, shall be delivered to the said Governor and Judges, to be distributed among the inhabitants, for their information; and that a like number of the laws of the United States shall be delivered to the Governor and Judges of the Territory Southwest of the river Ohio.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Governor and Judges of the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio shall be, and hereby are, authorized to repeal their laws by them made, whensoever the same may be found to be improper.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the official duties of the Secretaries of the said Territories shall be under the control of such laws, as are or may be in force in the said Territories.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That any one of the Supreme or Superior Judges of the said Territories, in the absence of the other Judges, shall be and hereby is authorized to hold a Court.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of State provide proper seals for the several and respective public offices in the said Territories.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the limitation act, passed by the Governor and Judges of the said Territory, the twenty-eighth day of December, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-eight, be and hereby is disapproved.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the expenses incurred by John Cleves Symmes and George Turner, two of the Judges of the said Territory, in sending an express, and in purchasing a boat to go the Circuit, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety, shall be liquidated by the officers of the Treasury, and paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

Approved, May 8, 1792.

Resolved, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury cause to be provided, for the use of the several collectors in the United States, printed clearances, on the back whereof shall be a printed account of the methods which have been found to answer for obtaining fresh, from salt water, and of constructing extempore stills, of such implements as are generally on board of every vessel, with a recommendation, in all cases, where they shall have occasion to resort to this expedient for obtaining water, to publish the result of their trial in some gazette, on their return to the United States, or to communicate it for publication to the office of the Secretary of State, in order that others may, by their success, be encouraged to make similar trials, and be benefited by any improvements, or new ideas, which may occur to them in practice.

Approved, May 8, 1792.

PUBLIC ACTS OF THE SECOND SESSION OF THE SECOND CONGRESS.

An Act concerning the Registering and Recording of Ships or Vessels.

Be it enacted, &c., That ships or vessels which shall have been registered by virtue of the act, entitled "An act for registering and clearing vessels, regulating the coasting-trade, and for other purposes," and those which, after the last day of March next, shall be registered pursuant to this act, and no other, (except such as shall be duly qualified according to law for carrying on the coasting-trade and fisheries, or one of them,) shall be denominated and deemed ships or vessels of the United States, entitled to the benefits and privileges appertaining to such ships or vessels: Provided, That they shall not continue to enjoy the same longer than they shall continue to be wholly owned and to be commanded by a citizen or citizens of the said States.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That ships or vessels built within the United States, whether before or after the fourth of July, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-six, and belonging wholly to a citizen or citizens thereof, or not built within the said States, but on the sixteenth day of May, in the year one thousand seven hundred and eighty-nine, belonging, and thenceforth continuing to belong, to a citizen or citizens thereof, and ships or vessels which may hereafter be captured in war by such citizen or citizens, and lawfully condemned as prize, or which have been or may be adjudged to be forfeited for a breach of the laws of the United States, being wholly owned by a citizen or citizens thereof, and no other, may be registered as hereinafter directed: Provided, That no such ship or vessel shall be entitled to be so registered, or, if registered, to the benefits thereof, if owned in whole or in part by any citizen of the United States who usually resides in a foreign country, during the continuance of such residence, unless such citizen be in the capacity of a Consul of the United States, or an agent for, and a partner in, some house of trade or co-partnership, consisting of citizens of the said States, actually carrying on trade within the said States: And provided, further, That no ship or vessel built within the United States prior to the said sixteenth day of May, which was not then owned wholly or in part by a citizen or citizens of the United States, shall be capable of being registered, by virtue of any transfer to a citizen or citizens which may hereafter be made, unless by way of prize or forfeiture: Provided, nevertheless, That this shall not be construed to prevent the registering anew of any ship or vessel which was before registered pursuant to the act before mentioned.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That every ship or vessel hereafter to be registered, (except as is hereinafter provided,) shall be registered by the collector of the district in which shall be comprehended the port to which such ship or vessel shall belong at the time of her registry, which port shall be deemed to be that at or nearest to which the owner, if there be but one, or, if more than one, the husband or acting and managing owner of such ship or vessel usually resides; and the name of the said ship or vessel, and of the port to which she shall so belong, shall be painted on her stern, on a black ground, in white letters, of not less than three inches in length; and if any ship or vessel of the United States shall be found without having her name and the name of the port to which she belongs painted in manner aforesaid, the owner or owners shall forfeit fifty dollars, one-half to the person giving the information thereof, the other half to the use of the United States.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That, in order to the registry of any ship or vessel, an oath or affirmation shall be taken and subscribed by the owner, or by one of the owners thereof, before the officer authorized to make such registry, who is hereby empowered to administer the same, declaring, according to the best of the knowledge and belief of the person so swearing or affirming, the name of such ship or vessel, her burden, the place where she was built, if built within the United States, and the year in which she was built, and, if built within the United States before the said sixteenth day of May, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-nine, that she was then owned, wholly or in part, by a citizen or citizens of the United States; and, if not built within the said States, that she was, on the said sixteenth day of May, and ever since hath continued to be, the entire property of a citizen or citizens of the United States; or that she was, at some time posterior to the time when this act shall take effect, [specifying the said time,] captured in war by a citizen or citizens of the said States, and lawfully condemned as prize, [producing a copy of the sentence of condemnation, authenticated in the usual forms,] or that she has been adjudged to be forfeited for a breach of the laws of the United States, [producing a like copy of the sentence whereby she shall have been so adjudged,] and declaring his or her name and place of abode, and, if he or she be the sole owner of the said ship or vessel, that such is the case; or, if there be another owner or other owners, that there is or are such other owner or owners, specifying his, her, or their name or names, and place or places of abode, and that he, she, or they, as the case may be, so swearing or affirming, is or are citizens of the United States; and, where an owner resides in a foreign country, in the capacity of a Consul of the United States, or as an agent for, and a partner in, a house or co-partnership, consisting of citizens of the United States, and actually carrying on trade within the United States, that such is the case, and that there is no subject or citizen of any foreign Prince or

Acts of Congress.

State, directly or indirectly, by way of trust, confidence, or otherwise, interested in such ship or vessel, or in the profits or issues thereof, and that the master or commander thereof is a citizen, naming the said master or commander, and stating the means whereby, or manner in which he is so a citizen; and, in case any of the matters of fact in the said oath or affirmation alleged, which shall be within the knowledge of the party so swearing or affirming, shall not be true, there shall be a forfeiture of the ship or vessel, together with her tackle, furniture, and apparel, in respect to which the same shall have been made, or of the value thereof, to be recovered, with costs of suit, of the person by whom such oath or affirmation shall have been made: Provided, always, That if the master or person having the charge or command of such ship or vessel shall be within the district aforesaid when application shall be made for registering the same, he shall himself make oath or affirmation, instead of the said owner, touching his being a citizen, and the means whereby, or manner in which, he is so a citizen; in which case, if what the said master or person having the said charge or command shall so swear or affirm shall not be true, the forfeiture aforesaid shall not be incurred, but he shall himself forfeit and pay, by reason thereof, the sum of one thousand dollars: And provided further, That, in the case of a ship or vessel, built within the United States prior to the sixteenth day of May aforesaid, which was not then owned by a citizen or citizens of the United States, but which, by virtue of a transfer to such citizen or citizens, shall have been registered pursuant to the act before mentioned, the oath or affirmation hereby required shall and may be varied, according to the truth of the case, as often as it shall be requisite to grant a new register for such ship or vessel.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of every owner, resident within the United States, of any ship or vessel to which a certificate of registry may be granted (in case there be more than one such owner) to transmit to the collector who may have granted the same a like oath or affirmation with that hereinbefore directed to be taken and subscribed by the owner, on whose application such certificate shall have been granted, and within ninety days after the same may have been so granted; which oath or affirmation may, at the option of the party, be taken and subscribed, either before the said collector, or before the collector of some other district, or a Judge of the Supreme or a District Court of the United States, or of a Superior Court of original jurisdiction of some one of the States; and if such oath or affirmation shall not be taken, subscribed, and transmitted, as is herein required, the certificate of registry granted to such ship or vessel shall be forfeit and void.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That, before any ship or vessel shall be registered, she shall be measured by a surveyor, if there be one, or by the person he shall appoint, at the port or place where the said ship or vessel may be, and, if there be none, by such person as the collector of the district within which she may be shall appoint, according to the rule prescribed by the forty-third section of the act entitled "An act to provide more effectually for the collection of the duties imposed by law on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels;" and the officer or person by whom such admeasurement shall be made shall, for the information of, and as a voucher to, the officer by whom the registry is to be made, grant a certificate, specifying the build of such ship or vessel, her number of decks and masts, her length, breadth, depth, the number of tons she measures, and such other particulars as are usually descriptive of the identity of a ship or vessel; and that her name and the place to which she belongs are painted on her stern, in manner required by the third section of this act; which certificate shall be countersigned by an owner, or by the master of such ship or vessel, or by some other person who shall attend her admeasurement, on behalf of her owner or owners, in testimony of the truth of the particulars therein contained; without which the said certificate shall not be valid; but, in all cases where a ship or vessel has before been registered as a ship or vessel of the United States, it shall not be necessary to measure her anew for the purpose of obtaining another register, except such ship or vessel shall have undergone some alteration, as to her burden, subsequent to the time of her former registry.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That, previous to the registry of any ship or vessel, the husband or acting and managing owner, together with the master thereof, and one or more sureties, to the satisfaction of the collector of the district, whose duty it is to make such registry, shall become bound to the United States, if such ship or vessel shall be of burden not exceeding fifty tons, in the sum of four hundred dollars; if of burden above fifty tons, and not exceeding one hundred, in the sum of eight hundred dollars; if of burden above one hundred tons, and not exceeding two hundred, in the sum of twelve hundred dollars; if of burden above two hundred tons, and not exceeding three hundred, in the sum of sixteen hundred dollars; and if of burden exceeding three hundred tons, in the sum of two thousand dollars; with condition, in each case, that the certificate of such registry shall be solely used for the ship or vessel for which it is granted, and shall not be sold, lent, or otherwise disposed of, to any person or persons whomsoever; and that in case such ship or vessel shall be lost, or taken by an enemy, burnt, or broken up, or shall be otherwise prevented from returning to the port to which she may belong, the said certificate, if preserved, shall be delivered up within eight days after the arrival of the master or person having the charge or command of such ship or vessel, within any district of the United States, to the collector of such district: and that if any foreigner, or any person or persons, for the use and benefit of such foreigner, shall purchase, or otherwise become entitled to the whole, or any part or share of, or interest in, such ship or vessel, the same being within a district of the United States, the said certificate shall, in such case, within seven days after such purchase, change, or transfer of property, be delivered up to the collector of the said district; and that if any such purchase, change, or transfer of property, shall happen when such ship or vessel shall be at any foreign port or place, or at sea, then the said master, or person having the charge or command thereof, shall, within eight days after his arrival within any district of the United States, deliver up the said certificate to the collector of such district; and every such certificate, so delivered up, shall be forthwith transmitted to the Register of the Treasury, to be cancelled, who, if the same shall have been delivered up to a collector other than of the district in which it was granted, shall cause notice of such delivery to be given to the collector of the said district.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That, in order to the registry of any ship or vessel which, after the last day of March next, shall be built within the United States, it shall be necessary to produce a certificate, under the hand of the principal or master-carpenter, by whom or under whose direction the said ship or vessel shall have been built, testifying that she was built by him, or under his direction, and specifying the place where, the time when, and the person or persons for whom, and describing her build, number of decks and masts, length, breadth, depth, tonnage, and such other circumstances as are usually descriptive of the identity of a ship or vessel; which certificate shall be sufficient to authorize the removal of a new vessel from the district where she may be built to another district, in the same or an adjoining State, where the owner or owners actually reside, provided it be with ballast only.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the several matters herein before required having been complied with, in order to the registering of any ship or vessel, the collector of the district comprehending the port to which she shall belong, shall make and keep, in some proper book, a record or registry thereof, and shall grant an abstract or certificate of such record or registry, as nearly as may be, in the form following:

"In pursuance of an act of the Congress of the United States of America, entitled 'An act concerning the registering and recording of ships or vessels,' [inserting here the name, occupation, and place of abode of the person by whom the oath or affirmation aforesaid shall have been made,] having taken or subscribed the oath (or affirmation) required by the said act, and having sworn (or affirmed) that he (or she, and if more than one owner, adding the words "together with," and the name or names, occupation or occupations, place or places of abode, of the other owner or owners) is (or are) the only owner (or owners) of the ship or vessel called the [inserting here her name] of [inserting here the port to which she may belong] whereof [inserting here the name of the master] is at present master, and is a citizen of the United States, and that the said ship or vessel was [inserting here when and where built] and [inserting here the name and office, if any, of the person by whom she shall have been surveyed or admeasured] having certified that the said ship or vessel has [inserting here the number of decks] and [inserting here the number of masts] and that her length is [inserting here the number of feet] her breadth [inserting here the number of feet] her depth [inserting here the number of feet] and that she measures [inserting here her number of tons] that she is [describing here the particular kind of vessel, whether ship, brigantine, snow, schooner, sloop, or whatever else, together with her build, and specifying whether she has any, or no gallery or head] and the said [naming the owner, or the master, or other person acting in behalf of the owner or owners, by whom the certificate of admeasurement shall have been countersigned as aforesaid] having agreed to the description and admeasurement above specified, and sufficient security having been given, according to the said act, the said ship or vessel has been duly registered at the port of [naming the port where registered.] Given under my hand and seal, at [naming the said port] this [inserting the particular day] day of [naming the month] in the year [specifying the number of the year in words at length:"] Provided, That if the master or person having the charge or command of such ship or vessel shall, himself, have made oath or affirmation touching his being a citizen, the wording of the said certificate shall be varied so as to be conformable to the truth of the case: And provided, That where a new certificate of registry is granted, in consequence of any transfer of a ship or vessel, the words shall be so varied as to refer to the former certificate of registry, for her admeasurement.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be prepared and transmitted, from time to time, to the collectors of the several districts, a sufficient number of forms of the said certificates of registry, attested under the seal of the Treasury and the hand of the Register thereof, with proper blanks, to be filled by the said collectors, respectively, by whom also the said certificates shall be signed and sealed before they shall be issued; and where there is a naval officer at any port, they shall be countersigned by him; and where there is a surveyor, but no naval officer, they shall be countersigned by him; and a copy of each shall be transmitted to the said Register, who shall cause a record to be kept of the same.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That where any citizen or citizens of the United States shall purchase, or become owner or owners of any ship or vessel entitled to be registered by virtue of this act, such ship or vessel, being within any district other than the one in which he or they usually reside, such ship or vessel shall be entitled to be registered by the collector of the district where such ship or vessel may be at the time of his or their becoming owner or owners thereof, upon his or their complying with the provisions herein before prescribed, in order to the registry of ships or vessels: And the oath or affirmation which is required to be taken may, at the option of such own-or owners, be taken either before the collector of the district comprehending the port to which such ship or vessel may belong, or before the collector of the district within which such ship or vessel may be, either of whom is hereby empowered to administer the same: Provided nevertheless, That whenever such ship or vessel shall arrive within the district comprehending the port to which such ship or vessel shall belong, the certificate of registry, which shall have been obtained as aforesaid, shall be delivered up to the collector of such district, who, upon the requisites of this act in order to the registry of ships or vessels being complied with, shall grant a new one in lieu of the first; and the certificate so delivered up shall forthwith be returned by the collector who shall receive the same, to the collector who shall have granted it: and if the said first mentioned certificate of registry shall not be delivered up as above directed, the owner or owners, and the master of such ship or vessel, at the time of her said arrival within the district comprehending the port to which such ship or vessel may belong, shall, severally, forfeit the sum of one hundred dollars, to be recovered with costs of suit; and the said certificate of registry shall be thenceforth void. And in case any of the matters of fact in the said oath or affirmation alleged, which shall be within the knowledge of the party so swearing or affirming, shall not be true, there shall be a forfeiture of the ship or vessel, together with her tackle, furniture, and apparel, in respect to which the same shall have been made, or of the value thereof, to be recovered, with costs of suit, of the person by whom such oath or affirmation shall have been made: Provided, always, That if the master or person having the charge or command of such ship or vessel, shall be within the district aforesaid when application shall be made for registering the same, he shall, himself, make oath or affirmation, instead of the said owner, touching his being a citizen, and the means whereby, or manner in which, he is so a citizen; in which case, if what the said master or person having the said charge or command shall so swear or affirm shall not be true, the forfeiture aforesaid shall not be incurred, but he shall, himself, forfeit and pay, by reason thereof, the sum of one thousand dollars.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That when any ship or vessel, entitled to be registered, pursuant to this act, shall be purchased by an agent or attorney for, or on account of a citizen or citizens of the United States, such ship or vessel, being in a district of the United States more than fifty miles distant, taking the nearest usual route by land, from the one comprehending the port to which, by virtue of such purchase, and by force of this act, such ship or vessel ought to be deemed to belong, it shall be lawful for the collector of the district, where such ship or vessel may be, and he is hereby required, upon the application of such agent or attorney, to proceed to the registering of the said ship or vessel, the said agent or attorney first complying, on behalf, and in the stead of, the owner or owners thereof, with the requisites prescribed by this act in order to the registry of ships or vessels, except, that in the oath or affirmation, which shall be taken by the said agent or attorney, instead of swearing or affirming that he is owner, or an owner of such ship or vessel, he shall swear or affirm that he is agent or attorney for the owner or owners thereof, and that he hath bona fide purchased the said ship or vessel for the person or persons whom he shall name and describe as the owner or owners thereof: Provided, nevertheless, That whenever such ship or vessel shall arrive within the district comprehending the port to which such ship or vessel shall belong, the certificate of registry, which shall have been obtained as aforesaid, shall be delivered up to the collector of such district, who, upon the requisites of this act, in order to the registry of ships or vessels, being complied with, shall grant a new one, in lieu of the first; and the certificate, so delivered up, shall forthwith be returned by the collector, who shall transmit the same to the collector who shall have granted it. And if the said first mentioned certificate of registry shall not be delivered up, as above directed, the owner or owners, and the master of such ship or vessel, at the time of her said arrival within the district comprehending the port to which she may belong, shall, severally, forfeit the sum of one hundred dollars, to be recovered, with costs of suit, and the said certificate of registry shall be thenceforth void. And in case any of the matters of fact in the said oath or affirmation alleged, which shall be within the knowledge of the party so swearing or affirming, shall not be true, there shall be a forfeiture of the ship or vessel, together with her tackle, furniture, and apparel, in respect to which the same shall have been made, or of the value thereof, to be recovered, with costs of suit, of the person by whom such oath or affirmation shall have been made: Provided, always, That if the master, or person having the charge or command of such ship or vessel, shall be within the district aforesaid, when application shall be made for registering the same, he shall himself make oath or affirmation, instead of the said agent or attorney, touching his being a citizen, and the means whereby, or manner in which, he is so a citizen; in which case, if what the said master, or person having the said charge or command, shall so swear or affirm, shall not be true, the forfeiture aforesaid shall not be incurred, but he shall, himself, forfeit and pay, by reason thereof, the sum of one thousand dollars.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That if the certificate of the registry of any ship or vessel shall be lost or destroyed, or mislaid, the master, or other person having the charge or command thereof, may make oath or affirmation, before the collector of the district where such ship or vessel shall first be after such loss, destruction, or mislaying, who is hereby authorized to administer the same, which oath or affirmation shall be of the form following: "I [inserting here the name of the person swearing or affirming] being master [or having the charge or command] of the ship or vessel, called the [inserting the name of the vessel] do swear (or affirm) that the said ship or vessel hath been, as I verily believe, registered, according to law, by the name of [inserting again the name of the vessel] and that a certificate thereof was granted by the collector of the district of [naming the district where registered] which certificate has been lost [or destroyed, or unintentionally and by mere accident mislaid, as the case may be] and [except where the certificate is alleged to have been destroyed] that the same, if found again, and within my power, shall be delivered up to the collector of the district in which it was granted." Which oath or affirmation shall be subscribed by the party making the same: and upon such oath or affirmation being made, and the other requisites of this act, in order to the registry of ships or vessels, being complied with, it shall be lawful for the collector of the district, before whom such oath or affirmation is made, to grant a new register, inserting therein, that the same is issued in the room of the one lost or destroyed. But in all cases where a register shall be granted, in lieu of the one lost or destroyed, by any other than the collector of the district to which the ship or vessel actually belongs, such register shall, within ten days after her first arrival within the district to which she belongs, be delivered up to the collector of the said district, who shall, thereupon, grant a new register, in lieu thereof. And in case the master or commander shall neglect to deliver up such register, within the time aforesaid, he shall forfeit one hundred dollars; and the former register shall become null and void.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That when any ship or vessel, which shall have been registered pursuant to this act, or the act hereby in part repealed, shall, in whole or in part, be sold or transferred to a citizen or citizens of the United States, or shall be altered in form or burden, by being lengthened or built upon, or from one denomination to another, by the mode or method of rigging or fitting, in every such case the said ship or vessel shall be registered anew, by her former name, according to the directions herein before contained, (otherwise she shall cease to be deemed a ship or vessel of the United States,) and her former certificate of registry shall be delivered up to the collector to whom application for such new registry shall be made, at the time that the same shall be made, to be by him transmitted to the Register of the Treasury, who shall cause the same to be cancelled. And in every such case of sale or transfer, there shall be some instrument of writing, in the nature of a bill of sale, which shall recite, at length, the said certificate, otherwise the said ship or vessel shall be incapable of being so registered anew. And in every case in which a ship or vessel is hereby required to be registered anew, if she shall not be so registered anew, she shall not be entitled to any of the privileges or benefits of a ship or vessel of the United States; and further, if her said former certificate of registry shall not be delivered up as aforesaid, except where the same may have been destroyed, lost, or unintentionally mislaid, and an oath or affirmation thereof shall have been made as aforesaid, the owner or owners of such ship or vessel shall forfeit and pay the sum of five hundred dollars, to be recovered with costs of suit.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That when the master or person having the charge or command of a ship or vessel, registered pursuant to this act, or the act hereby in part repealed, shall be changed, the owner or one of the owners, or the new master of such ship or vessel, shall report such change to the collector of the district where the same shall happen, or where the said ship or vessel shall first be, after the same shall have happened, and shall produce to him the certificate of registry of such ship or vessel, and shall make oath or affirmation, showing that such new master is a citizen of the United States, and the manner in which, or means whereby, he is so a citizen; whereupon the said collector shall endorse upon the said certificate of registry a memorandum of such change, specifying the name of such new master, and shall subscribe the said memorandum with his name, and if other than the collector of the district, by whom the said certificate of registry shall have been granted, shall transmit a copy of the said memorandum to him, with notice of the particular ship or vessel to which it shall relate; and the collector of the district, by whom the said certificate shall have been granted, shall make a like memorandum of such change, in his book of registers, and shall transmit a copy thereof to the Register of the Treasury. And if the said change shall not be reported, or if the said oath or affirmation shall not be taken, as above directed, the registry of such ship or vessel shall be void, and the said master, or person having the charge or command of her, shall forfeit and pay the sum of one hundred dollars.

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That if any ship or vessel, heretofore registered, or which shall hereafter be registered as a ship or vessel of the United States, shall be sold or transferred, in whole or in part, by way of trust, confidence, or otherwise, to a subject or citizen of any foreign Prince or State, and such sale or transfer shall not be made known in manner hereinbefore directed, such ship or vessel, together with her tackle, apparel, and furniture, shall be forfeited: Provided, That if such ship or vessel shall be owned in part only, and it shall be made appear to the jury before whom the trial for such forfeiture shall be had, that any other owner of such ship or vessel, being a citizen of the United States, was wholly ignorant of the sale or transfer to, or ownership of, such foreign subject or citizen, the share or interest of such citizen of the United States shall not be subject to such forfeiture; and the residue only shall be so forfeited.

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That upon the entry of every ship or vessel of the United States, from any foreign port or place, if the same shall be at the port or place at which the owner, or any of the part-owners reside, such owner or part-owner shall make oath or affirmation, that the register of such ship or vessel contains the name or names of all the persons who are then owners of the said ship or vessel; or if any part of such ship or vessel has been sold or transferred since the granting of such register, that such is the case, and that no foreign subject or citizen hath, to the best of his knowledge and belief, any share, by the way of trust, confidence, or otherwise, in such ship or vessel. And if the owner, or any part-owner, shall not reside at the port or place at which such ship or vessel shall enter, then the master or commander shall make oath or affirmation to the like effect. And if the owner, or part-owner, where there is one, or the master or commander, where there is no owner, shall refuse to swear or affirm as aforesaid, such ship or vessel shall not be entitled to the privileges of a ship or vessel of the United States.

SEC. 18. And be it further enacted, That in all cases where the master, commander, or owner of a ship or vessel, shall deliver up the register of such ship or vessel, agreeably to the provisions of this act, if to the collector of the district where the same shall have been granted, the said collector shall, thereupon, cancel the bond which shall have been given at the time of granting such register; or, if to the collector of any other district, such collector shall grant to the said master, commander, or owner, a receipt or acknowledgment, that such register has been delivered up to him, and the time when; and upon such receipt being produced to the collector by whom the register was granted, he shall cancel the bond of the party, as if the register had been returned to him.

SEC. 19. And be it further enacted, That the collector of each district shall progressively number the certificates of the registry by him granted, beginning anew at the commencement of each year, and shall enter an exact copy of each certificate in a book to be kept for that purpose; and shall, once in three months, transmit to the Register of the Treasury copies of all the certificates which shall have been granted by him, including the number of each.

SEC. 20. And be it further enacted, That every ship or vessel built in the United States after the fifteenth day of August, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-nine, and belonging wholly or in part to the subjects of foreign Powers, in order to be entitled to the benefits of a ship built and recorded in the United States, shall be recorded in the office of the collector of the district in which such ship or vessel was built, in manner following, that is to say: The builder of every such ship or vessel shall make oath or affirmation before the collector of such district, who is hereby authorized to administer the same, in manner following: "I, [inserting here the name of such builder,] of [inserting here the place of his residence] shipwright, do swear (or affirm) that [describing here the kind of vessel, as, whether ship, brig, snow, schooner, sloop, or whatever else,] named [inserting here the name of the ship or vessel] having [inserting here the number of decks] and being in length [inserting here the number of feet,] in breadth, [inserting here the number of feet,] in depth, [inserting here the number of feet,] and measuring [inserting here the number of tons,] having [specifying whether any or no] gallery, and [also specifying whether any or no] head, was built by me, or under my direction, at [naming the place, county, and State] in the United States, in the year [inserting here the number of the year.]" Which oath or affirmation shall be subscribed by the person making the same, and shall be recorded in a book to be kept by the said collector for that purpose.

SEC. 21. And be it further enacted, That the said collector shall cause the said ship or vessel to be surveyed or admeasured, according to the rule prescribed by the forty-third section of the act, entitled "An act to provide more effectually for the collection of the duties imposed by law on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels;" and the person by whom such admeasurement shall be made, shall grant a certificate thereof, as in the case of a ship or vessel to be registered; which certificate shall be countersigned by the said builder, and by an owner, or the master, or person having the command or charge thereof, or by some other person, being an agent for the owner or owners thereof, in testimony of the truth of the particulars therein contained.

SEC. 22. And be it further enacted, That a certificate of the said record, attested under the hand and seal of the said collector, shall be granted to the master of every such ship or vessel, as nearly as may be, of the form following: "In pursuance of an act, entitled 'An act concerning the recording of ships or vessels,' I, [inserting here the name of the collector of the district,] of [inserting here the name of the district,] in the United States, do certify, that [inserting here the name of the builder] of [inserting here the place of his residence, county, and State,] having sworn (or affirmed) that the [describing the ship or vessel, as in the certificate of record,] named [inserting here her name] whereof [inserting here the name of the master] is at present master, was built at [inserting here the name of the place, county, and State, where built] by him, or under his direction, in the year, [inserting here the number of the year,] and [inserting here the name of the surveyor or other person by whom the same admeasurement shall have been made,] having certified that the said ship or vessel has [inserting here her number of decks] is in length, [inserting here the number of feet,] in breadth, [inserting here the number of feet,] in depth, [inserting here the number of feet,] and measures [inserting here the number of tons;] and the said builder and [naming and describing the owner or master, or agent for the owner or owners, as the case may be, by whom the said certificate shall have been countersigned] having agreed to the said description and admeasurement, the said ship or vessel has been recorded, in the district of [inserting here the name of the district where recorded,] in the United States. Witness my hand and seal this [inserting here the day of the month,] day of [inserting here the name of the month,] in the year [inserting here the number of the year.]" Which certificate shall be recorded in the office of the said collector, and a duplicate thereof transmitted to the Register of the Treasury of the United States, to be recorded in his office.

Acts of Congress.

Sec. 23. And be it further enacted, That if the master, or the name, of any ship or vessel so recorded shall be changed, the owner, part-owner, or consignee of such ship or vessel, shall cause a memorandum thereof to be endorsed on the certificate of the record, by the collector of the district, where such ship or vessel may be, or at which she shall first arrive, if such change took place in a foreign country; and a copy thereof shall be entered in the Book of Records, a transcript whereof shall be transmitted, by the said collector, to the collector of the district, where such certificate was granted, (if not the same person,) who shall enter the same in his Book of Records, and forward a duplicate of such entry, to the Register of the Treasury of the United States; and in such case, until the said owner, part-owner, or consignee, shall cause the said memorandum to be made by the collector, in manner aforesaid, such ship or vessel shall not be deemed, or considered, as a vessel recorded, in pursuance of this act.

Sec. 24. And be it further enacted, That the master, or other person having the command or charge of any ship or vessel, recorded in pursuance of this act, shall, on entry of such ship or vessel, produce the certificate of such record, to the collector of the district, where she shall be so entered; in failure of which, the said ship or vessel shall not be entitled to the privileges of a vessel, recorded as aforesaid: Provided always, and be it further enacted, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to make it necessary to record, a second time, any ship or vessel, which shall have been recorded, pursuant to the act, hereby in part repealed; but such recording shall be of the like force and effect, as if made in pursuance to this act.

Sec. 25. And be it further enacted, That the fees and allowances for the several services to be performed pursuant to this act, and the distribution of the same, shall be as follows, to wit: For the admeasurement of every ship or vessel, of one hundred tons and under, one cent per ton; for the admeasurement of every ship or vessel above one hundred, and not exceeding two hundred tons, one hundred and fifty cents; for the admeasurement of every ship or vessel, above two hundred tons, two hundred cents; for every certificate of registry or record, two hundred cents; for every endorsement upon a certificate of registry or record, one hundred cents; and for taking every bond required by this act, twenty-five cents. The whole amount of which fees shall be received, and accounted for by the collector, or, at his option, by the naval officer, where there is one; and where there is a collector, naval officer, and surveyor, shall be equally divided, monthly, between the said officers; and where there is no naval officer, two-thirds to the collector, and the other third to the surveyor; and where there is only a collector, he shall receive the whole amount thereof; and where there is more than one surveyor in any district, each of them shall receive his proportionable part of such fees, as shall arise in the port, for which he is appointed: Provided, always, That, in all cases, where the tonnage of any ship or vessel shall be ascertained, by any person appointed for that purpose, such person shall be paid a reasonable compensation therefor, out of the fees aforesaid, before any distribution thereof, as aforesaid. And every collector and naval officer, and every surveyor, who shall reside at a port where there is no collector, shall cause to be affixed, and constantly kept, in some conspicuous part of his office, a fair table of the rates of fees, demandable by this act.

Sec. 26. And be it further enacted, That every collector, or officer, who shall knowingly make, or be concerned in making, any false register or record, or shall knowingly grant, or be concerned in granting, any false certificate of registry or record of, or for any ship or vessel, or other false document whatsoever, touching the same, contrary to the true intent and meaning of this act, or who shall designedly take any other, or greater fees, than are by this act allowed, or who shall receive any voluntary reward or gratuity for any of the services performed pursuant thereto; and every surveyor, or other person, appointed to measure any ship or vessel, who shall wilfully deliver to any collector or naval officer, a false description of such ship or vessel, to be registered or recorded, shall, upon conviction of any such neglect or offence, forfeit the sum of one thousand dollars, and be rendered incapable of serving in any office of trust or profit, under the United States; and if any person or persons, authorized and required by this act, in respect to his or their office or offices, to perform any act or thing, required to be done or performed, pursuant to any of the provisions of this act, shall wilfully neglect to do or perform the same, according to the true intent and meaning of this act, such person or persons shall, on being duly convicted thereof, if not subject to the penalty and disqualification aforesaid, forfeit the sum of five hundred dollars for the first offence, and a like sum for the second offence, and shall, thenceforth, be rendered incapable of holding any office of trust or profit under the United States.

Sec. 27. And be it further enacted, That, if any certificate of registry or record, shall be fraudulently or knowingly used for any ship or vessel, not then actually entitled to the benefit thereof, according to the true intent of this act, such ship or vessel shall be forfeited to the United States, with her tackle, apparel, and furniture.

Sec. 28. And be it further enacted, That, if any person or persons shall falsely make oath or affirmation to any of the matters herein required to be verified, such person or persons shall suffer the like pains and penalties as shall be incurred by persons committing wilful and corrupt perjury; and that, if any person or persons shall forge, counterfeit, erase, alter, or falsify any certificate, register, record, or other document, mentioned, described, or authorized, in and by this act, such person or persons shall, for every such offence, forfeit the sum of five hundred dollars.

Sec. 29. And be it further enacted, That all the penalties and forfeitures, which may be incurred, for offences against this act, shall and may be sued for, prosecuted, and recovered, in such Courts, and be disposed of in such manner, as any penal-

An Act regulating Foreign Coins, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the first day of July next, foreign gold and silver coins shall pass current as money within the United States, and be a legal tender for the payment of all debts and demands, at the several and respective rates following, and not otherwise, viz: The gold coins of Great Britain and Portugal, of their present standard, at the rate of one hundred cents for every twenty-seven grains of the actual weight thereof; the gold coins of France, Spain, and the dominions of Spain, of their present standard, at the rate of one hundred cents for every twenty-seven grains and two-fifths of a grain of the actual weight thereof. Spanish milled dollars, at the rate of one hundred cents for each dollar, the actual weight whereof shall not be less than seventeen penny weights and seven grains; and in proportion for the parts of a dollar. Crowns of France, at the rate of one hundred and ten cents, for each crown, the actual weight whereof shall not be less than eighteen pennyweights and seventeen grains, and in proportion for the parts of a crown. But no foreign coin that may have been, or shall be issued subsequent to the first day of January, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, shall be a tender, as aforesaid, until samples thereof shall have been found, by assay, at the Mint of the United States, to be conformable to the respective standards required, and proclamation thereof shall have been made by the President of the United States.

SEC. 2. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That at the expiration of three years next ensuing the time when the coinage of gold and silver, agreeably to the act, entitled, "An act establishing a Mint, and regulating the coins of the United States," shall commence at the Mint of the United States, (which time shall be announced by the proclamation of the President of the United States) all foreign gold coins, and all foreign silver coins, except Spanish milled dollars and parts of such dollars, shall cease to be a legal tender, as aforesaid.

Acts of Congress.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That all foreign gold and silver coins, (except Spanish milled dollars, and parts of such dollars) which shall be received in payment for moneys due to the United States, after the said time, when the coining of gold and silver coins shall begin at the Mint of the United States, shall, previously to their being issued in circulation, be coined anew, in conformity to the act, entitled "An act establishing a Mint and regulating the coins of the United States."

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the first day of July next, the fifty-fifth section of the act, entitled, "An act to provide more effectually for the collection of the duties imposed by law on goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States," which ascertains the rates at which foreign gold and silver coins shall be received for the duties and fees to be collected in virtue of the said act, be, and the same is hereby repealed.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the assay provided to be made by the act, entitled "An act establishing a Mint, and regulating the coins of the United States," shall commence in the manner as by the said act is prescribed, on the second Monday of February annually, anything in the said act to the contrary notwithstanding.

Approved, February 9, 1793.

An Act relative to claims against the United States, not barred by any act of limitation, and which have not been already adjusted.

Be it enacted, &c., That all claims upon the United States for services or supplies, or for other cause, matter, or thing, furnished or done previous to the fourth day of March, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-nine, whether founded upon certificates or other written documents from public officers, or otherwise, which have not already been barred by any act of limitation, and which shall not be presented at the Treasury before the first day of May, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, shall forever after be barred and precluded from settlement or allowance: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to affect Loan Office certificates, certificates of final settlement, indents of interest, balances entered in the books of the Register of the Treasury, certificates issued by the Register of the Treasury, commonly called registered certificates, Loans of money obtained in foreign countries, or certificates issued pursuant to the act entitled "An act making provision for the Debt of the United States: And provided, further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prohibit the proper officers of the Treasury from demanding an account or accounts to be rendered for any moneys heretofore advanced, and not accounted for, or from admitting, under the usual forms and restrictions, credits for expenditures, equal to the sums which have been so advanced.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Auditor of the Treasury to receive all such claims aforesaid, as have not been heretofore barred by any act of limitation, as shall be presented before the time aforesaid, with the certificates or other documents in support thereof, and to cause a record to be made of the names of the persons, and of the time when the said claims are presented; which record shall be made in the presence of the person or persons presenting the same, and shall be the only evidence that the said claims were presented, during the time limited by this act.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the accounting officers of the Treasury, to make report to Congress upon all such of the said claims as shall not be allowed to be valid, according to the usual forms of the Treasury.

Approved, February 12, 1793.

An Act respecting fugitives from justice, and persons escaping from the service of their masters.

Be it enacted, &c., That, whenever the Executive authority of any State in the Union, or of either of the Territories Northwest or South of the river Ohio, shall demand any person as a fugitive from justice, of the Executive authority of any such State or Territory to which such person shall have fled, and shall moreover produce the copy of an indictment found, or an affidavit made before a magistrate of any State or Territory as aforesaid, charging the person so demanded with having committed treason, felony, or other crime, certified as authentic by the Governor or Chief Magistrate of the State or Territory from whence the person so charged fled, it shall be the duty of the executive authority of the State or Territory to which such person shall have fled, to cause him or her to be arrested and secured, and notice of the arrest to be given to the Executive authority making such demand, or to the agent of such authority, appointed to receive the fugitive, and to cause the fugitive to be delivered to such agent when he shall appear; but, if no such agent shall appear within six months from the time of the arrest, the prisoner may be discharged: and all costs or expenses incurred in the apprehending, securing, and transmitting such fugitive to the State or Territory making such demand, shall be paid by such State or Territory.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That any agent appointed as aforesaid, who shall receive the fugitive into his custody, shall be empowered to transport him or her to the State or Territory from which he or she shall have fled. And if any person or persons shall, by force, set at liberty, or rescue the fugitive from such agent while transporting, as aforesaid, the person or persons so offending shall, on conviction, be fined not exceeding five hundred dollars, and be imprisoned not exceeding one year.

Sec. 3. And be it also enacted, That when a person held to labor in any of the United States, or in either of the Territories on the Northwest or South of the river Ohio, under the laws thereof, shall escape into any other of the said States or Territory, the person to whom such labor or service may be due, his agent or attorney, is hereby empowered to seize or arrest such fugitive from labor, and to take him or her before any Judge of the Circuit or District Courts of the United States, residing or being within the State, or before any magistrate of a county, city, or town corporate, wherein such seizure or arrest shall be made, and upon proof to the satisfaction of such Judge or magistrate, either by oral testimony or affidavit taken before and certified by a magistrate of any such State or Territory, that the person so seized or arrested, doth, under the laws of the State or Territory from which he or she fled, owe service or labor to the person claiming him or her, it shall be the duty of such Judge or magistrate to give a certificate thereof to such claimant, his agent, or attorney, which shall be sufficient warrant for removing the said fugitive from labor to the State or Territory from which he or she fled.

Sec. 4. And be further enacted, That any person who shall knowingly and willingly obstruct or hinder such claimant, his agent or attorney, in so seizing or arresting such fugitive from labor, or shall rescue such fugitive from such claimant, his agent or attorney, when so arrested pursuant to the authority herein given or declared; or shall harbor or conceal such person after notice that he or she was a fugitive from labor, as aforesaid, shall, for either of the said offences, forfeit and pay the sum of five hundred dollars. Which penalty may be recovered by and for the benefit of such claimant, by action of debt, in any Court proper to try the same, saving moreover to the person claiming such labor or service his right of action for or on account of the said injuries, or either of them.

Approved, February 12, 1793.

An Act for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the Coasting Trade and Fisheries, and for regulating the same.

Be it enacted, &c., That ships or vessels, enrolled by virtue of "An act for registering and clearing vessels, regulating the coasting trade, and for other purposes," and those of twenty tons and upwards, which shall be enrolled after the last day of May next, in pursuance of this act, and having a license in force, or if less than twenty tons, not being enrolled, shall have a license in force, as is hereinafter required, and no others, shall be deemed ships or vessels of the United States, entitled to the privileges of ships or vessels employed in the coasting trade or fisheries.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the last day of May next, in order for the enrolment of any ship or vessel, she shall possess the same qualifications, and the same requisites, in all respects, shall be complied with, as are made necessary for registering ships or vessels, by the act, entitled "An act concerning the registering and recording of ships or vessels," and the same duties and authorities are hereby given and imposed on all officers, respectively, in relation to such enrolments, and the same proceedings shall be had, in similar cases, touching such enrolments; and the ships or vessels so enrolled, with the master, or owner, or owners thereof, shall be subject to the same requisites, as are in those respects provided for vessels registered by virtue of the aforesaid act; the record of which enrolment shall be made, and an abstract or copy thereof granted, as nearly as may be, in the form following: "Enrolment in conformity to an act of the Congress of the United States of America," entitled "An act for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels, to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same," [inserting here the name of the person, with his occupation and place of abode, by whom the oath or affirmation is to be made] having taken and subscribed the oath, (or affirmation) required by this act, and having sworn (or affirmed) that he, or (she, and if more than one owner, adding the words "together with," and the name or names, occupation or occupations, place or places of abode, of the owner owners) is, (or are) a citizen (or citizens) of the United States, and sole owner (or owners) of the ship or vessel, called the [inserting here her name] of [inserting here the name of the port, to which she may belong] whereof [inserting here the name of the master] is at present master, and is a citizen of the United States, and that the said ship or vessel was [inserting here when and where built] and [inserting here, the name and office, if any, of the person, by whom she shall have been surveyed or admeasured] having certified, that the said ship or vessel has [inserting here, the number of decks] and [inserting here, the number of masts] and that her length is [inserting here, the number of feet] her breadth [inserting here, the number of feet] her depth [inserting here, the number of feet] and that she measures [inserting here, her number of tons] that she is [describing here, the particular kind of vessel, whether ship, brigantine, snow, schooner, sloop, or whatever else, together with her build, and specifying, whether she has any or no gallery or head] and the said [naming the owner, or the master, or other person acting in behalf of the owner or owners, by whom the certificate of admeasurement shall have been countersigned] having agreed to the description and admeasurement above specified, and sufficient security having been given, according to the said act, the said ship or vessel has been duly enrolled, at the port of [naming the port where enrolled.] Given under my hand and seal, at [naming the said port] this [inserting the particular day] day of [naming the month] in the year, [specifying the number of the year, in words at length.]"

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for the collectors of the several districts, to enrol and license any ship or vessel, that may be registered, upon such registry being given up, or to register any ship or vessel, that may be enrolled, upon such enrolment and license being given up. And when any ship or vessel shall be an any other district, than the one, to which she belongs, the collector of such district, on the application of the master or commander thereof, and upon his taking an oath or affirmation, that accord-

Given under my hand and seal, at [naming the said district] this [inserting the particular day] day of [naming the month] in the year, [specifying the number of the year, in words at length.]"

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That no license, granted to any ship or vessel, shall be considered in force, any longer than such ship or vessel is owned, and of the description set forth in such license, or for carrying on any other business or employment, than that for which she is specially licensed, and if any ship or vessel be found with a forged or altered license, or making use of a license granted for any other ship or vessel, such ship or vessel, with her tackle, apparel, and the cargo found on board her, shall be forfeited.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That, after the last day of May next, every ship or vessel of twenty tons or upwards (other than such as are registered) found trading between district and district, or between different places in the same district, or carrying on the fishery, without being enrolled and licensed, or if less than twenty tons, and not less than five tons, without a license, in manner as is provided by this act, such ship or vessel, if laden with goods, the growth or manufacture of the United States only (distilled spirits excepted) or in ballast, shall pay the same fees and tonnage in every port of the United States, at which she may arrive, as ships or vessels not belonging to a citizen or citizens of the United States, and if she have on board any articles of foreign growth or manufacture, or distilled spirits, other than sea-stores, the ship or vessel, together with her tackle, apparel and furniture, and the lading found on board, shall be forfeited: Provided, however, if such ship or vessel be at sea, at the expiration of the time, for which the license was given, and the master of such ship or vessel shall swear or affirm that such was the case, and shall also within forty-eight hours after his arrival deliver to the collector of the district in which he shall first arrive the license which shall have expired, the forfeiture aforesaid shall not be incurred, nor shall the ship or vessel be liable to pay the fees and tonnage aforesaid.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the collector of each district shall progressively number the licenses by him granted, beginning anew at the commencement of each year, and shall make a record thereof in a book, to be by him kept for that purpose, and shall, once in three months, transmit to the Register of the Treasury, copies of the licenses, which shall have been so granted by him; and also of such licenses, as shall have been given up or returned to him, respectively, in pursuance of this act. And where any ship or vessel shall be licensed, or enrolled anew, or being licensed or enrolled, shall afterwards be registered, or being registered, shall afterwards be enrolled, or licensed, she shall, in every such case, be enrolled, licensed or registered by her former name.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That, if any ship or vessel, enrolled or licensed, as aforesaid, shall proceed on a foreign voyage, without first giving up her enrolment and license, to the collector of the district comprehending the port, from which she is about to proceed on such foreign voyage, and being duly registered by such collector, every such ship or vessel, together with her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and the goods, wares, and merchandise, so imported therein, shall be liable to seizure and forfeiture: Provided, always, If the port, from which such ship or vessel is about to proceed on such foreign voyage, be not within the district, where such ship or vessel is enrolled, the collector of such district shall give to the master of such ship or vessel a certificate, specifying that the enrolment and license of such ship or vessel is received by him, and the time when it was so received; which certificate shall afterwards be delivered by the said master to the collector, who may have granted such enrolment and license.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the license, granted to any ship or vessel, shall be given up to the collector of the district, who may have granted the same, within three days after the expiration of the time, for which it was granted, in case such ship or vessel be then within the district, or if she be absent, at that time, within three days from her first arrival within the district afterwards, or if she be sold out of the district, within three days after the arrival of the master within any district, to the collector of such district taking his certificate therefor; and if the master thereof shall neglect, or refuse to deliver up the license, as aforesaid, he shall forfeit fifty dollars; but if such license shall have been previously given up to the collector of any other district, as authorized by this act, and a certificate thereof under the hand of such collector, be produced by such master, or if such license be lost, or destroyed, or unintentionally mislaid, so that it cannot be found, and the master of such ship or vessel shall make and subscribe an oath or affirmation, that such license is lost, destroyed, or unintentionally mislaid, as he verily believes, and that the same, if found, shall be delivered up, as is herein required, then the aforesaid penalty shall not be incurred. And if such license shall be lost, destroyed, or unintentionally mislaid, as aforesaid, before the expiration of the time, for which it was granted, upon the like oath or affirmation being made and subscribed by the master of such ship or vessel, the said collector is hereby authorized and required, upon application being made therefor, to license such ship or vessel anew.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for the owner or owners of any licensed ship or vessel, to return such license to the collector who granted the same, at any time within the year, for which it was granted, who shall thereupon, cancel the same, and shall license such vessel anew, upon the application of the owner or owners, and upon the conditions herein before required, being complied with; and in case the term, for which the former license was granted, shall not be expired, an abatement of the tonnage of six cents per ton shall be made, in the proportion of the time so unexpired.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That every licensed ship or vessel shall have her name, and the port to which she belongs, painted on her stern, in the manner as is provided for registered ships or vessels, and if any licensed ship or vessel be found, without such painting, the owner or owners thereof shall pay twenty dollars.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That, when the master of any licensed ship or vessel, ferry boats excepted, shall be changed, the new master, or, in case of his absence, the owner or one of the owners thereof, shall report such change to the collector residing at the port where the same may happen, if there be one, otherwise, to the collector residing at any port, where such ship or vessel may next arrive, who, upon the oath or affirmation of such new master, or in case of his absence, of the owner or one of the owners, that he is a citizen of the United States, and that such ship or vessel shall not, while such license continues in force, be employed in any manner, whereby the revenue of the United States may be defrauded, shall endorse such change on the license, with the name of the new master; and when any change shall happen, as aforesaid, and such change shall not be reported, and the endorsement made of such change, as is herein required, such ship or vessel, found carrying on the coasting trade or fisheries, shall be subject to pay the same fee and tonnage, as a vessel of the United States, having a register, and the said new master shall forfeit and pay the sum of ten dollars.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful, at all times, for any officer concerned in the collection of the revenue, to inspect the enrolment or license of any ship or vessel; and if the master of any such ship or vessel shall not exhibit the same, when thereunto required by such officer, he shall pay one hundred dollars.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That the master or commander of every ship or vessel licensed for carrying on the coasting trade, destined from a district in one State, to a district in the same, or an adjoining State on the sea coast, or on a navigable river, having on board, either distilled spirits in casks exceeding five hundred gallons, wine in casks exceeding two hundred and fifty gallons, or in bottles exceeding one hundred dozens, sugar in casks or boxes exceeding three thousand pounds, tea in chests or boxes exceeding five hundred pounds, coffee in casks or bags exceeding one thousand pounds, or foreign merchandise in packages, as imported, exceeding in value four hundred dollars, or goods, wares or merchandise, consisting of such enumerated or other articles of foreign growth or manufacture, or of both, whose aggregate value exceeds eight hundred dollars, shall, previous to the departure of such ship or vessel, from the port where she may then be, make out and subscribe duplicate manifests of the whole of such cargo on board such ship or vessel, specifying in such manifests, the marks and numbers of every cask, bag, box, chest or package containing the same, with the name and place of residence of every shipper and consignee, and the quantity shipped by and to each, and if there be a collector or surveyor, residing at such port, or within five miles thereof, he shall deliver such manifests to the collector, if there be one, otherwise to the surveyor, before whom he shall swear or affirm, to the best of his knowledge and belief, that the goods therein contained were legally imported, and the duties thereupon paid or secured, or if spirits distilled within the United States, that the duties thereupon have been paid or secured, whereupon the said collector or surveyor shall certify the same on the said manifests, one of which he shall return to the said master, with a permit, specifying thereon, generally, the lading on board such ship or vessel, and authorizing him to proceed to the port of his destination. And if any ship or vessel, being laden and destined, as aforesaid, shall depart from the port where she may then be, without the master or commander having first made out and subscribed duplicate manifests of the lading on board such ship or vessel, and in case there be a collector or surveyor residing at such port, or within five miles thereof, without having previously delivered the same to the said collector or surveyor, and obtaining a permit, in manner as is herein required, such master or commander shall pay one hundred dollars.

Sec. 15. And be it further enacted, That the master or commander of every ship or vessel licensed for carrying on the coasting trade, having on board, either distilled spirits in casks exceeding five hundred gallons, wine in casks exceeding two hundred and fifty gallons, or in bottles exceeding one hundred dozens, sugar in casks or boxes exceeding three thousand pounds, tea in chests or boxes exceeding five hundred pounds, coffee in casks or bags exceeding one thousand pounds, or foreign merchandise in packages, as imported, exceeding in value four hundred dollars, or goods, wares or merchandise, consisting of such enumerated or other articles of foreign growth or manufacture, or of both, whose aggregate value exceeds eight hundred dollars, and arriving from a district in one State, at a district in the same or an adjoining State on the sea coast, or on a navigable river, shall, previous to the unloading of any part of the cargo of such ship or vessel, deliver to the collector, if there be one, or if not, to the surveyor residing at the port of her arrival, or if there be no collector or surveyor residing at such port, then to a collector or surveyor, if there be any such officer, residing within five miles thereof, the manifest of the cargo, certified by the collector or surveyor of the district from whence she sailed, (if there be such manifest,) otherwise the duplicate manifests thereof, as is herein before directed, to the truth of which, before such officer, he shall swear or affirm. And if there have been taken on board such ship or vessel, any other or more goods, than are contained in such manifest or manifests, since her departure from the port, from whence she first sailed, or if any goods have been since landed, the said master or commander shall make known and particularize the same to the said collector or surveyor, or if no such goods have been so taken on board or landed, he shall so declare, to the truth of which he shall swear or affirm: Whereupon, the said collector or surveyor shall grant a permit for unloading a part, or the whole of such cargo, as the said master or commander may request. And if there be no collector or surveyor, residing at, or within five miles of the said port of her arrival, the master or commander of such ship or vessel, may proceed to discharge the lading from on board such ship or vessel, but shall deliver to the collector or surveyor, residing at the first port, where he may next afterwards arrive, and within twenty-four hours of his arrival, the manifest or manifests aforesaid, noting thereon the times when, and places where, the goods, therein mentioned, have been unladen, to the truth of which, before the said last mentioned collector or surveyor, he shall swear or affirm; and if the master or commander of any such ship or vessel, being laden as aforesaid, shall neglect or refuse to deliver the manifest or manifests, at the times, and in the manner, herein directed, he shall pay one hundred dollars.

Sec. 16. And be it further enacted, That the master or commander of every ship or vessel licensed for carrying on the coasting trade, and being destined from any district of the United States to a district other than a district in the same, or an adjoining State, on the seacoast, or on a navigable river, shall, previous to her departure, deliver to the collector residing at the port where such ship or vessel may be, if there is one, otherwise to the collector of the district comprehending such port, or to a surveyor within the district, as the one or the other may reside nearest to the port at which such ship or vessel may be, duplicate manifests of the whole cargo on board such ship or vessel; or, if there be no cargo on board, he shall so certify; and, if there be any distilled spirits, or goods, wares, and merchandise, of foreign growth or manufacture on board, other than what may, by the collector, be deemed sufficient for sea stores, he shall specify, in such manifests, the marks and numbers of every cask, bag, box, chest, or package, containing the same, with the name and place of residence of every shipper and consignee of such distilled spirits or goods of foreign growth or manufacture, and the quantity shipped by, and to each, to be by him subscribed, and to the truth of which he shall swear or affirm, and shall also swear or affirm, before the said collector or surveyor, that such goods, wares or merchandise, of foreign growth or manufacture, were, to the best of his knowledge and belief, legally imported, and the duties thereupon paid or secured; or, if spirits distilled within the United States, that the duties thereupon have been duly paid or secured; upon the performance of which, and not before, the said collector or surveyor shall certify the same on the said manifests, one of which he shall return to the master, with a permit thereto annexed, authorizing him to proceed to the port of his destination: and if any such ship or vessel shall depart from the port where she may then be, having distilled spirits, or goods, wares, or merchandise, of foreign growth or manufacture, on board, without the several things herein required being complied with, the master thereof shall forfeit one hundred dollars; or, if the lading be of goods the growth or manufacture of the United States only, or if such ship or vessel have no cargo, and she depart without the several things herein required being complied with, the said master shall forfeit and pay fifty dollars.

Sec. 17. And be it further enacted, That the master or commander of every ship or vessel licensed to carry on the coasting trade, arriving at any district of the United States, from any district other than a district in the same or an adjoining State on the seacoast, or on a navigable river, shall deliver to the collector residing at the port where she may arrive, if there be one, otherwise to the collector or surveyor in the district comprehending such port, as the one or the other may reside nearest thereto, if the collector or surveyor reside at a distance not exceeding five miles, within twenty-four hours, or, if at a greater distance, within forty-eight hours next after his arrival; and, previous to the unloading any of the goods brought in such ship or vessel, the manifest of the cargo, (if there be any,) certified by the collector or surveyor of the district from whence she last sailed, and shall make oath or affirmation before the said collector or surveyor that there was not, when he sailed from the district where his manifest was certified, or has been since, or then is, any more or other goods, wares, or merchandise, of foreign growth or manufacture, or distilled spirits, (if there be any other than sea-stores on board such vessel,) than is therein mentioned; and, if there be no such goods, he shall so swear or affirm; and, if there be no cargo on board, he shall produce the certificate of the collector or surveyor of the district from whence she last sailed, as aforesaid, that such is the case; whereupon such collector or surveyor shall grant a permit for unloading the whole or part of such cargo (if there be any) within his district, as the master may request; and, where a part only of the goods, wares, and merchandise, of foreign growth or manufacture, or of distilled spirits, brought in such ship or vessel, is intended to be landed, the said collector or surveyor shall make an endorsement of such part, on the back of the manifest, specifying the articles to be landed, and shall return such manifest to the master, endorsing also thereon his permission for such ship or vessel to proceed to the place of her destination; and, if the master of such ship or vessel shall neglect or refuse to deliver the manifest, (or, if she has no cargo, the certificate,) within the time herein directed, he shall forfeit one hundred dollars, and the goods, wares, and merchandise, of foreign growth or manufacture, or distilled spirits, found on board, or landed from such ship or vessel, not being certified, as is herein required, shall be forfeited; and, if the same shall amount to the value of eight hundred dollars, such ship or vessel, with her tackle, apparel, and furniture, shall be also forfeited.

Sec. 18. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act contained shall be so construed as to oblige the master or commander of any ship or vessel licensed for carrying on the coasting trade, bound from a district in one State to a district in the same, or an adjoining State on the seacoast, or on a navigable river, having on board goods, wares, or merchandise, of the growth, product, or manufactures of the United States only, (except distilled spirits,) or distilled spirits, not more than five hundred gallons, wine in casks not more than two hundred and fifty gallons, or in bottles not more than one hundred dozens, sugar, in casks or boxes, not more than three thousand pounds, tea, in chests or boxes, not more than five hundred pounds, coffee, in casks or bags, not more than one thousand pounds, or foreign merchandise, in packages, as imported, of not more value than four hundred dollars, or goods, wares, or merchandise, consisting of such enumerated or other articles of foreign growth or manufacture, or of both, whose aggregate value shall be not more than eight hundred dollars, to deliver a manifest thereof, or obtain a permit, previous to her departure, or on her arrival within such district, to make any report thereof; but such master shall be provided with a manifest, by him subscribed, of the lading, of what kind soever, which was on board such ship or vessel at the time of his departure from the district from which she last sailed, and if the same, or any part of such lading, consists of distilled spirits, or goods, wares, or merchandise, of foreign growth or manufacture, with the marks and numbers of each cask, bag, box, chest, or package, containing the same, with the name of the shipper and consignee of each, which manifest shall be by him exhibited for the inspection of any officer of the revenue, when by such officer thereunto required, and shall also inform such officer from whence such ship or vessel last sailed, and how long she has been in port, when by him so interrogated; and if the master of such ship or vessel shall not be provided, on his arrival within any such district, with a manifest, and exhibit the same, as is herein required, if the lading of such ship or vessel consist wholly of goods the produce or manufacture of the United States, (distilled spirits excepted,) he shall forfeit twenty dollars; or, if there be distilled spirits, or goods, wares, or merchandise, of foreign growth or manufacture, on board, excepting what may be sufficient for sea stores, he shall forfeit forty dollars; or, if he shall refuse to answer the interrogatories truly, as is herein required, he shall forfeit the sum of one hundred dollars; and if any of the goods laden on board such ship or vessel shall be of foreign growth or manufacture, or of spirits distilled within the United States, so much of the same as may be found on board such ship or vessel, and which shall not be included in the manifest exhibited by such master, shall be forfeited.

SEC. 19. And be it further enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for the collector of the district of Pennsylvania to grant permits for the transportation of goods, wares, or merchandise, of foreign growth or manufacture, across the State of New Jersey to the district of New York, or across the State of Delaware to any district in the State of Maryland or Virginia; and for the collector of the district of New York to grant like permits for the transportation across the State of New Jersey; and for the collector of any district of Maryland or Virginia to grant like permits for the transportation across the State of Delaware to the district of Pennsylvania: Provided, That every such permit shall express the name of the owner or person sending such goods, and of the person or persons to whom such goods shall be consigned, with the marks, numbers, and description of the packages, whether bale, box, chest, or otherwise, and the kind of goods contained therein, and the date when granted; and the owner or person sending such goods shall swear or affirm that they were legally imported, and the duties thereupon paid or secured: And provided, also, That the owner or consignee of all such goods, wares, and merchandise, shall, within twenty-four hours after the arrival thereof at the place to which they were permitted to be transported, report the same to the collector of the district where they shall so arrive, and shall deliver up the permit accompanying the same; and, if the owner or consignee aforesaid shall neglect or refuse to make due entry of such goods within the time and in the manner herein directed, all such goods, wares, and merchandise, shall be subject to forfeiture; and, if the permit granted shall not be given up within the time limited for making the said report, the person or persons to whom it was granted, neglecting or refusing to deliver it up, shall forfeit fifty dollars for every twenty-four hours it shall be withheld afterwards: Provided, That where the goods, wares, and merchandise, to be transported in manner aforesaid, shall be of less value than eight hundred dollars, the said oath and permit shall not be deemed necessary, nor shall the owner or consignee be obliged to make report to the collector of the district where the said goods, wares, and merchandise, shall arrive.

SEC. 20. And be it further enacted, That, when any ship or vessel of the United States, registered according to law, shall be employed in going from any one district in the United States to any other district, such ship or vessel, and the master or commander thereof, with the goods she may have on board, previous to her departure from the district where she may be, and also upon her arrival in any other district, shall be subject (except as to the payment of fees) to the same regulations, provisions, penalties, and forfeitures; and the like duties are imposed on like officers as is provided by the sixteenth and seventeenth sections of this act for ships or vessels licensed for carrying on the coasting trade: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to extend to registered ships or vessels of the United States, having on board goods, wares, and merchandise of foreign growth or manufacture, brought into the United States in such ship or vessel from a foreign port, and on which the duties have not been paid or secured, according to law.

SEC. 21. And be it further enacted, That, when any ship or vessel, licensed for carrying on the fishery, shall be intended to touch and trade at any foreign port or place, it shall be the duty of the master, commander, or owner, to obtain permission for that purpose from the collector of the district where such ship or vessel may be, previous to her departure, and the master or commander of every such ship or vessel shall deliver like manifests and make like entries, both of the ship or vessel and of the goods, wares, or merchandise on board, within the same time, and under the same penalty as, by the laws of the United States, are provided for ships or vessels of the United States arriving from a foreign port. And if any ship or vessel licensed for carrying on the fisheries shall be found within three leagues of the coast with goods, wares, or merchandise of foreign growth or manufacture exceeding the value of five hundred dollars, without having such permission as is herein directed, such ship or vessel, together with the goods, wares, or merchandise of foreign growth or manufacture imported therein, shall be subject to seizure and forfeiture.

SEC. 22. And be it further enacted, That the master or commander of every ship or vessel employed in the transportation of goods from district to district that shall put into a port other than the one to which she was bound, shall, within twenty-four hours of his arrival, if there be an officer residing at such port, and she continue there so long, make report of his arrival to such officer, with the name of the place he came from, and to which he is bound, with an account of his lading; and if the master of such ship or vessel shall neglect or refuse to do the same, he shall forfeit twenty dollars.

SEC. 23. And be it further enacted, That if the master or commander of any ship or vessel, employed in the transportation of goods from district to district, having on board goods, wares, or merchandise of foreign growth or manufacture, or distilled spirits, shall, on his arrival at the port to which he was destined, have lost or mislaid the certified manifest of the same, or the permit which was given therefor, by the collector or surveyor of the district from whence he sailed, the collector of the district where he shall so arrive shall take bond for the payment of the duties on such goods, wares, and merchandise of foreign growth or manufacture, or distilled spirits, within six months, in the same manner as though they were imported from a foreign country: Provided, however, Such bond shall be cancelled, if the said master shall deliver, or cause to be delivered, to the collector taking such bond, and within the term therein limited for payment, a certificate from the collector or surveyor of the district from whence he sailed that such goods were legally exported in such ship or vessel from such district.

Acts of Congress.

Sec. 24. And be it further enacted, That the master or commander of every foreign ship or vessel, bound from a district in the United States to any other district within the same, shall, in all cases, previous to her departure from such district, deliver to the collector of such district, duplicate manifests of the lading on board such ship or vessel, if there be any, or, if there be none, he shall declare that such is the case, and to the truth of such manifests or declaration, he shall swear or affirm, and also obtain a permit, from the said collector, authorizing him to proceed to the place of his destination. And the master or commander of every such ship or vessel, on his arrival within any district, from any other district, shall, in all cases, within forty-eight hours after his arrival, and previous to the unlading any goods from on board such ship or vessel, deliver to the collector of the district where he may have arrived, a manifest of the goods laden on board such ship, or vessel, if any there be, or if in ballast only, he shall so declare, and to the truth of which manifest or declaration, he shall swear or affirm; and, also, that such manifest contains an account of all the goods, wares, and merchandise which were on board such ship or vessel, at the time, or have been, since her departure from the place, from whence she shall be reported last to have sailed; and he shall also deliver to such collector the permit which was given him from the collector of the district from whence he sailed. And if the master or commander of any such ship or vessel, shall neglect or refuse complying with any of the requirements herein made, he shall forfeit one hundred dollars: Provided, always, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as affecting the payment of tonnage, or any other requirements which such ships or vessels are now subject to by the present existing laws of the United States.

Sec. 25. And be it further enacted, That in every case, where the collector is, by this act, directed to grant any enrolment, license, certificate, permit, or other document, the naval officer residing at the port (if there be one) shall sign the same, and every surveyor who shall certify a manifest, or grant a permit, or who shall receive any certified manifest, or a permit as is provided for in this act, shall make monthly returns thereof, or sooner, if it can conveniently be made, to the collector of the district where such surveyor may reside.

Sec. 26. And be it further enacted, That, before any ship or vessel, of the burden of five tons and less than twenty tons, shall be licensed, the same admeasurement shall be made of such ship or vessel, and the same provisions observed relative thereto, as are to be observed in case of admeasuring ships or vessels to be registered or enrolled; but in all cases where such ship or vessel, or any other licensed ship or vessel, shall have been once admeasured, it shall not be necessary to measure such ship or vessel anew, for the purpose of obtaining another enrolment or license, except such ship or vessel shall have undergone some alteration as to her burden, subsequent to the time of her former license.

Sec. 27. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for any officer of the revenue to go on board of any ship or vessel, whether she shall be within or without his district, and the same to inspect, search, and examine, and if it shall appear that any breach of the laws of the United States has been committed, whereby such ship or vessel, or the goods, wares, and merchandise on board, or any part thereof, is, or are liable to forfeiture, to make seizure of the same.

Sec. 28. And be it further enacted, That, in every case where a forfeiture of any ship or vessel, or of any goods, wares, or merchandise shall accrue, it shall be the duty of the collector, or other proper officer, who shall give notice of the seizure of such ship or vessel, or of such goods, wares, or merchandise, to insert in the same advertisement the name or names and the place or places of residence of the person or persons to whom any such ship or vessel, goods, wares, and merchandise belonged or were consigned, at the time of such seizure, if the same shall be known to him.

Sec. 29. And be it further enacted, That every collector who shall knowingly make any record of enrolment or license of any ship or vessel, and every other officer or person, appointed by, or under them, who shall make any record, or grant any certificate or other document whatever, contrary to the true intent and meaning of this act, or shall take any other or greater fees than are by this act allowed, or shall receive, for any service performed pursuant to this act, any reward or gratuity, and every surveyor or other person appointed to measure ships or vessels, who shall wilfully deliver to any collector or naval officer a false description of any ship or vessel, to be enrolled or licensed, in pursuance of this act, shall upon conviction of any such neglect or offence, forfeit to the United States five hundred dollars, and be rendered incapable of serving in any office of trust or profit under the United States. And if any person authorized and required by this act, in respect to his office, to perform any act or thing required by this act, shall wilfully neglect or refuse to do and perform the same, according to the true intent and meaning of this act, such person, on being duly convicted thereof, if not hereby subject to the penalty and disqualifications aforesaid, shall forfeit and pay the sum of five hundred dollars for the first offence, and a like sum for the second offence, and shall from thenceforward be rendered incapable of holding any office of trust or profit under the United States.

Sec. 30. And be it further enacted, That, if any person or persons shall swear or affirm to any of the matters herein required to be verified, knowing the same to be false, such person or persons shall suffer the like pains and penalties as shall be incurred by persons committing wilful and corrupt perjury. And if any person or persons shall forge, counterfeit, erase, alter, or falsify any enrolment, license, certificate, permit, or other document, mentioned or required in this act to be granted by any officer of the revenue, such person or persons so offending shall forfeit five hundred dollars.

Sec. 31. And be it further enacted, That if any person or persons shall assault, resist, obstruct, or hinder any officer in the execution of this act, or of any other act or law of the United States herein mentioned, or of any of the powers or authorities vested in him by this act, or any other act or law, as aforesaid, all and every person and persons so offending shall, for every such offence, for which no other penalty is particularly provided, forfeit five hundred dollars.

SEC. 32. And be it further enacted, That if any licensed ship or vessel shall be transferred, in whole or in part, to any person who is not at the time of such transfer a citizen of and resident within the United States, or if any such ship or vessel shall be employed in any other trade than that for which she is licensed, or shall be found with a forged or altered license, or one granted for any other ship or vessel, every such ship or vessel, with her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and the cargo found on board her, shall be forfeited.

SEC. 33. Provided, nevertheless, and be it further enacted, That in all cases where the whole, or any part, of the lading or cargo on board any ship or vessel shall belong bona fide to any person or persons other than the master, owner, or mariners of such ship or vessel, and upon which the duties shall have been previously paid or secured, according to law, shall be exempted from any forfeiture under this act, anything therein contained to the contrary notwithstanding.

SEC. 34. And be it further enacted, That the fees and allowances for the several duties and services to be performed in virtue of this act shall be as follow, that is to say:

For admeasuring every ship or vessel, in order to the enrolment or licensing and recording the same, if of the burden of five tons, and less than twenty tons, fifty cents; if of twenty tons, and not exceeding seventy tons, seventy-five cents; if above seventy tons, and not exceeding one hundred tons, one hundred cents; if above one hundred tons, one hundred and fifty cents.

For every certificate of enrolment, fifty cents.

For every endorsement on a certificate of enrolment, twenty cents.

For every license, and granting the same, including the bond, if not exceeding twenty tons, twenty-five cents; if above twenty, and not more than one hundred tons, fifty cents; and if more than one hundred tons, one hundred cents.

For every endorsement on a license, twenty cents.

For certifying manifests, and granting a permit for a licensed vessel to proceed from district to district, twenty-five cents, if less than fifty tons; and if above fifty tons, fifty cents.

For receiving a certified manifest, and granting a permit on the arrival of such vessel, twenty-five cents, if less than fifty tons; and if above fifty tons, fifty cents.

For certifying manifests, and granting a permit for a registered vessel to proceed from district to district, one hundred and fifty cents.

For receiving a certified manifest, and granting a permit, on the arrival of such registered vessel, one hundred and fifty cents.

For granting a permit for a vessel, not belonging to a citizen or citizens of the United States, to proceed from district to district, and receiving the manifest, two hundred cents.

For receiving a manifest, and granting a permit to unload, for such last mentioned vessel, on her arrival in one district from another district, two hundred cents.

For granting a permit for a vessel carrying on the fishery, to trade at a foreign port, twenty-five cents; and for the report and entry of any foreign goods imported in such vessel, twenty-five cents.

And where a surveyor shall certify a manifest, or grant a permit, or receive a certified manifest and grant a permit, the fees arising therefrom shall be received by him solely for his use. And all other fees arising by virtue of this act shall be received and accounted for by the collector, or, at his option, by the naval officer, where there is one; and where there is a collector, naval officer, and surveyor, shall be equally divided, monthly, between the said officers; and where there is no naval officer, two-thirds to the collector, and the other third to the surveyor; and where there is only a collector, he shall receive the whole amount thereof; and where there is more than one surveyor in any district, each of them shall receive his proportionable part of such fees as shall arise in the port for which he is appointed: Provided, always, That, in all cases where the tonnage of any ship or vessel shall be ascertained, by any person appointed for that purpose, such person shall be paid a reasonable compensation therefor, out of the fees aforesaid, before any distribution thereof as aforesaid; and every collector and naval officer, and every surveyor, who shall reside at a port where there is no collector, shall cause to be affixed, and constantly kept in some conspicuous place of his office, a fair table of the rates of fees demandable by this act.

SEC. 35. And be it further enacted, That all penalties and forfeitures which shall be incurred by virtue and force of this act, shall and may be sued for, prosecuted, and recovered in like manner as penalties and forfeitures incurred by virtue of the act, entitled "An act to regulate the collection of the duties imposed by law on goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels," may be sued for, prosecuted, and recovered, and shall be appropriated in like manner: Provided, always, That if any officer, entitled to a part or share of any such penalty or forfeiture, shall be necessary as a witness on the trial for such penalty or forfeiture, such officer may be a witness upon the said trial; but in such case he shall not receive, or be entitled to any part or share of the said penalty or forfeiture, and the part or share to which he would otherwise have been entitled, shall accrue to the United States.

SEC. 36. And be it further enacted, That this act shall commence and take effect from and after the last day of May next, and thenceforth the act, entitled "An act for registering and clearing vessels, regulating the coasting trade, and for other purposes," and also the act, entitled "An act to explain and amend an act, entitled 'An act for registering and clearing vessels, regulating the coasting trade, and for other purposes,' shall be repealed and cease to operate, except as to the validity of the registers, records, enrolments, and licenses, with the certificates and documents, which shall have been done or granted, in pursuance of those acts, prior to the first day of June next, which shall continue to be of the like force and effect as if the said acts were not repealed; and except, also, as to the prosecution, recovery, and distribution of, and for fines, penalties, and forfeitures, which may have been incurred prior to the first day of June next, for which purpose, likewise, the said acts shall continue in force.

SEC. 37. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act shall be construed to extend to any boat or lighter, not being masted, or if masted, and not decked, employed in the harbor of any town or city.

Approved, February 18, 1793.

An Act providing compensation to the President and Vice President of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That, from and after the third day of March, in the present year, the compensation of the President of the United States shall be at the rate of twenty-five thousand dollars per annum, with the use of the furniture and other effects belonging to the United States, and now in possession of the President; and that of the Vice President, at the rate of five thousand dollars per annum, in full for their respective services, to be paid quarter-yearly at the Treasury.

Approved, February 18, 1793.

An Act to repeal part of a Resolution of Congress of the twenty-ninth of August, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-eight, respecting the inhabitants of Post Saint Vincents.

Be it enacted, &c., That so much of the resolution of Congress of the twenty-ninth of August, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-eight, as requires the French and Canadian inhabitants, and other settlers at Post Saint Vincents, to pay for the survey of the several tracts which they rightfully claimed, and which had been allotted to them, according to the laws and usages of the Government, under which they had settled, be, and hereby is, repealed: and that such surveys thereof, as may have been made, be paid for by the United States, not exceeding the rates hitherto established by Congress for making surveys.

Approved, February 21, 1793.

An Act to promote the progress of Useful Arts, and to repeal the Act heretofore made for that purpose.

Be it enacted, &c., That when any person or persons, being a citizen or citizens of the United States, shall allege that he or they have invented any new and useful art, machine, manufacture or composition of matter, or any new and useful improvement on any art, machine, manufacture or composition of matter, not known or used before the application, and shall present a petition to the Secretary of State, signifying a desire of obtaining an exclusive property in the same, and praying that a patent may be granted therefor, it shall and may be lawful for the said Secretary of State to cause letters patent to be made out in the name of the United States, bearing teste by the President of the United States, reciting the allegations and suggestions of the said petition, and giving a short description of the said invention or discovery, and thereupon granting to such petitioner or petitioners, his, her, or their heirs, administrators or assigns, for a term not exceeding fourteen years, the full and exclusive right and liberty of making, constructing, using and vending to others to be used, the said invention or discovery, which letters patent shall be delivered to the Attorney General of the United States, to be examined; who, within fifteen days after such delivery, if he finds the same conformable to this act, shall certify accordingly at the foot thereof, and return the same to the Secretary of State, who shall present the letters patent thus certified, to be signed, and shall cause the seal of the United States to be thereto affixed; and the same shall be good and available to the grantee or grantees, by force of this act, and shall be recorded in a book, to be kept for that purpose, in the office of the Secretary of State, and delivered to the patentee or his order.

SEC. 2. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That any person who shall have discovered an improvement in the principle of any machine, or in the process of any composition of matter, which shall have been patented, and shall have obtained a patent for such improvement, he shall not be at liberty to make, use, or vend the original discovery, nor shall the first inventor be at liberty to use the improvement. And it is hereby enacted and declared, that simply changing the form or the proportions of any machine, or composition of matter, in any degree, shall not be deemed a discovery.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That every inventor, before he can receive a patent, shall swear or affirm that he does verily believe that he is the true inventor or discoverer of the art, machine, or improvement, for which he solicits a patent, which oath or affirmation may be made before any person authorized to administer oaths, and shall deliver a written description of his invention, and of the manner of using, or process of compounding the same, in such full, clear, and exact terms, as to distinguish the same from all other things before known, and to enable any person skilled in the art or science, of which it is a branch, or with which it is most nearly connected, to make, compound, and use the same. And in the case of any machine, he shall fully explain the principle, and the several modes in which he has contemplated the application of that principle or character, by which it may be distinguished from other inventions; and he shall accompany the whole with drawings and written references, where the nature of the case admits of drawings, or with specimens of the ingredients, and of the composition of matter, sufficient in quantity for the purpose of experiment, where the invention is of a composition of matter; which description, signed by himself, and attested by two witnesses, shall be filed in the office of the Secretary of State, and certified copies thereof shall be competent evidence, in all Courts, where any matter or thing, touching such patent right, shall come in question. And such inventor shall, moreover, deliver a model of his machine, provided the Secretary shall deem such model to be necessary.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for any inventor, his executor, or administrator, to assign the title and interest in the said invention, at any time, and the assignee having recorded the said assignment, in the office of the Secretary of State, shall thereafter stand in the place of the original inventor, both as to right and responsibility, and so the assignees of assigns, to any degree.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall make, devise, and use, or sell the thing so invented, the exclusive right of which shall, as aforesaid, have been secured to any person by patent, without the consent of the patentee, his executors, administrators, or assigns, first obtained in writing, every person so offending shall forfeit and pay, to the patentee, a sum that shall be at least equal to three times the price for which the patentee has usually sold or licensed to other persons the use of the said invention; which may be recovered in an action on the case, founded on this act, in the Circuit Court of the United States, or any other Court having competent jurisdiction.

SEC. 6. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That the defendant in such action shall be permitted to plead the general issue, and give this act and any special matter, of which notice in writing may have been given to the plaintiff or his attorney, thirty days before trial, in evidence, tending to prove that the specification filed by the plaintiff does not contain the whole truth relative to his discovery, or that it contains more than is necessary to produce the described effect, which concealment or addition shall fully appear to have been made, for the purpose of deceiving the public, or that the thing, thus secured by patent, was not originally discovered by the patentee, but had been in use, or had been described in some public work, anterior to the supposed discovery of the patentee, or that he had surreptitiously obtained a patent for the discovery of another person; in either of which cases, judgment shall be rendered for the defendant, with costs, and the patent shall be declared void.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That where any State, before its adoption of the present form of Government, shall have granted an exclusive right to any invention, the party claiming that right shall not be capable of obtaining an exclusive right under this act, but on relinquishing his right under such particular State, and of such relinquishment, his obtaining an exclusive right under this act shall be sufficient evidence.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the persons whose applications for patents were, at the time of passing this act, depending before the Secretary of State, Secretary at War, and Attorney General, according to the act, passed the second session of the first Congress, entitled "An act to promote the progress of Useful Arts," on complying with the conditions of this act, and paying the fees herein required, may pursue their respective claims to a patent under the same.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That in case of interfering applications, the same shall be submitted to the arbitration of three persons, one of whom shall be chosen by each of the applicants, and the third person shall be appointed by the Secretary of State; and the decision or award of such arbitrators, delivered to the Secretary of State, in writing, and subscribed by them, or any two of them, shall be final, as far as respects the granting of the patent: and if either of the applicants shall refuse or fail to choose an arbitrator, the patent shall issue to the opposite party. And where there shall be more than two interfering applications, and the parties applying shall not all unite in appointing three arbitrators, it shall be in the power of the Secretary of State to appoint three arbitrators for the purpose.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That, upon oath or affirmation being made, before the Judge of the District Court, where the patentee, his executors, administrators, or assigns reside, that any patent, which shall be issued in pursuance of this act, was obtained surreptitiously, or upon false suggestion, and motion made to the said Court, within three years after issuing the said patent, but not afterwards, it shall and may be lawful for the Judge of the said District Court, if the matter alleged shall appear to him to be sufficient to grant a rule, that the patentee, or his executor, administrator, or assign, show cause why process should not issue against him to repeal such patent. And if sufficient cause shall not be shown to the contrary, the rule shall be made absolute, and thereupon the said Judge shall order process to be issued against such patentee, or his executors, administrators, or assigns, with costs of suit. And in case no sufficient cause shall be shown to the contrary, or if it shall appear that the patentee was not the true inventor or discoverer, judgment shall be rendered by such Court for the repeal of such patent; and if the party, at whose complaint the process issued, shall have judgment given against him, he shall pay all such costs as the defendant shall be put to, in defending the suit, to be taxed by the Court, and recovered in due course of law.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That every inventor, before he presents his petition to the Secretary of State, signifying his desire of obtaining a patent, shall pay into the Treasury thirty dollars, for which he shall take duplicate receipts: one of which receipts he shall deliver to the Secretary of State when he presents his petition; and the money thus paid shall be in full for the sundry services to be performed in the office of the Secretary of State, consequent on such petition, and shall pass to the account of clerk-hire in that office: Provided, nevertheless, That for every copy, which may be required at the said office, of any paper respecting any patent that has been granted, the person obtaining such copy, shall pay at the rate of twenty cents for every copy-sheet of one hundred words, and for every copy of a drawing, the party obtaining the same shall pay two dollars; of which payments, an account shall be rendered annually to the Treasury of the United States, and they shall also pass to the account of clerk-hire in the office of the Secretary of State.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That the act passed the tenth day of April, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety, entitled "An act to promote the progress of Useful Arts," be, and the same is hereby, repealed: Provided, always, That nothing contained in this act shall be construed to invalidate any patent, that may have been granted under the authority of the said act; and all patentees under the said act, their executors, administrators, and assigns, shall be considered within the purview of this act, in respect to the violation of their rights: Provided, Such violations shall be committed after the passing of this act.

Approved, February 21, 1793.

An Act making Provision for the Persons therein mentioned.

Whereas, Colonel John Harding, and Major Alexander Trueman, while employed in carrying messages of peace to the hostile Indians, were killed by the said Indians:

Be it enacted, &c., That four hundred and fifty dollars per annum, for seven years, be allowed to the widow and orphan children of the said Colonel John Harding; and the sum of three hundred dollars per annum, for the same term of seven years, to the orphan children of the said Major Alexander Trueman, to commence on the first day of July, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, and to be paid half-yearly, at the Treasury, to the said widow, and to the guardians of the said orphan children, or to their legal attorneys.

Approved, February 27, 1793.

An Act for repealing the several Import Laws of the United States, so far as they may be deemed to impose a duty on useful beasts imported for breed.

Be it enacted, &c., That the several laws of the United States, imposing duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, so far as they may be deemed to impose a duty on horses, cattle, sheep, swine, or other useful beasts imported into the United States for breed, shall be repealed.

Approved, February 27, 1793.

An Act in addition to, and alteration of the act, entitled "An act to extend the time limited for settling the accounts of the United States with the individual States."

Be it enacted, &c., That the second section of the act, entitled "An act to extend the time limited for settling the accounts of the United States with the individual States," which extended the powers of the Board of Commissioners to the settlement of the accounts between the United States and the State of Vermont, be, and hereby is, repealed.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Board of Commissioners established to settle the accounts between the United States and the individual States, in apportioning the aggregate of all the balances due to each State between the States, agreeably to the act, entitled "An act to provide more effectually for the settlement of the accounts between the United States and the individual States," shall have no regard to the State of Vermont.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That in the apportioning of the balances aforesaid, the State of Kentucky shall be deemed to be included in the State of Virginia, the admission of the said State of Kentucky as a member of the Union notwithstanding.

Approved, February 27, 1793.

An Act to regulate the claims to Invalid Pensions.

Whereas, the act passed at the last session of Congress, entitled "An act to provide for the settlement of the claims of widows and orphans barred by the limitations heretofore established, and to regulate the claims to Invalid Pensions," is found by experience inadequate to prevent the admission of improper claims to Invalid Pensions, and not to contain a sufficient facility for the allowance of such as may be well founded. Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That the second, third, and fourth sections of the said act be repealed, and that in future, all claims to such pensions shall be regulated in the manner following, to wit: First. All evidence relative to invalids shall be taken upon oath or affirmation, before the Judge of the district in which such invalids reside, or before any three persons specially authorized by commission from the said Judge. Secondly. The evidence relative to any claimant must prove decisive disability to have been the effect of known wounds received while in the actual line of his duty, in the service of the United States during the late war. That this evidence must be the affidavits of the commanding officer or surgeon of the ship, regiment, corps, or company, in which such claimant served, or two other credible witnesses, to the same effect, setting forth the time and place of such known wound. Thirdly. Every claimant shall be examined upon oath or affirmation, by two physicians or surgeons, to be authorized by commission from the said Judge, who shall report, in writing, their opinion, upon oath or affirmation, of the nature of the said disability, and in what degree it prevents the claimant from obtaining his livelihood by labor. Fourthly. Every claimant shall produce evidence of the time of his leaving the service of the United States. He must also produce evidence of three reputable freeholders of the city, town, or county, in which he usually resided for the two years immediately after he left the service, as aforesaid, of the existence of his disability during that period; and ascertaining, of their own knowledge, the mode of life, employment, labor, or means of support of the claimant. Fifthly. And the said claimant must produce the evidence of two credible witnesses, of the continuance of his disability from the expiration of the said two years to the time of his application. Sixthly. Each claimant must show a good and sufficient cause why he did not apply for a pension, to the person or persons authorized to examine his claim, on or before the eleventh of December, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-eight, the time limited for applications of this nature. Seventhly. No evidence of any claimant shall be admitted, whose claim has been examined and rejected on or before the aforesaid eleventh of December, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-eight.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Judge of the district shall transmit a list of such claims, accompanied by the evidence herein directed, to the Secretary for the Department of War, in order that the same may be compared with the muster-rolls and other documents in his office; and the said Secretary shall make a statement of the cases of the said claimants to Congress, with such circumstances and remarks as may be necessary in order to enable them to take such order thereon as they may judge proper.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That no person not on the Pension List before the twenty-third day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, shall be entitled to a pension, who shall not have complied with the rules and regulations herein prescribed; saving, however, to all persons, all and singular their rights founded upon legal adjudications under the act entitled "An act to provide for the settlement of the claims of widows and orphans, barred by the limitations heretofore established, and to regulate the claims to Invalid Pensions;" but it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War, in conjunction with the Attorney General, to take such measures as may be necessary to obtain an adjudication of the Supreme Court of the United States, on the validity of any such rights claimed under the act aforesaid, by the determination of certain persons styling themselves Commissioners.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That no claim to a pension shall be allowed under this act, which shall not be presented within two years from the passing the same.

Approved, February 26, 1793.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the several appropriations herein before made shall be paid and discharged out of the funds following, to wit:

First: The sum of six hundred thousand dollars reserved by the act making provision for the Debt of the United States. Secondly, the surplus, which may remain unexpended, of the moneys appropriated for the use of the War Department, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two: And, thirdly, The surplus of the existing revenues of the United States, to the end of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, except what may be otherwise appropriated, during the present session of Congress.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be authorized to borrow, on account of the said States, any sum or sums, not exceeding, in the whole, eight hundred thousand dollars, at a rate of interest not exceeding five per centum per annum, and reimbursable at the pleasure of the United States, to be applied for the purposes aforesaid, and to be repaid out of the said surplus of the duties on imports and tonnage, to the end of the present year, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three: And that it shall be lawful for the Bank of the United States to lend the said sum. And the President of the United States shall cause so much of the Loan, made of the Bank of the United States, pursuant to the eleventh section of the act, by which it is incorporated, to be paid off, in sums not less than fifty thousand dollars, as, in his opinion, the state of the Treasury may, from time to time, admit, out of any moneys, which may be in the Treasury, having due regard to the exigencies of Government, and the appropriations made and to be made by law.

Approved, February 28, 1793.

An Act to regulate Trade and Intercourse with the Indian Tribes.

Be it enacted &c., That no person shall be permitted to carry on any trade or intercourse with the Indian tribes without a license under the hand and seal of the Superintendent of the Department, or of such other person as the President of the United States shall authorize to grant licenses for that purpose; which Superintendent, or person so authorized, shall, on application, issue such license, for a term not exceeding two years, to any proper person, who shall enter into bond, with one or more sureties, approved of by the Superintendent, or person issuing such license, or by the President of the United States, in the penal sum of one thousand dollars, payable to the United States, conditioned for the true and faithful observance of such rules, regulations, and restrictions, as are or shall be made, for the government of trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes. The said Superintendents, and persons licensed, as aforesaid, shall be governed, in all things touching the said trade and intercourse, by such rules and regulations as the President of the United States shall prescribe.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Superintendent, or person issuing such license, shall have full power and authority to recall the same, if the person so licensed shall transgress any of the regulations or restrictions provided for the government of trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes; and shall put in suit such bonds as he may have taken, on the breach of any condition therein contained.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That every person who shall attempt to trade with the Indian tribes, or shall be found in the Indian country, with such merchandise in his possession as are usually vended to the Indians, without lawful license, shall forfeit all the merchandise offered for sale to the Indians, or found in his possession in the Indian country, and shall, moreover, be liable to a fine, not exceeding one hundred dollars, and to imprisonment, not exceeding thirty days, at the discretion of the Court in which the trial shall be: Provided, That any citizen of the United States, merely traveling through any Indian town or territory, shall be at liberty to purchase, by exchange or otherwise, such articles as may be necessary for his subsistence, without incurring any penalty.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That, if any citizen or inhabitant of the United States, or of either of the Territorial districts of the United States, shall go into any town, settlement, or territory, belonging to any nation or tribe of Indians, and shall there commit murder, robbery, larceny, trespass, or other crime, against the person or property of any friendly Indian or Indians, which, if committed within the jurisdiction of any State, or within the jurisdiction of either of the said districts, against a citizen thereof, would be punishable by the laws of such State or district, such offender shall be subject to the same punishment, as if the offence had been committed within the State or district to which he or she may belong, against a citizen thereof.

Acts of Congress

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That if any such citizen or inhabitant shall make a settlement on lands belonging to any Indian tribe, or shall survey such lands, or designate their boundaries, by making trees, or otherwise, for the purpose of settlement, he shall forfeit a sum, not exceeding one thousand dollars nor less than one hundred dollars, and suffer imprisonment, not exceeding twelve months, in the discretion of the Court before whom the trial shall be: and it shall, moreover, be lawful for the President of the United States to take such measures as he may judge necessary, to remove from lands belonging to any Indian tribe, any citizens or inhabitants of the United States, who have made, or shall hereafter make, or attempt to make, a settlement thereon.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That no person shall be permitted to purchase any horse of an Indian, or of any white man in the Indian territory, without special license for that purpose; which license the Superintendent, or such other person as the President shall appoint, is hereby authorized to grant, on the same terms, conditions, and restrictions, as other licenses are to be granted under this act: Provided, also, That every person who shall purchase a horse or horses, under such license, before he exposes such horse or horses for sale, and within fifteen days after they shall have been brought out of the Indian country, shall make a particular return to the Superintendent, or other person from whom he obtained his license, of every horse by him purchased, as aforesaid, describing such horses by their color, height, and other natural or artificial marks, under the penalties contained in their respective bonds. And every person purchasing a horse or horses, as aforesaid, in the Indian country, without a special license, shall, for every horse thus purchased and brought into any settlement of citizens of the United States, forfeit, for every horse thus purchased, or brought from the Indian country, a sum not more than one hundred dollars, nor less than thirty dollars, to be recovered in any Court of Record having competent jurisdiction. And every person who shall purchase a horse, knowing him to be brought out of the Indian territory by any person or persons not licensed, as above, to purchase the same, shall forfeit the value of such horse; one-half for the benefit of the informant, the other half for the use of the United States, to be recovered as aforesaid.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That no agent, superintendent, or other person, authorized to grant a license to trade, or purchase horses, shall have any interest or concern in any trade with the Indians, or in the purchase or sale of any horses, to or from any Indian; and that any person offending herein, shall forfeit one thousand dollars, and be imprisoned, at the discretion of the Court, before which the conviction shall be had, not exceeding twelve months.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That no purchase or grant of lands, or of any title or claim thereto, from any Indians, or nation or tribe of Indians, within the bounds of the United States, shall be of any validity, in law or equity, unless the same be made by a treaty or convention entered into pursuant to the Constitution: and it shall be a misdemeanor in any person, not employed under the authority of the United States in negotiating such treaty or convention, punishable by fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, and imprisonment not exceeding twelve months, directly or indirectly to treat with any such Indians, nation, or tribe of Indians, for the title or purchase of any lands by them held or claimed: Provided, nevertheless, That it shall be lawful for the agent or agents of any State, who may be present at any treaty held with Indians, under the authority of the United States, in the presence, and with the approbation of, the Commissioner or Commissioners of the United States appointed to hold the same, to propose to, and adjust with, the Indians, the compensation to be made for their claims to lands within such State, which shall be extinguished by the treaty.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That, in order to promote civilization among the friendly Indian tribes, and to secure the continuance of their friendship, it shall and may be lawful for the President of the United States to cause them to be furnished with useful domestic animals and implements of husbandry, and also to furnish them with goods or money, in such proportions as he shall judge proper, and to appoint such persons, from time to time, as temporary agents, to reside among the Indians, as he shall think proper: Provided, That the whole amount of such presents, and allowance to such agents, shall not exceed twenty thousand dollars per annum.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That the Superior Courts of each of the said Territorial districts, and the Circuit Courts, and other Courts of the United States, of similar jurisdiction in criminal causes, in each district of the United States, into which any offender against this act shall be first brought, or in which he shall be apprehended, shall have, and are hereby invested with, full power and authority, to hear and determine all crimes, offenses, and misdemeanors, against this act; such Courts proceeding therein in the same manner as if such crimes, offenses, and misdemeanors, had been committed within the bounds of their respective districts: and in all cases where the punishment shall not be death, the County Courts of Quarter Sessions in the said Territorial districts, and the District Courts of the United States in their respective districts, shall have, and are hereby invested with, like power to hear and determine the same.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That it shall and may be lawful for the President of the United States, and for the Governors of such Territorial districts, respectively, on proof to them made, that any citizen or citizens of the United States, or of the said districts, or either of them, have been guilty of any of the said crimes, offenses, or misdemeanors, within any town, settlement, or territory, belonging to any nation or tribe of Indians, to cause such person or persons to be apprehended, and brought into either of the United States, or of the said districts, and to be proceeded against in due course of law. And in all cases where the punishment shall be death, it shall be lawful for the Governor of the district into which the offender may be first brought, or in which he may be apprehended, to issue a commission of Oyer and Terminer to the Superior Judges of the district, who shall have full power and authority to hear and determine all such capital cases, in the same manner as the Superior Courts of such districts have, in their ordinary sessions. And when the offender shall be brought into, or shall be apprehended in, any of the United States, except Kentucky, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to issue a like commission to any two Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, and the Judge of the district, in which the offender may have been apprehended or first brought; which Judges, or any two of them, shall have the same jurisdiction, in such capital cases, as the Circuit Court of such district, and shall proceed to trial and judgment, in the same manner as such Circuit Court might or could do.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That all fines and forfeitures, which shall accrue under this act, shall be, one-half to the use of the informant, and the other half to the use of the United States, except where the prosecution shall be first instituted on behalf of the United States, in which case the whole shall be to their use.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent any trade or intercourse with Indians living on lands surrounded by settlements of the citizens of the United States, and being within the jurisdiction of any of the individual States.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That all and every other act and acts, coming within the purview of this act, shall be, and are hereby, repealed.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That this act shall be in force for the term of two years, and from thence to the end of the then next session of Congress, and no longer.

Approved, March 1, 1793.

of the parties obtaining judgments therein, such compensation for their travel and attendance, and for attorneys and counsellors' fees, except in the District Courts in cases of Admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, as are allowed in the Supreme or Superior Courts of the respective States.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That this act shall continue and be in force for the term of one year, and from thence until the end of the next session of Congress thereafter, and no longer.

Approved, March 1, 1793.

An Act making an appropriation to defray the expense of a Treaty with the Indians Northwest of the Ohio.

Be it enacted, &c., That a sum, not exceeding one hundred thousand dollars, arising from the surplus of former appropriations unexpended, shall be, and the same is hereby, appropriated to defraying the expense of negotiating and treating with the hostile Indian tribes Northwest of the river Ohio.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That each of the Commissioners who may be appointed for managing such negotiations and treaties, shall be entitled to an allowance, exclusive of his necessary expenses, of eight dollars per day, during his actual service, to be paid out of the moneys so appropriated.

Approved, March 2, 1793.

An Act in addition to the Act, entitled "An act to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States."

Be it enacted, &c., That the attendance of only one of the Justices of the Supreme Court, at the several Circuit Courts of the United States, to be hereafter held, shall be sufficient, any law requiring the attendance of two of the said Justices notwithstanding: Provided, That it shall be lawful for the Supreme Court, in cases where special circumstances shall, in their judgment, render the same necessary, to assign two of the said Justices to attend the Circuit Court or Courts, and it shall be the duty of the Justices so assigned, to attend accordingly: And provided also, That when only one Judge of the Supreme Court shall attend any Circuit Court, and the District Judge shall be absent, or shall have been of counsel, or be concerned in interest in any cause then pending, such Circuit Court may consist of the said Judge of the Supreme Court alone.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That, if at any time only one Judge of the Supreme Court, and the Judge of the district, shall sit in a Circuit Court, and upon a final hearing of a cause, or of a plea to the jurisdiction of the Court, they shall be divided in opinion, it shall be continued to the succeeding Court; and if upon the second hearing, when a different Judge of the Supreme Court shall be present, a like division shall take place, the District Judge adhering to his former opinion, judgment shall be rendered in conformity to the opinion of the presiding Judge.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Supreme Court, or, when the Supreme Court shall not be sitting, any one of the Justices thereof, together with the Judge of the district within which a special session, as hereafter authorized, shall be holden, may direct special sessions of the Circuit Courts to be holden, for the trial of criminal causes, at any convenient place within the district, nearer to the place where the offences may be said to be committed than the place or places appointed by law for the ordinary sessions: That the clerk of such Circuit Court shall, at least thirty days before the commencement of such special session, cause the time and place for holding the same to be notified, for at least three weeks successively, in one or more of the newspapers published nearest to the place where the session is to be holden: That all process, writs, and recognizances of every kind, whether respecting juries, witnesses, bail, or otherwise, which relate to the cases to be tried at the said special sessions, shall be considered as belonging to such sessions, in the same manner as if they had been issued or taken in reference thereto: That any special session may be adjourned to any time or times previous to the next stated meeting of the Circuit Court: That all business depending for trial at any special Court, shall, at the close thereof, be considered as of course removed to the next stated term of the Circuit Court: And that the District Courts of Maine and Kentucky shall have like power to hold special sessions for the trial of criminal causes, as hath been heretofore given or is hereby given to the Circuit Courts, subject to the like regulations and restrictions.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That bail for appearance in any Court of the United States, in any criminal cause in which bail by law is allowed, may be taken by any Judge of the United States, any Chancellor, Judge of a Supreme or Superior Court, or chief or first Judge of a Court of Common Pleas of any State, or Mayor of a city in either of them, and by any person having authority from a Circuit Court, or the District Courts of Maine or Kentucky, to take bail; which authority, revocable at the discretion of such Court, any Circuit Court, or either of the District Courts of Maine or Kentucky, may give to one or more discreet persons, learned in the law, in any district for which such Court is holden, where, from the extent of the district, and remoteness of its parts from the usual residence of any of the before named officers, such provision shall, in the opinion of the Court, be necessary: Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed to extend to taking bail in any case where the punishment for the offence may be death; nor to abridge any power heretofore given by the laws of the United States to any description of persons to take bail.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That writs of ne exeat and of injunction may be granted by any Judge of the Supreme Court, in cases where they might be granted by the Supreme or a Circuit Court; but no writ of ne exeat shall be granted unless a suit in equity be commenced, and satisfactory proof shall be made to the Court or Judge granting the same, that the defendant designs quickly to depart from the United States; nor shall a writ of injunction be granted to stay proceedings in any Court of a State; nor shall such writ be granted in any case without reasonable previous notice to the adverse party, or his attorney, of the time and place of moving for the same.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That subpoenas for witnesses, who may be required to attend a Court of the United States, in any district thereof, may run into any other district: Provided, That in civil causes, the witnesses living out of the district in which the Court is holden, do not live at a greater distance than one hundred miles from the place of holding the same.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the several Courts of the United States, from time to time, as occasion may require, to make rules and orders for their respective Courts, directing the returning of writs and processes, the filing of declarations and other pleadings, the taking of rules, the entering and making up judgments by default, and other matters in the vacation, and otherwise, in a manner not repugnant to the laws of the United States, to regulate the practice of the said Courts, respectively, as shall be fit and necessary for the advancement of justice, and especially to that end to prevent delays in proceedings.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That where it is now required by the laws of any State that goods taken in execution on a writ of fiery facias shall be appraised, previous to the sale thereof, it shall be lawful for the appraisers appointed under the authority of the State to appraise goods taken in execution, on a fiery facias issued out of any Court of the United States, in the same manner as if such writ had issued out of a Court held under the authority of the State; and it shall be the duty of the marshal in whose custody such goods may be to summon the appraisers, in like manner as the sheriff is, by the laws of the State, required to summon them; and the appraisers shall be entitled to the like fees, as in cases of appraisements under the laws of the State; and if the appraisers, being duly summoned, shall fail to attend and perform the duties required of them, the marshal may proceed to sell such goods without an appraisement.

Approved, March 2, 1793.

An Act to alter the times and places of holding the Circuit Courts in the Eastern District, and in North Carolina, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Spring Circuit Courts of the Eastern District, instead of being held at the times and places now established by law for holding the same, shall, from henceforth, be held at the times and places following, respectively, namely: for the district of New York, at New York, on the fifth day of April: for the district of Connecticut, at New Haven, on the twenty-fifth day of April; for the district of Vermont at Windsor and Bennington alternately, beginning at the first, on the twelfth day of May; for the district of New Hampshire, at Portsmouth, on the twenty-seventh day of May; for the district of Massachusetts, at Boston, on the seventh day of June; and for the district of Rhode Island, at Newport, on the nineteenth day of June; and if any of the said days shall happen on a Sunday, the Courts, respectively, shall commence and be holden on the day following. And all causes now pending in the said Courts, and all appeals, processes, and recognizances, returned or returnable to the same, and all officers, jurors, parties, and witnesses, shall be conformable to this act.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the expiration of the session of the Circuit Court of the State of North Carolina, which is to commence on the first day of June next, (which session shall be held, anything in this act notwithstanding, at Newbern,) the stated sessions of the said Court shall be held at Wake Court-house, either in the Court-house belonging to the said county, or in some convenient building contiguous thereto, until there shall be convenient accommodations for the said purpose in the city of Raleigh, in the said State; after which, and upon its being made so to appear to the said Court, the said Court is hereby authorized and directed, at the close of the session then depending, to adjourn the said Court, to meet at its next stated session in the city of Raleigh, which said city of Raleigh shall thereafter be the place at which the stated sessions of the said Court shall be constantly held.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, Inasmuch as there was not a sufficient quorum of Judges to hold the Circuit Court for the district of North Carolina, for the purpose of doing business, at November term, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, that it shall and may be lawful for the District Judge of the State of North Carolina, to direct the clerk of the said Court to issue such process for the purpose of having jurymen summoned to attend the said Court, at the term to commence on the first day of June next, as he had before issued for the like purpose, returnable to November term above mentioned; that the jurymen ordered by the said process to be summoned shall be ordered to be summoned in the same proportion, and from the same counties, as those jurymen who were ordered to be summoned by the process returnable at November term above mentioned; and the marshal is to execute the said process, and the jurymen legally summoned in consequence thereof are to attend the said Court, under the like penalties for disobedience, as if the said process had been ordered to be issued as usual by the said Court; and the marshal and the jurymen who attend at the said Court shall be entitled to the like allowance for their services respectively. And it is hereby declared that all suits and proceedings, of what nature or kind soever, which have been commenced in the said Court and not finished, shall be proceeded on at the ensuing term, in the same manner and to the same effect, as if the said Circuit Court had been regularly held at November term, as aforesaid, and continuances had been regularly held of all such suits and proceedings from the said last mentioned term to the ensuing term.

Approved, March 2, 1793.

Acts of Congress.

An Act supplementary to the act entitled "An act to provide more effectually for the Collection of the Duties imposed by law on Goods, Wares, and Merchandise, imported into the United States, and on the Tonnage of Ships or Vessels.

Be it enacted, &c., That there shall be in the State of Georgia a district, to be called the district of Hardwick, to comprehend all the waters, shores, bays, harbors, creeks, and rivers, between the South point of Ossabow island and the South point of Warsaw island; that in the said district the town of Hardwick shall be the only port of entry; and a collector for said district shall be appointed to reside at Hardwick; and the said collector shall be entitled to receive the like fees and the same yearly allowance which is paid to the collector of the district of St. Mary's, in the said State.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That so much of Lake Champlain, with the shores, bays, and rivers, connected therewith as lieth within the State of New York, shall be one entire district, to be called the district of Champlain; and the President of the United States be, and hereby is, authorized to appoint such place, within said district, to be the port of entry and delivery within the same as he may deem expedient; and a collector for the said district shall be appointed, to reside at such place within said district as the President of the United States shall direct, who shall be allowed the same fees as are allowed to the collector in the district of Vermont: Provided, nevertheless, That the exception contained in the sixty-ninth section of the act above mentioned, relative to the district of Louisville, shall be, and hereby is, extended to the district of Champlain.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the last day of June next, the collectors in the districts of Vermont and Champlain, in addition to the fees and emoluments which may accrue to them in the collection of the duties of impost and tonnage by the provisions already made, shall severally have, and be entitled to receive, the yearly sum of one hundred dollars each.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the last day of June next, the allowance of one-half per centum to the collectors of the districts of Pennsylvania and of the city of New York, and the allowance of one per centum to the collectors of the districts of Boston and Charlestown and of Baltimore on the amount of all the moneys by them respectively received on account of the duties of impost and tonnage shall cease, and, instead thereof, from and after the said last day of June next, the collectors of the districts of Pennsylvania and of the city of New York shall be entitled to three-eighths of one per centum, and the collectors of the districts of Boston and Charlestown and of Baltimore shall be entitled to three-fourths of one per centum on all such moneys by them respectively received.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the first day of January next, no officer of the customs, or other person employed under the authority of the United States, in the collection of the duties imposed by law on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels, shall own, in whole or in part, any ship or vessel, or act as agent, attorney, or consignee, for the owner or owners of any ship or vessel, or of any cargo or lading on board the same; nor shall any officer of the customs, or other person employed in the collection of the duties as aforesaid, import, or be concerned, directly or indirectly, in the importation of any goods, wares, or merchandise, into the United States, on penalty that every person so offending, and being thereof convicted, shall forfeit the sum of five hundred dollars.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That so much of the twelfth section of an act entitled "An act making alterations in the Treasury and War Departments," as restricted all officers of the United States employed in the collection of the duties imposed by law on goods, wares, and merchandise imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels, from buying or disposing of the funds or debts of the United States, or of any State, or of any public property of either, be and the same is hereby, repealed, so far as the same prohibits them from disposing of their interest in the funds or debts of the United States, or of any of the said States.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States may, if he shall judge it conducive to the public interest, increase the complement of mariners to the several revenue-cutters, so that the number do not exceed seven mariners to each cutter; and that, from and after the first day of April next, there be allowed, in lieu of the compensations now established, to the master of each revenue-cutter, forty dollars per month and the subsistence of a Captain in the Army of the United States; to a first mate, twenty-six dollars per month; to a second mate, twenty dollars per month; to a third mate, eighteen dollars per month; to every mate, the subsistence of a Lieutenant of the said Army; and to each mariner, not exceeding ten dollars per month, to be paid by the collectors of the revenue who shall be designated for that purpose. And that the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to contract for the supply of rations for the officers and men of the said cutters, on such terms as shall, from time to time, appear reasonable.

Approved, March 2, 1793.

An Act providing for the payment of the first instalment due on a Loan made of the Bank of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized and empowered to apply two hundred thousand dollars of the moneys which may have been borrowed in pursuance of the fourth section of the act entitled "An act making provision for the reduction of the Public Debt," in payment of the first instalment due to the Bank of the United States upon a loan made of the said Bank, in pursuance of the eleventh section of the act for incorporating the subscribers to the said Bank.

Approved, March 2, 1793.

Acts of Congress.

An Act for extending the time for Receiving on Loan that part of the Domestic Debt of the United States, which may not be subscribed prior to the first day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three.

Be it enacted, &c., That the term for receiving on Loan that part of the Domestic Debt of the United States, which shall not have been subscribed in pursuance of the act, entitled "An act supplementary to the act making provision for the Debt of the United States," be extended, from and after the first day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, until the last day of June, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, inclusively, on the same terms and conditions as are contained in the act, entitled "An act making provision for the Debt of the United States:." Provided, That the books for receiving the said subscriptions shall be opened only at the Treasury of the United States.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That such of the creditors of the United States as have not subscribed, and shall not subscribe to the said Loan, shall, nevertheless, receive, during the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, a rate per centum on the amount of such of their demands as shall have been registered, conformable to the directions contained in the said act, on or before the last day of June, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, equal to the interest which would be payable to them as subscribing creditors.

Approved, March 2, 1793.

An Act supplementary to the act for the establishment and support of light-houses, beacons, buoys, and public piers.

Be it enacted, &c., That all expenses which shall accrue, from the first day of July next, inclusively, for the necessary support, maintenance, and repairs of all light-houses, beacons, buoys, the stakeage of channels on the sea-coast, and public piers, shall continue to be defrayed by the United States, until the first day of July, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, notwithstanding such light-houses, beacons, or public piers, with the lands and tenements thereunto belonging, and the jurisdiction of the same, shall not, in the mean time, be ceded to or vested in the United States by the State or States, respectively, in which the same may be; and that the said time be further allowed to the States respectively to make such cession.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized and directed to cause a floating beacon or buoy to be provided and placed on Smith's Point shoal, in the Chesapeake Bay, and a beacon or floating buoy at the Southwest Straddle, on the Royal Shoal, near Ocracoke Inlet, in North Carolina.

Approved, March 2, 1793.

An Act providing an annual allowance for the education of Hugh Mercer.

Be it enacted, &c., That an annual allowance to be made for the education of Hugh Mercer, son of the late General Mercer, pursuant to the resolution of the former Congress of the date of the eighth of April, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-seven, shall be four hundred dollars from the time for which he has been last paid until his education shall be finished, or he shall arrive at the age of twenty-one years. And, that the Comptroller of the Treasury be authorized to revise and settle the account of the said Hugh Mercer, for his pension to the present time; the balance of which, as also the annual allowances aforesaid, as they shall become due, shall be paid to his guardian at the Treasury.

Approved, March 2, 1793.

An Act making certain Appropriations therein mentioned.

Be it enacted, &c., That there be appropriated to the purposes hereinafter mentioned, to be paid out of any moneys, which shall come into the Treasury of the United States, to the end of the present year, (not proceeding from the duties on imports and tonnage) and not heretofore appropriated, and out of the surplus of any of the duties of impost and tonnage, which may accrue, during the present year, the sum of fifty-nine thousand one hundred and seven dollars, and forty-one cents:
